Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 667 3

PRESENTED TO

THE MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY,

BY E. F. BICKFORD.

Malden, Oct. 1st, 1885.

The Nation:

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

VOLUME VII.

New York:
E. L. GODKIN & CO., PUBLISHERS.
1868.

Penrhos

AP2

N2

CONTENTS OF VOLUME VII. 10597

The Week.

AT HOME.

Adams, Hon. C. F., declines to talk politics, 123, not for Seymour and Blair, 343—Anti-Slavery Standard attacks Mr. Evarts, 142—Mr. Edw. Atkinson's speech on the Republican financial policy, 222—Mr. J. Q. Adams's letter to Wade Hampton and speech in S. C., 302—Alabama for Grant, 405—Arkansas disorders, 449.

Butler, Gen., interprets financial plank of Chicago platform, helps Cobb through, 1, speech at Gloucester, pretended arrest in Baltimore, 122, opposed by Salem Grant Club, 162, at the Mass. Convention, 221, on the Nation and the Boston Advertiser, chances of nomination, 242, nominated, speeches afterwards, 262, on the Ward-Atkinson telegram, 282, 363, chances estimated, 323, to watch Grant, 381, speech to Colored Zouaves at Washington, 471, letter to Rev. Mr. Strong on taxing the bonds, 518, new defence of taxing bondholders, 541—Gen. Banks talked of for Austrian mission, 63—Gov. Baker, of Ind., on national finances, 242—Gen. Blair threatens to assassinate Grant, 322—Judge Barnard's charge to his grand jury, 430, indictment of the Times, 450—Mr. Samuel Bowles's arrest and imprisonment 541.

Cobb's resolution to tax interest of U. S. bonds, 1—Catholic archbishops repudiate recruiting for Pope in U. S., 23—Chief-Justice Chase and the Democratic Convention, 41, 202, indebtedness to the Sun, 42—Mr. Conness's bill for protecting American citizens abroad, 62—China treaty, 63, 102—Commonwealth and impeachment trial, 82—Mr. T. W. Conway's Louisiana school-bill, 164—Camilla massacre, 241—Church Union and the Nation's views of Water-street revival, 343—Congress as determined by November election, 381—Civil-service complications, 406—Mr. G. W. Curtis hissed in Salem, 450, lecture on "Political Morality," 494—Mr. Henry C. Carey and the Journal des Economistes, 450, 494—Senator Chandler's opponents, 470—Cabinet aspirants, 518.

Congress:—Eight-hour bill passed, Omnibus bill passed over veto, House passes Tax bill, instructs Committee of Ways and Means to report bill taxing interest of U. S. Bonds 10 per cent., 1—Committee reports under protest, 21, 22—N. C. representatives admitted, 21—Mr. Stevens introduces fresh articles of impeachment, Mr. Butler's report on the Senatorial corruption, 22—The Electoral College bill passed, Freedmen's Bureau discontinued from Jan. 1, 1869, House votes appropriation for Alaska, 41—Tax bill signed by President and recalled, Electoral College bill passed over veto, Mr. Stevens turns repudiator, President proposes amendments to Constitution, 61—Garfield-Stevens debate, Senate passes bill subsidizing steamers from N. Y. to Europe, Freedmen's Bureau bill passed over veto, Bill passed to protect American citizens abroad, Funding bill passed, Recess till September, 81—Mr. Henderson on Gen. Butler, Gen. Butler's pious reply, 82.

Session of Sept. 21, 241.

Session of Dec. 7: Universal suffrage, specie payment, naturalization reform, case of Senator Hill, from Georgia, in the Senate; Resolution to recall Reverdy Johnson, Freedmen's Bureau continued for Va., Miss., and Texas, by the House, 469—Senate debates transfer of Indian Bureau to War Department, Senator Morton's financial bill, House rebukes Oregon Legislature, passes Indian Bureau bill, treats President's Message with contempt, condemns the part relating to repudiation, 493—Senate passes Southern Militia bill, Mr. Morton advocates his financial bill, Mr. Edmunds's bill to reduce Georgia to military rule, Eulogies on Thaddeus Stevens; House passes Militia Bill, Eulogies on Mr. Stevens; Congress adjourns for the holidays, 518.

Democratic Convention (National) in New York, 21, secret history, 222—Deputy sheriffs of New York, 163—Mr. Donnelly abuses Mr. Washburne again, 182—Democratic Conventions (State) in N. Y. and Mass., and nominations for Governor; Mass. platform on the currency, 202—Hon. R. H. Dana, Jr.'s speech at his nominating convention, 302—Jeff. Davis and the Fourteenth Amendment as a bar to his trial, 470—Divorces in Chicago for 1868, 542.

Eight-hour law in its political aspect, 2, interpreted by Gen. Schofield, 122, by Attorney-General Evarts, 449—Mr. Evarts nominated for Attorney-General, 2, opinion in regard to Mr. Rollins's removal, 141, attacked by A. S. Standard, 142, dinner in New York, 406—Election prospects, 221, 241, 261, 281—frauds in Penn., 301, returns in Penn., Ohio, Ind., 321—Earthquakes in South America, 283—Erie conspiracy in Wall St., 429.

Fessenden, Hon. W. P., reply to Boston invitation to dinner, 22, speech at Portland, 202—Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment promulgated, 61—Funding bill transformed, 63—Female suffrage convention in Boston, 430—Free-Trader and the Nation, 494.

Gov. Geary and the Penn. common-school system, 143—Georgia legislature expels colored members, 201, 222—Grant's letter to his father, 222, cabinet conjectured, 381, treatment of office-seekers, 405, conversations with the reporters, 541—Gen. Gordon accuses Gen. Butler, 342.

Hancock, Gen., declares for Seymour, 101—Gen. Hawley's letter in favor of Mr. Dana, 342—Wade Hampton accepts the situation, 381—Howard Mission called to account, 382—John B. Haskin and the Erie counsel, 406—Oakey Hall boasts of suspending Excise law, 450.

Independent and the Nation on Louisiana schools, 203.

Johnson, Hon. Reverdy, takes leave of Senate, 41—Mr. Julian's letter on the Yo Semite bill, 42—Mr. Jenckes's chances of renomination, 282.

Louisiana difficulties, 121.

Motley, Hon. J. L., declines public reception, 123, lecture on the crisis, 322—Mexico and a U. S. protectorate, 143—Maine election, 221—Gen. McClellan's letter to Democratic mass meeting, 282—Miss. constitution ratified, 405—Gen. Meade's report on his department, 449—Secretary McCulloch's report, 469—Senator Morton's speech against contraction, 518—Morse banquet, 542.

Naturalization frauds in N. Y. City, 341—November elections, 361—N. Y. City municipal and judicial demoralization, 362.

Orr, Gov., quits S.C. for Missouri, 261—October elections, 301.

Pioneer and the value of a President, 83—"Pure-blooded" community, 302—Geo. D. Prentice and "Our N. Y. correspondent," 303—President Johnson enters the canvass, 341, message, 494—Philadelphia election frauds, 362—Presidential salaries, 405—Wendell Phillips reconciled to Grant, 429.

Rosecrans, Gen., minister to Mexico, 81, visit to White Sulphur Springs, 181, correspondence with Gen. Lee and others, 201—Senator Ross among his constituents, 262—Gen. Rousseau's report on Louisiana, 449.

Smythe, H. A., nominated for Austrian mission, 2—Gov. Seymour "alluded to" in veto of Electoral College bill, 62, letter accepting Presidential nomination, 121—Thaddeus Stevens's record on the bond question, 62, 81—Southern Democratic politicians grown bold, 63—Southern States, political condition, 101, 161, 181, 201, 222, 261, 281, 361, 362, after November elections, 381, 405, 429—Southern legislatures to choose Presidential electors, 121—Southern assassinations, 321, 341, 362, 405—S. C. legislation on negro equality in hotels, etc., 142, towards holders of Fire Loan bonds, 471—London Spectator and the Nation's "financial prospect," 122—Senator Sherman's speech on the bonds, and the Tribune's reply, 162—Mr. Spinner's letter on specie payments, 182—Secretary Stanton on the stump, 262—Gen. Sherman on army officers and political agitation, 282, report on Indian affairs, 430—Judge Sharswood and the Penn. election frauds, 301—Gen. Sedgwick's monument at West Point, 302—Secretary Seward's speech at Auburn, 363—Supreme Court remodellings, 494—Sun and Reverdy Johnson, 542.

Texas in a state of anarchy, 42, 381, according to Flake's Bulletin, 449—Tribune on Stevens's repudiation doctrine, 62, advises against trade with Democrats, 323, on Gen. Butler, 382—G. F. Train repudiates Democratic party, 323.

Vermont election, 181—Hester Vaughn agitation, 470.

World's abuse of Grant, 2, refuted as to Grant's cotton stealing, 141, contradictions about Grant, 162, dispute with Commercial Advertiser, 163, manœuvre to change Presidential candidates, 322—Commissioner Wells on the national expenditures, 101—Boston Working-men's Institute on Congressional Eight-hour law, 102—Senator Wilson's speech at Bangor, 182, bill to enlarge Supreme Court, 494, to retire superannuated judges, 518—"Wickedest Man in New York," 242—Water-street revival at an end, 363—"Warrington" defends Gen. Butler, 341, record on repudiation, 342—Whiskey frauds and complications, 430—Hon. Robert J. Walker and the Alaska intrigue, 542.

ABROAD.

Paraguay:—Minister Washburne versus Lopez, 431.

Great Britain:—Irish Church bill rejected by Lords; Judge Blackburn's charge in the Eyre case; Report of the Commission on Ritualism; Bishop of Oxford and the Nation's English correspondent, 3—Telegraph bill and Corrupt Practices bill carried, 83—Press on Conness's bill to protect American citizens abroad; Mr. Hepworth Dixon to the Marylebone electors; Rush of borrowers to England, 103—Activity of the peers in canvass; Lord Redesdale's view of their duty in the Irish question, 122—Rent disturbances in Ireland, 143, 203—Pall Mall Gazette on Mr. Shaw Lefevre's bill to secure married women in their property, 143, on Irish emigration, 323—Mr. Mason Jones forced to withdraw as a Liberal candidate, 182—Action of the women for suffrage, 182, female suffrage controversy, 303, Mr. Coleridge's argument for female suffrage, and Justice Byles's decision, 451—Probable complexion of next House; Legal checks on Trade Unionists; Briggs Colliery and the Free Labor Registration Society, 183—Co-operation at Rochdale, 223—Clerical debates on the Irish Church question, 203—Mr. Roebuck and Reverdy Johnson at Sheffield, 243, Reverdy Johnson shakes hands at Liverpool with Mr. Laird, 342, 382; Alabama settlement, 382, negotiations, 430—Extradition treaty with France, 262—Road-steamers in Scotland, 263—Liberal and Tory "catechisms," 303—Hare's minority representation working badly, 382—Mr. Mill supports Mr. Chadwick, 383, defeated for Westminster, 431, as legislator and philosopher, 519—Liberal gain at elections, 406—Gladstone defeated in South Lancashire, 431—The new Ministry and Mr. Bright's place in it; Mr. Lowe preferred to Mr. Bagehot by London University, 519—The Alabama "settlement" unsettled, Mr. Johnson's fiasco, 542.

Canada:—Attempt to reduce Governor-General's salary, 203.

Australia:—Colonial flunkeyism towards the Royal family, 43.

India:—Breaking up of Hindoo society, 383.

France:—Montalembert on the Irish Church question, 3—Haussmann's expenditures analyzed by M. Victor Bonnet, 23—Government promises not to interfere with elections; Napoleon on political assassination; Cost of the Legion of Honor, 83—Rochefort and the Lanterne, 143, 163, 183—New Government loan, 163, 183, 223—Emperor's speech at Troyes, 163—Governmental repression, 183—M. Grévy's election in the Jura; Gerrymandering of Bordeaux, and municipal protest, 203—Ténot's history of the coup d' état, 243, 283—Bad relations with Prussia, 263, 283—Effect on Paris Bourse of King of Prussia's speech at Kiel; Napoleon fears to make a speech at Châlons, 283—The Emperor and the new dynasty in Spain, 303—Death of M. Walewski, 343—Revue des Deux Mondes on secret history of Prusso-Austrian war; Napoleon disposed to peace, 363—French Academy and certain mathematical problems, 407—Political map of France, 431—Baudin prosecutions, 451, the bar and the Baudin agitation, 471—Specimen of the French Press, 451—Berryer's death-bed letter, 543.

Spain:—Revolution, 243, 263, 343—Queen dethroned and exiled, 283—Reforms of the Junta, 303, 323—Good progress towards reconstruction, 406, 407—Gen. Prim's aspirations, 431—Republican demonstrations, 451, outbreak at Cadiz, 495—Progress of the loan, 495—Election for the Cortes, the monarchists in the ascendant, suffrage limited to men over twenty-five, 519—Blundering delays of the Government, 543.

Italy:—Parliament lays a tax on Government coupons, 23; Gen. La Marmora's interpellation concerning Custozza, 103; Menabrea's answer, and La Marmora's revelation, 123; Tobacco monopoly farmed out, 183—Lawlessness and crime in the provinces, 43, state of society in the Romagna, 323—Pope's allocution on the Austrian reforms, 43, summons Œcumenical council, 63, 123—Evacuation of Rome demanded, 223, 283—Surplus in the Italian revenue, 243, 283—Caucus of Radical malcontents at Naples, 263—Revival of trade and industry at Venice, 451—Monti-Tognetti execution and subscription, 543.

Germany:—Gen. von Moltke's speech on the naval loan, 43—South German elections favorable to German unity, 143—Disclaimer of Count Usedom's letter to La Marmora, 223, Prussian account of the Usedom despatch, 243—Mr. Bancroft and the obsolete laws of South Germany, 263—Increased taxes under the Bund, 383—King William's speech to the Prussian Diet, 431—The Leibnitz before the Supreme Court of Hamburg, 495.

Austria:—The Reichsrath lays tax on Government coupons, 23—Schützenfest at Vienna, 143—Martial law in Prague, 383—Standing army of 800,000 ordered, 407—Von Beust made a count; Internal harmony of the Empire, 471.

Russia:—Russification of Polish and Baltic territory, 407, 495—Russia at the foot of the Himalayas, 495.

Turkey:—Sultan's Grand Council, 103—The Egyptian deputies "to the right," 103—Consular courts in Egypt complained of, 103, diplomatic conference agreed upon, 383—Insurrection in Bulgaria, 407—Roumanian intrigues, 451—Turkey and Greece on the eve of hostilities; Foreign ministers refuse to protect Greek subjects in Turkey; Efforts to keep the peace, 519, Continued preparations for war, 543.

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

Ambassadors, A Word with Prospective, - - - - - - - - 187
American Literary Diplomatists, - 288
Asian Mystery," "The, - - - 454
Austria, The Transformation of, - 126
Butler and Dana, - - - - - - 286
Butler, General, - - - - - - 185
Campaign Enthusiasm, - - - 246
Campaign, Some Indirect Issues of the, - - - - - - - 224
Campaign Songs, - - - - - - 207
Censorious Age, Our, - - - - 411
Chinese Treaty, The, - - - - 205
Church and the World, The, - - 66
"Conferences," Mme. Audouard, - 412
Congress, The Late Session of, - 104
Convention, The Work of the [Democratic], - - - - - 44
" A Look at the, - - 48
Conversion, - - - - - - - 65
Corrupt, Recent Warnings to the, - 46
Crops, Our Danger from the Good, - 226
Crops, Railroads, Real Estate, and Specie Payments, - - - - 305
Crops, The Immediate Effect of Good, 265
Dana-Butler Contest, The, - - - 387
Democrats as an Opposition, The, - 364
Diplomatic and Consular Service Bill, The, - - - - - - - - 498
Election and its Frauds, The, - - 384
England, The Political Result in, - 433
England, The Situation in, - - 206
English Democracy at the Polls, - 474
Erie Swindle, The, - - - - - 432
European Uneasiness, The, - - 285
Family, The Future of the, - - - 453
Fessenden, Mr., and the Bostonians, 47
Financial Controversy, The, - - 284
Foreign Debt, Our, - - - - - 520
France, Public Meetings in, - - 546
French Canada, - - - - - 128, 146
Grant and the Civil Service Bill, - 452
Grant's Administration, What may be Expected from, - - - - - 344
"Great City" Question, The, - - 498
Greenback Controversy, The Probable Solution of the, - - - - - 145
Harvard College, The Presidency of - 547
Honest Men go? Where shall, - - 84
House of Representatives and the Republican Party, The, - - - - 125
Indian Difficulty, The, - - - - 544
Indignant Author, To the, - - - 88
Injudicious Works and Injudicious Criticism, - - - - - - 346
Joseph Rigdon, Esq., - - - - 548
Labor Crisis, The, - - - - - 6
"Lanterne," The Empire and the, - 166
Legal Tender Act, Probable Effects of the Decision on the, - - - - 164
Legal Tender Act, The "Necessity" of the, - - - - - - - 185
Letter of the Law," "The, - - - 124
"Little Digs," - - - - - - 67
Loans at Low Interest, The Real Obstacle to, - - - - - - - 25
Lying for the Right, - - - - 167
Massachusetts Convention, The, - 246
Mob Spirit, The, - - - - - 410
Names in Politics, - - - - - 324
National Poverty, Our, - - - - 45
Negro Tactics at the South, - - 304
Negro?" "What shall we do with the, 386
Neutrals, The Latest Phase of the Rights of, - - - - - - - 26
October Campaign, The, - - - 324
Patterson's, Mr., Foreign Service Bill, 106
"Political Sense" at the South, The, 204
Political Situation, The, - - - 64
Prandial Literature, - - - - - 7
Presidential Contest to be About?" "What is the, - - - - - - 4
Presidential Election? What is to be decided at the, - - - - - - 264
President's Last Message, The, - - 496
Private Indebtedness and National Debts, - - - - - - - - 105
Production, The Unpopularity of, - 523
Questions next in Order, One of the, 409
Railway Commerce, The Power of Congress to regulate, - - - 56
Reconstruction as it Stands, - - 225
Reconstruction, The Next Step in, - 144
Religious Conventions, The, - - 309
Republican Party after the Election, The, - - - - - - - - 345
Republican Party and the Caucus System, The, - - - - - - - 4
Responsibility to the People, - - 521
Reverdy Johnson's Indiscretions, - 266
Revival in Water Street, - - - 269
Russian Newspapers and Magazines, 27
Russians and English in Central Asia, 307
Russia, The Truth about, - - - 326
Servia, - - - - - - - - 108
Slander and Libel, - - - - - 365
Southern Declarations, The Value of, 184
Southern Legislatures and the Electoral Vote, The, - - - - - 165

Southerners, The Provincialism of, - 455
Spanish Affairs, - - - - - 385
Spanish Revolution, The, - - - 496
Spain, The Crisis in, - - - - 267
Specie Payments, The Return to, - 472
Speculator, A Word for the, - - 85
Tenure-of-Office Act, The, - - - 544
Thaddeus Stevens, - - - - 145
Theatre of our Day, - - - - 500
Town Nomenclature, Our, - - - 499
Traitors in the Camp, - - - - 211
Unkind Praise, - - - - - 338
Valuable Opportunity, A, - - - 327
Vermont and Maine, - - - - 244
Woman's Rights Question, A Neglected Side of the, - - - - - 434
Women as Politicians, - - - - 475
Working-men's Congress, - - - 244

Poetry.

At the Spring, - - - - - 499
"Dropped Dead," - - - - - 207
My New Friend, - - - - - 436

Correspondence.

Agricultural Prospect, The, - - - 31
Ballot as a Panacea, - - - - 188
Bonds Again, The, - - - - - 70
Bonds, Greenbacks, and Gold, More about, - - - - - - - 209
Bonds, The, Letter of the Law, - - 110
Butler, Gen., A Defence of, - - - 311
Butler, Gen., Another View of, - - 291
Butlerite Secret, The, - - - - 393
Christianity, The Conquests of, - - 291
Church Militant, The, - - - - 30
Copyright, Abstract Right of, - - 248
Cranch, Mr., A Correction from, - 350
Creeds and Religious Organizations, 367
Dickinson, Miss Anna, and the Nation, 505
Dickinson's, Miss, Novel, - - - 391
Divorce Question, The, - - - - 504
Doctors and Doctresses, - - - - 525
Gardner, Mr., and Creeds, - - - 504
Gold Speculators, - - - - - 131
Great "Radical" Once More, The, - 348
Homœopathy and Women in the University of Michigan, - - - - 456
Horses and Bonds, - - - - - 31
Illinois Stock Statistics, - - - - 89
Impeachment Question, The "Fog" on the, - - - - - - - 89
Louisiana, The New School-Bill in, - 189
Marini's Process, - - - - - 249
National Decline in Production, The, 111
Phelps, Gen., on Gen. Butler's Practical Ability, - - - - - - 328
Philadelphia Frauds, The, - - - 349
Press and the Public, The, - - - 476
Provincialism of Southerners," "The, 524
Ruskin and his Writings, - - - 437
South and Democratic Success, The, 149
Spirit of the Contract, The, - - 131
Spiritualists, The number of the, - 393
"Thoughtful Teetotaller," Extraordinary Letter from a, - - - - 270
University Reforms, - - - - 503
University Reform—The Faculty View, 551
Waring's, Mr., Elements of Agriculture, 30
Wendell Phillips's Latest Story about Grant, - - - - - - - 328
Whittier, Mr., on "Campaign Songs," 248
Woolsey's, President, Reconstruction Policy, - - - - - - - 130
Yale College, Reconstruction at, 169, 210
"York, you're wanted," - - 393, 414

Special Correspondence.

Boston—Emerson's New Course of Lectures, - - - - - 389
Humors of the Canvass in the Butler District, - - - 390
Washington—The Argument in the Legal Tender Cases, 501
England—8, 69, 109, 148, 289, 311, 347, 502, 550
The Religious Condition of, 436
John Stuart Mill on National Faith, - - - 308
France, - - - - - - - 129
Italy—The Abolition of Feudal Tenure in Venetia, - - - 227
The New Process of Mummification, - - - - - 29
Venetian Glass, - - - - 413
Russia—Co-operative Societies in, - 287
Crete—Cretan Affairs, - - - - 19
The Turk and his Subject Races, - - - - - 290
Turkey and Greece, - - 365

Literary Notes.

11, 31, 49, 70, 90, 112, 131, 149, 170, 190, 210, 229, 250, 271, 292, 312, 328, 351, 368, 393, 414, 437, 457, 477, 505, 525, 552.

Literature.

Aboriginal American Mythology, - 72
Ante-Nicene Fathers, The, - - - 293
Argentine Republic, Life in the, - 398
Arkism, - - - - - - - 35
Bachelor of Salamanca, The, - - 372
Ballad Books, - - - - - 192
Bigelow's Franklin, - - - - 34
Bishop's Explanations of the Law, - 135
Bonaparte in Italy, - - - - 480
Bright's, Mr., Speeches, - - - 460
Bronson Alcott's Essays, - - - 151
Bunsen, The Life of, - - - - 231
"Camors," - - - - - - 91
Chapman's Travels in South Africa, - 153
Children, Gift-books for, - 483, 507, 530
Cracroft's Essays, - - - - - 114
Craik's, Mrs., New Novel, - - - 430
Columbus, Christopher, The Life and Voyages of, - - - - - 417
Cox's Manual of Mythology, - - 419
Daisy, - - - - - - - 55
Dallas Galbraith, - - - - - 330
Dana's Mineralogy, - - - - 481
De Trobriand's "Army of the Potomac," - - - - - - - 73
Deux-Ponts, Count, Campaigns, - 442
Early English, Recent Books on, - 114
Earthly Paradise, The, - - - - 33
Education by Bumps, - - - - 295
Egypt and the Book of Genesis, - 373
Florida, The Conquest of, by Hernando de Soto, - - - - - - 314
George Sand's Mlle. Merquem, - - 52
German and Other Universities, - 212
Germany, Popularization of Science in, - - - - - - - - 193
Helps's Spanish Conquest, - - - 133
Horace Greeley's Account of Himself, 370
Hospital Days, - - - - - 174
Illustrated Gift-books, - - - 485, 531
Italy, Physical Science in, - - - 420
Jean Macé's Books for Children, - 234
Jenkin's, Mrs., Last Novels, - - 482
Kathrina, Illustrated Life of, - - 418
Key's, Mr. T. H., Philological Essays, 251
Kinglake's, Mr., Second Volume, - 459
Last Winter in the United States, - 533
Luther and the Reformation, - - 371
Magazines for August, - - - - 93
" " September, - - - 175
" " October, - - - 252
" " November, - - - 354
" " December, - - - 440
" " January, 1869, - - 527
Man in Earnest, - - - - - 177
Manners of the Olden Time, - - 353
McCarthy's Translation of Calderon, 233
Mediæval Instruction for Daughters, 14
Modern Women, - - - - - 332
Montlong's Mexican Revelations, - 172
Moon's, Mr. G. W., Bad English, - 482
Moral Medication, - - - - 50
New England Tragedies, - - - 331
North American Review for July, - 75
" " " October, 334
Paint our Houses? How shall we, - 73
Parton's Smoking and Drinking, - 396
Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, - - 53
Ruskin's Modern Painters, - - - 173
Sister's Story, A, - - - - - 134
Soldiering, Effects of, on Character and Physique, - - - - - 214
Spanish Gypsy, The, - - - - 12
Uhlhorn's Discourses, - - - - 154
Under the Willows, - - - - 554
Von Bismarck, - - - - - 274

Books.

(The Italics indicate the lesser notices.)

Ab-sa-ra-ka, - - - - - - 462
Adèle Dubois, - - - - - - 296
Aegypten und die Bücher Mose's, - 373
Aldeane, - - - - - - - 56
Alphabet in Rhyme, The, - - - 507
Altenglische Sprachproben, - - 114
Amazon, The, - - - - - - 398
Appleton's Juvenile Annual, - - 483
Appleton's Short-Trip Guide to Europe, 136
Arabs, Among the, - - - - - 274
Argentine Republic, Life in the, - 397
Art of Living, Plain Thoughts on the, 317
Babees Book, The, - - - - - 353
Bad English of Lindley Murray, The, 482
Bible, Comprehensive Dictionary of the, - - - - - - - 556
Bird, The, - - - - - - - 485
Bismarck, M. de, - - - - - 274
Boasting Hector, etc., - - - - 483
Boy Foresters, The, - - - - 530
Boys, A Book about, - - - - 316
Bright, John, Speeches by, - - - 460
Bunsen, Baron, A Memoir of, - - 231
Burns's Poetical Works, - - - 116
Butterfly's Gospel, The, - - - 483
Camors, - - - - - - - 91
Children's Album of Pretty Pictures, 507
Children with the Poets, - - - 483
Child's Auction, The, - - - - 483
Christ in Song, - - - - - 533
Clever Dogs, - - - - - - 530
Circe, - - - - - - - 233
Civil War, Pictorial History of the (Lossing's), - - - - - - 55
Columbus, The Life and Voyages of - 417
Constitutional Law of the United States, An Introduction to, - - 53
Convalescents, Tales for Little, - - 507
Cricket's Friends, The, - - - 463
Crimea, The Invasion of the, - - 459
Cyprian, The Writings of, - - - 293
Daisy, - - - - - - - 55
Dallas Galbraith, - - - - - 330
Deutschen und die auswärtigen Universitäten, Die, - - - - - 213
Doctor Jacob, - - - - - - 374
Doctor's Ward, The, - - - - 530
Du Sommeil et des Etats analogues, - 50
Early English, Specimens of, - - 114
Earthly Paradise, The, - - - - 33
Education, The Scientific Basis of, - 295
Elegy written in a Country Churchyard, - - - - - - - 485
English Art, Gems of, - - - - 531
Enid, Illustrated by Doré, - - - 531
Essays (Cracroft's), - - - - 114
Evergreens, The Book of, - - - 37
Every Boy's Book, - - - - - 530
Familiar Quotations, - - - - 95
Faraday as a Discoverer, - - - 295
Fisica del Globo, - - - - - 420
Flower and the Star, The, - - - 442
Folly as it Flies, - - - - - 156
Foster Brothers, The, - - - - 530
Four Gospels, Unconscious Truth of the, 398
France, Painting in, after the Decline of Classicism, - - - - 531
Franklin, Benjamin, Autobiography of, - - - - - - - - 34
French Painters, Contemporary, - 531
Gates Ajar, - - - - - - 555
Geschichte der amerikanischen Urreligionen, - - - - - - - 95
Gold Elsie, - - - - - - - 355
Gordian Knot, - - - - - - 177
Governor's Pardon, The, - - - 530
Grandmother's Curiosity Cabinet, - 507
Grandpapa's Arithmetic, - - - 234
Great Secret, The, - - - - - 483
Gymnastics and Athletics, Handbook of, 155
Handbuch der vergleichenden Statistik, 116
Hannah, - - - - - - - 156
Harper's Phrase Book, - - - - 56
Hebrew Grammar, A New Practical, - 195
Hernando de Soto, The Conquest of Florida by, - - - - - - 314
Holidays, The, - - - - - - 531
Home Fairy Tales, - - - - - 235
Hospital Days, - - - - - - 174
House Painting, A Popular Treatise on the Art of, - - - - - - 93
Indian Philology, Outlines of, - - 534
I Will, - - - - - - - 483
Jack the Conqueror, - - - - 507
Jesus Christ (Pressensé), - - - 375
Jesus, Modern Representations of the Life of, - - - - - - - 154
John Ward's Governess, - - - - 254
Kathrina, - - - - - - - 418
King Brondé, The Entertaining Story of, - - - - - - - - 483
Knight of La Tour-Landry, Book of the, - - - - - - - - 14
Lake George, - - - - - - 136
Laughter Book for Little Folks, The, 530
Law, The First Book of the, - - 135
Lilliput Levee, - - - - - - 116
Little Gypsy, The, - - - - - 488
Little Lou's Sayings and Doings, - 507
Little Rosy's Travels, - - - - 483
Little Women, - - - - - - 335
Lost Cause Regained, - - - - 155
Madame de Beaupré, - - - - 482
Mademoiselle Merquem, - - - - 52
Madonna, Celebrated Sanctuaries of the, 96
Magic Spectacles, The, - - - - 397
Man in Earnest, - - - - - - 176
Man's Origin and Destiny, - - - 35
Marietta, - - - - - - - 95
Martin Luther's Briefwechsel, - - 371
Medusa and Other Tales, - - - 255
Menschenrassen, Das Beständige in den, 508
Mexico, Authentische Enthüllungen über die letzten Ereignisse in, - 172
Mildred, - - - - - - - 335
Mineralogy, A System of, - - - 481
Miss Patience Hathaway, - - - 507
Modern Painters, - - - - - 173
Modern Women, - - - - - 332
Moonstone, The, - - - - - 235
Mountain Adventures, - - - - 297
Mouthful of Bread, - - - - - 224
My Campaigns in America, - - - 441
My Mother, - - - - - - - 530
Mysteries of Corpus Christi, - - 233
Mythology, A Manual of, - - - 419
Myths of the New World, - - - 72
Napoleon Bonaparte, The Table-Talk and Opinions of, - - - - 422
Napoleon I., Ausgewählte Correspondenz, - - - - - - - 480
Natural History of Birds, - - - 335
Natural Philosophy, A Hand-Book of, 534
New England Tragedies, The, - - 331
New Jersey and the Rebellion, - - 15
Occupations of a Retired Life, - - 421
Old Deccan Days, - - - - - 154
Old English Language, A Dictionary of the, - - - - - - - 114
Opium Habit, The, - - - - - 155
Orphan's Triumph, The, - - - 483
Our Branch and its Tributaries, - - 238
Our Young Folks, - - - - - 507
Outlines of General History, - - 421
Palestine, The Teacher's Guide to, - 421
Percheron Horse, The, - - - - 533
Percy's (Bishop) Folio Manuscript, - 192
Philological Essays, - - - - 251
Pictures from Nature, - - - - 530
Poems Written for a Child, - - - 116
Poets, Words from the, - - - - 37
Politeness, Essays on, - - - - 275
Political Economy, Lessons in, - - 443
Prairie, Stories of the, - - - - 530
Prince Henry of Portugal, The Life of, 534
Problèmes de l'Ame, Les, - - - - 535
Psyche of To-day, A, - - - - - 482
Quatre Ans de Campagnes à l'Armée du Potomac, - - - - - - 73
Recollections of a Busy Life, - - 370
Réfutation de Force et Matière, - - 195
Regiment, The Story of a, - - - 461
Riverside Magazine, - - - - - 507
Round Dozf, The Story of a, - - 117
Russian and English Phrase-book, - 56
Ruth Lovell, - - - - - - - 483
Salamanca, The Bachelor of, - - 372
Sammlung gemeinverständlicher wissenschaftlicher Vorträge, - - 193
Sanitary Commission, Medical Memoirs of the, - - - - - - 214
Schoolroom, In the, - - - - - 95
Scottish Ballads and Songs, - - - 192
Scott, Poetical Works of, - - - - 55
Shilling Shakespeare, The, - - - 235
Short Stories for Spare Moments, - - 206
Sick Doll, The, - - - - - - 483
Sister's Story, A, - - - - - - 134
Sketches Abroad with Pen and Pencil, 485
Smoking and Drinking, - - - - 306
South Africa, Travels in the Interior of, - - - - - - - - 153
Spanish Conquest in America, - - 133
Spanish Gypsy, The, - - - - - 12
Stars, Hand-book of the, - - - 462
Stomach, The Servants of the, - - 234
Summer Resorts, Book of, - - - 136
Tablets, - - - - - - - 151
Tertullian against Marcion, - - - 293
Ticknor & Fields's and Appleton's Almanac, - - - - - - 316
Told in the Twilight, - - - - 483
Trotting Horse of America, The, - 486
Uncle Rod's Pet, - - - - - 530
Under the Willows, - - - - - 554
Voyage Round the World, Narrative of a, - - - - - - - 507
Washed Ashore, - - - - - - 483
Wentworth Grange, Five Days' Entertainment at, - - - - - - 507
What makes us Grow? - - - - 355
White del Bal, Jenny C., Memoir and Letters of, - - - - - - 234
Wild Life under the Equator, - - 530
Winter in the United States, Last, - 533
Woman's Kingdom, The, - - - - 439
Women of the Old Testament, The, - 531
Women, Love, and Marriage, About, - 398
Woodside and Seaside, - - - - 485
You-Sing, - - - - - - - 483

Books of the Week.

16, 37, 56, 76, 96, 117, 137, 156, 177, 196, 216, 236, 255, 275, 296, 317, 335, 356, 375, 398, 422, 443, 462, 486, 509, 535, 556.

Fine Arts.

Dürer, Reproductions of, - - - - 443
Grant, Portraits of, - - - - - 156
Important Published Works at Goupil's, - - - - - - - - 275
Japan, The Fine Arts of, 16, 56, 76, 96, 215
National Academy of Design, Second Winter Exhibition of the, - - 462

ERRATA.

Page 42, second column, line 2. For "probably" read "profitably." Line 22: for "our Democratic" read "an un-Democratic."

" 92, 93, review of "Camors." For "Campvallar" read "Campvallon" wherever the name occurs.

" 115, first column, line 17. Insert "or" between "Hallevi" and "Ha-Levi."

" 192, second column, line 22 from bottom. For "well" read "evill." Line 6 from bottom: for "and" read "but."

" 193, first column, line 5. For "Theodor" read "Theodoric." Line 28: transpose, so as to insert after "is" in the next line, the phrase—"with a very few exceptions, and those familiar pieces." Line 35: for "dark" read "dust." Line 23 from bottom: for "Arnots" read "Arrots." Line 13 from bottom: for "parish" read "private." Line 10 from bottom: for "anything" read "everything." Line 5 from bottom: for "minstrelsy" read "Minstrelsy."

" 350, second column, line 4 from bottom. For "usual" read "natural."

" 363, second column, line 30 from bottom. For "Sadowa" read "Custozza."

" 367, first column, second paragraph. For "Bulgain" read "Bulgaris" wherever the name occurs.

" 373, second column, line 33. For "1862" read "1682."

" 383, second column, line 1. For "Grand Duchy" read "Duchy."

" 436, first column, line 7 of sonnet. For "at" read "as."

" 438, second column, line 12. For "and" read "is." Lines 15, 30: for "Butler" read "Butter."

" 442, first column, line 47. Omit "Yet."

" 449, first column, first paragraph, line 5. For "150,000,000" read "950,000,000."

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 157. THURSDAY, JULY 2, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 1
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
"What is the Presidential Contest to be About?" ..... 4
The Republican Party and the Caucus System ..... 4
The Labor Crisis ..... 6
Prandial Literature ..... 7
England ..... 8
Cretan Affairs ..... 10
NOTES:
Literary ..... 11
The Spanish Gypsy ..... 12
Mediæval Instruction for Daughters ..... 14
New Jersey and the Rebellion ..... 15
Books of the Week ..... 16
FINE ARTS:
The Fine Arts of Japan ..... 16

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.
The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

THE week in Congress began with the discussion of a bill making eight hours a legal day's work for persons employed by the Government in the navy-yards and national workshops. An amendment was offered embodying a provision which heretofore has found favor, and which is perfectly fair, and which only is fair—namely, that mechanics in Government employ in a given place should be paid according to the rates of payment for the same sort of labor obtaining in that place. The amendment was defeated, the best of the senators present voting in favor of it, the Democrats voting against it. Mr. Hendricks, who is said to be "next to Reverdy Johnson"—sed longo intervallo—in ability on the Democratic side of the Chamber, made himself conspicuous in support of this measure, which we should call ad captandum if we believed it would take as many people as it will disgust. Mr. Fessenden was characteristically fearless and clever and—sharp-tempered, we suppose, in his remarks on the motive and nature of the bill. Finally, the amendment having been defeated, the original bill passed, and will pass the House, and will not make ten Republican votes we sincerely believe and sincerely hope. On the same day in the House, Mr. Brooks presented a protest, signed by all the Democrats, against the admission of the Arkansas members. Mr. Brooks has a daily paper at his disposal; perhaps he will tell us what he meant when he said, as if it were true, that the "Supreme Court of the United States, we have every reason to believe, have held the Reconstruction Acts of Congress unconstitutional." For the rest, the protest, as is usual with Mr. Brooks's writings in prose, reads as if there had been no "unpleasantness," and as if Mr. Stephens and Mr. Davis had a continual option, between 1861 and 1865, whether they would sit as legislators in Washington or in Richmond. On Thursday the Omnibus Bill passed in the Senate and House over the veto, the vote being in the two chambers 35 to 8 and 105 to 30. So Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi only are out of Congress, and the last-named State has just held an election which practically brings her in by a majority over rather than under 20,000 on the popular vote. On Friday the House passed the Tax Bill, and it went to the Senate on Saturday, and was given to the Finance Committee, who are authorized to sit constantly. On Monday the Colorado bill was postponed by the Senate, and the bill introduced by Mr. Wilson establishing rules and articles for the government of the U. S. armies was taken up and discussed. The House, by a vote of 92 to 65, instructed the Committee of Ways and Means "to report without unnecessary delay a bill levying a tax of at least ten per cent. on the interest of the bonds of the United States." On Tuesday Mr. T. W. Osborne was admitted as senator from Florida. The House passed the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill, voted to adjourn July 15, and heard Mr. Banks at some length on the purchase of Alaska.

---

Mr. Butler revealed last week, in a letter to the Salem (Mass.) Gazette, the manner in which he proposed to get rid of the declaration of the Chicago Platform touching the national debt. He says he accepts that declaration, and "desires to see the public debt paid according to the letter and spirit of the contract;" but "he may have the misfortune to differ with the editor of the Salem Gazette as to what that is." He gives us to understand further on, that he does not believe the "letter and spirit" to mean "gold." We need not offer any comment on this: there are probably few of our readers who have not felt, ever since the platform was published, that something of this kind was coming. On Monday, in the Senate, he and Mr. Cobb, or Mr. Cobb and he, suddenly produced a resolution directing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill putting a tax of ten per cent. on the interest on the national bonds. Of the right or wrong of this, we shall say nothing at present. This much is certain, that when the money was lent, it was understood that the bonds would not be taxed, and their untaxability was part of the inducement to buy them. Now, even if this was a mistaken impression, or even if the national necessity were such as to compel us to break faith with the world, and diminish our obligations in a way that nobody expected, one would think decency required that the matter should be fully discussed and explained, that the public creditors should not be treated as public enemies, but should be reasoned with and enlightened. Will it be believed, or would it be believed, however, that when Mr. Cobb brought in the resolution, he immediately moved the "previous question," so that the matter should not be debated at all? He failed in this, but Mr. Butler came to the rescue, and helped the resolution through with the aid of the Democrats, Mr. Cobb clinching the nail by a motion to reconsider, the failure of which made the action final, and put an end to all debate. The only argument used in the course of the whole proceeding came from Mr. Butler; and that was, that "it was the same tax the English put on their bonds."

---

Of course, as long as this sort of thing is done, all hope of raising the Government credit or borrowing money at lower rates of interest must be given up. If the interest is to be lowered and the debt consolidated, it will have to be not by honorable, voluntary conversion, but by high-handed swindle. Apart from its effects in damaging the public credit, the Cobb resolution has no special importance. No bill that the committee would report would be passed this session, so that the result of the move will be simply mischief—pure, undiluted mischief—damage to the Government and damage to the party. What has prompted it, we leave those who are more skilled than we are in morbid psychology to explain. It only confirms the opinion we have long entertained, and which we have repeatedly, at the cost of much obloquy, ventured to express, that some of the recruits which the Republican party enlisted during the war will kill it before long, if it does not manage to give them a discharge. It is in its very constitution a moral party; it cannot live by tricks and knavery; and yet it has been allowing itself for some time past to be frequently led, and more frequently influenced, by men who know no other arts in politics. It must be remembered, too, that during the past two months it has been the fashion with the party hacks to place the Butlers, Cobbs, and Logans far above the Trumbulls, Fessendens, and Grimeses, and a portion of these hacks are still doing all they dare to heighten this contrast to the disadvantage of the latter. Moreover, some of its best men in the Lower House, such as Spalding and Hooper, are retiring into private life, leaving the field clearer than ever to the "earnest men" and the "whole-souled statesmen." If, therefore, the respectable portion of the party does not speak out strongly and speedily, there will be a disaster sooner or later, and throwing the blame on the "weak-kneed" will not mend matters.

There has been no progress made during the week in providing a Democratic candidate, or even Democratic principles. The Democratic papers have, therefore, an amount of leisure for the abuse of the Republican candidates which, later in the season, they will be unable to command. The World's treatment of Grant is among the curiosities of journalism. It heaps every kind of ridicule and abuse on him; even disputes his military ability, solely, as far as we can see, on the ground that in this world and this state of existence we are compelled to infer the relation of cause and effect between phenomena from their succession simply, and consequently have no better reason for believing that Grant is a good soldier than that he won battles. It seems, too, to take great pride and pleasure in calling him "H. U. Grant," though, doubtless, owing to our own obtuseness, the force or sting of this we have never been able to discover. There is, of course, in this kind of campaign writing nothing new. What is singular about it is, that it should be found in the columns of a paper which produces as much good writing as the World does. Usually one finds it only in papers that at their best are capable of little else, but the World seems to enjoy the almost unprecedented advantage of possessing a staff capable of any kind of composition, and who turn off a lampoon or enquire into the origin of government with equal gusto and success. Its recent discussion with Mr. Curtis gives one a little glimpse of the difficulties the Convention has before it, and they are certainly appalling. The platform will try the believing and comprehending power of the faithful as no other document in the party history has ever done.

---

The report of the House Committee of Investigation into the alleged corruption of senators on the impeachment trial is, it is said, not to be presented till next week. Impatient as we are, and as everybody is, to know what is in it, we are perfectly satisfied that the learned and judicious investigators have good reasons for the delay. Will they pardon us for saying one word by way of caution with regard to secrecy? They cannot be too careful on this point. In the present days of newspaper enterprise, Mr. Butler need never be surprised at finding a correspondent in his trunk or between the mattresses of his bed, and if the "damning proofs" he has been collecting during the past two months should get out, the guilty parties would of course instantly disappear, and there would be a failure of justice. For the sake of the country, we hope he will be careful, and have the police properly disposed before he brings the report into the House. In the meantime, why not employ detectives to keep an eye on T——l and F——n and R——s, and G——s, S——k, and P——y? Verb. sap. sat.

---

We have spoken elsewhere of the economic aspect of the eight-hour bill passed by the Senate. It has a political aspect, which many people will perhaps hardly think worth consideration; and that is the influence which measures such as this one exert in making the Presidential election and the Presidency seem an intolerable nuisance. The Presidency has turned out a totally different thing from what the framers of the Constitution intended it to be. It has lost, or is gradually losing, nearly all its influence on the political thought or action of the country, and has ceased to be, except in the hands of a man of more than usual force of character and distinction, anything better than a mere instrument for distributing offices amongst the victorious party. A reform in the civil service would make it worthless, even for this purpose. Most native Americans have still a traditional reverence for it; but there is a vast body of persons in this country now, whose number and influence is every year increasing, who have no traditional reverence for anything, and a party has already grown up amongst them which has made the abolition of the Presidency one of the planks in its platform. All that is needed to raise these iconoclasts into a power is to make every Presidential election as much of a social convulsion as possible, by plenty of buncombe legislation like this eight-hour bill. Time was, when the country was small, and the population simple and homogeneous, when this kind of legislation would have been almost harmless; now, with our vast and complicated industrial and commercial interests, our enormous masses of ill-assorted, ill-adjusted humanity trying to settle down into their natural places, as well as difference of origin, and manners, and education will let them, these quadrennial explosions are becoming dangerous. The Presidential election, and its ordinary and natural incidents, the country can stand; but it cannot stand the presence at Washington of a power, such as Congress has been making itself in the case of this eight-hour law and the Cobb resolution, which has a tendency to make the Presidential election the occasion for sudden and startling interference with such weighty and delicate interests as wages, and public credit—interference which, as it is seldom based on any well-settled principle of political, moral, or economical science, it is impossible to foresee or to provide for.

---

A daily paper has been trying to persuade Thurlow Weed that there is nothing derogatory to the judicial office in Chief-Justice Chase taking to politics while on the bench, politics, if rightly followed, being as respectable a pursuit as judging. But here the real point is evaded. Judges have not simply to consider the effects of their conduct on their own character—they have to consider also the effect of it on the popular confidence in the administration of justice. It makes little difference how pure a judge is if people do not think him pure, and people will not think the Chief-Justice or any other judge pure who, while on the bench, is working for a nomination. It is not necessary, and not desirable, that a man should always act with a view to promoting the general weal; but it is well established that the effect on the general weal of a particular line of conduct, if generally followed under similar circumstances, is a proper test of its quality; and if the Chief-Justice will ask himself what would be the effect on the community of all judges doing what he is doing, we feel sure he would be at least inclined to leave it off. Whether he would leave it off, depends on other circumstances. We trust Thurlow Weed will stick to his opinion, and make it known to his visitors at the Astor House, some of whom certainly are not as familiar with the nicer questions of ethics as they ought to be. What if he were to put them through a course of casuistry one afternoon in the week?

---

The President, if one may judge by his pardons and appointments, seems to be afflicted with a sort of moral color-blindness in all that relates to character. All shades of character seem to be absolutely the same to him, and though he is not a mild or reserved man, and gives vent to his feelings about people in a very hearty manner, we do not remember a single case in which he has uttered condemnation of anybody for anything but difference of political opinion. For a knave he seems to have no more feeling of moral reprobation than for a dreary landscape or a rainy day. He grants pardons in a way which goes far to show that the nature of the offence is a matter of indifference to him. There is no more principle, or rule, or predilection, or even influence, to be traced in his nominations, than in his manner of doing the most indifferent acts of the day. Some of them are so good, or apparently so easily accounted for, that one begins to imagine he has settled down on some plan of action, but the next one upsets the whole calculation. One of the most inscrutable is that of Henry A. Smythe for the Austrian mission. Considering the nature of some of the incidents which have marked Mr. Smythe's career as collector of this port, the nomination would seem to indicate either a desire to annoy the Senate and the public or a total want of perception of what constitutes good behavior in office.

---

The nomination of Mr. Evarts for the Attorney-Generalship, though good for the country—for we know of no one who would make a better Attorney-General—will hardly help Mr. Evarts's reputation. The office has not gained in dignity under Mr. Johnson, and nearly every reason which warranted Mr. Evarts in acting as his counsel in the recent trial militates against his accepting office at his hands. Moreover, his doing so will help to increase the confusion already existing in the minds of many people as to the nature and limits of the duty of counsel, or, if it helps to spread any distinct theory on the subject at all, will help to spread that of the Independent—that a criminal's right to professional assistance depends largely on the degree of his guilt, and that when "the greatest criminal of the age" is brought to the bar, to hold a brief for him is, in a certain degree, to become particeps criminis. It will increase the zeal of the Tribune, too, and other journals in the same mental and moral condition, in what it calls "collecting straws as they float"—that is, picking up little incidents in the daily walk and conversation of anybody whom it happens to have denounced as a scoundrel, and using them to justify its bad language towards him—a process very familiar to Austrian detectives in the old days of repression, and which may be made to produce very amusing as well as very tragic results. The "chops and tomato sauce" scene in the Pickwick trial has done much to make it laughable; but it will probably never go wholly out of use amongst the weak-minded and malignant.

---

The Irish Church Bill, after being debated in the House of Lords amidst an amount of excitement such as no debate in the Lords has created since the passage of the Reform Bill, has been rejected by a majority equal to two-thirds. The London correspondent of the New York Times complains bitterly of the attempts made by the Radicals to intimidate the peers into passing it, and compares it to the efforts made here to intimidate the senators on the impeachment trial—which makes us fear that he has been reading the Tribune, and has got into a fog. It may be wrong to try to bully legislators into taking the popular view of a measure before them; but it is not wrong in the same sense that it is wrong to bully judges, because legislators are not bound by the same obligations as judges. The distinction is an important one; and it is important that it should be kept in mind.

---

M. de Montalembert has been writing in the Correspondant on the Irish Church question, and takes occasion to discuss incidentally the prospects of religion in France, as affected by the connection between church and state. He does not think as unfavorably of this connection as he did forty years ago; but he nevertheless believes that the support rendered by the Church to the Imperial régime will give the next revolution a character of irreligion which the revolutions of 1830 and 1848 had not. He treats as absurd the supposition that the existing régime will not end in revolution, and a revolution, too, compared with which "the crises of 1830 and 1848 will appear child's play," and goes on to say "that the suppression of political life in France has produced in certain strata of French society a development of sensualism, materialism, and even atheism of which the eighteenth century itself offered no example," and he predicts that one of the first acts of the revolutionists will be the stoppage of the clerical pay from simple detestation of the Church. M. de Montalembert is not a man whose forebodings are to be treated lightly; but he seems to us to fall into an error not unnatural in a man of his opinions and temperament—an error, too, which a considerable portion of the religious world shares—of treating the materialism of this age as the same in character with that of the eighteenth century. There is not the least likelihood that we shall ever witness again such an "explosion of irreligion" as that which accompanied the first revolution, not only because manners are softened, but because the "irreligionist" of our day feels little of the hatred of the Church which its strength and abuse of power excited in his predecessors of the last century. Moreover, there has been a great change in the manners of the clergy on the Continent, and in the relations of the lower orders of them to their flocks. Those who most contemn their doctrines and office are forced to respect them as philanthropists, and the worst of our modern sensualists has a little of the "religion of humanity" in him; and, even if he hates the Church, has at least a vague belief in the "Dieu des bonnes gens." But it is right to add that many acute observers share M. de Montalembert's forebodings.

---

The political news from England is unimportant. The only incident of note is the disagreement among the Judges of the Queen's Bench touching the law of the Eyre case, which appears to be considered in Westminster Hall an almost unprecedented scandal. Judge Blackburn, who is able, learned, and a Tory, was deputed to charge the grand jury, and before doing so he submitted to the other judges a paper containing his view on the subject of the responsibility of colonial governors for acts done under martial law, in which all but the Lord Chief-Justice, who was not present, concurred. When the Chief-Justice came in, Judge Blackburn stated verbally what his fundamental proposition was, without reading the paper, and, in this statement, the former also concurred. But it appears that around this there were in Judge Blackburn's mind a number of other propositions, which seemed to him part and parcel of it, or consequences of it, which he did not mention, and which were not set down in the paper, and one of which was that Eyre was justified in bringing Gordon from a district in which martial law had not been proclaimed, into one in which it had been proclaimed, and then and there having him done to death by drumhead court-martial. In charging the grand jury, Judge Blackburn carelessly, as he himself afterwards admitted, spoke of the concurrence of his brother judges as covering these propositions, as well as the one contained in his paper, the connection between them in reality being only visible to himself. The general effect of the charge, too, differed from that of the Chief-Justice in the Nelson and Brand case. So the latter got up in court and read a paper expressing his dissent and reciting the history of the transaction. Judge Blackburn read another, explaining and feebly apologizing. The whole proceeding was in form in the highest degree decorous; but, considering what the traditions and habits of the English courts are, it was the judicial equivalent of a brawl.

---

Most English politicians are now "consulting their own safety," as the phrase is, in view of the approach of the elections in the fall, and great problems of government have, for the present, only a secondary interest. The Lords' debate on the Irish Church Bill, inasmuch as their decision is sure not to be final, owed more of its interest to its probable effect on the future of the Lords themselves than on the Irish Church. The Commission on Ritualism has reported; but there is a powerful dissenting minority, which deprives the report of much of its weight, if, indeed, it had any weight to lose. Its most important conclusion is that it is expedient to restrain, in the public services of the Church, "all variations from the established usage in respect of lighted candles and incense," having previously found that the established usage was not to have lighted candles and incense. The minority hold that they should not be prohibited unless the parishioners dislike them, and that usage ought not to be allowed to control the matter completely, as "the ritual of the Church," in their opinion, "must be regulated by living authority." Dean Stanley and Mr. Coleridge occupy a position of their own; and, in order to meet the wants of the two classes of minds which have always existed in the Church, would make room in it both for ritualism and anti-ritualism, a proposal which, like all compromises, has a sensible look, but which, if we examine the differences which separate the two classes of minds, becomes visionary. The difference between the two parties goes far deeper than ceremonial, and touches the character of the clergyman. People who look on him as a priest, with preternatural gifts and powers, and people who look on him as simply a properly appointed teacher, can hardly long continue to worship together, no matter how tolerant they may be in the matter of candles and incense.

---

A clergyman whose letter reaches us too late for publication, writes to complain of the irreverent treatment of the Bishop of Oxford by our English Correspondent in his last letter. We have read the passage complained of over again, and are really unable to discover in it anything which we consider of doubtful propriety, unless it be the reproduction in print of the Bishop's nickname. This nickname, we confess, is not exactly respectful, but as it is the invention of the clergy themselves, and is in common use at Oxford, we think it may fairly be set down amongst the facts of contemporary history, for whose moral complexion a chronicler is not responsible. As regards our correspondent's judgment on the Bishop's oratory and standing in the Church, we certainly feel that we have no right to find fault with it, severe though it be, inasmuch as we have no reason to doubt its soundness. Our correspondent's position and antecedents, too, are such as to make him a good judge of bishops—so good that we should ourselves hardly venture to question either his taste or conclusions when he talks about them.

"WHAT IS THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST TO BE ABOUT?"

Mr. George Ticknor Curtis has published a long letter in the World, showing that, under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dorr case, whatever Congress recognized as a State government is the legal government of the State, and that from the decision of Congress there is no appeal, and that the Executive would be bound to support this decision, if need were, by force of arms. But he holds, nevertheless, that, the action of Congress in setting up governments at the South being utterly unconstitutional, should the Southern States, in spite of the restrictions imposed by the Reconstruction Act, take upon themselves to overturn the present State constitutions and set up new ones, it would be the duty of the Federal Government to refrain from interference, and the great object to Mr. Curtis of getting a Democratic President elected is to make sure that this interference would not be attempted. The persons at the South who, he appears to think, would be justified in overturning the actual governments, and setting up new ones, are not whites exclusively. He has no prejudice against color. He would admit "intelligent, self-sustaining colored citizens" to share in the work, excluding only the "ignorant, half-brutish negro field-hand;" and when the present constitutions were overthrown, he would allow the whites and the "intelligent, self-sustaining colored citizens" to settle the terms on which they should live together without let or hindrance from the General Government.

The World points out with great force the weak points of this argument. If, under the case Luther agt. Borden, Congress has the sole power of deciding what is a valid State government, and if the Executive is bound to support the decisions of Congress by force of arms if necessary, as long as the Republican party have a majority in Congress the present State governments cannot be overturned, no matter who fills the Presidential chair. The President, whether Republican or Democratic, will be obliged to support the present constitutions, as long as Congress pleases, on pain of impeachment and deposition. Moreover, Mr. Curtis's admission that some colored men may take part in the overturning and building up, destroys the force of what he says in favor of excluding "the ignorant and brutish field-hands." All colored men at the South derive their rights to participate in the work of government from the same authority. If that authority be no authority at all, the "intelligent and self-sustaining" must share the fate of the "ignorant and half-brutish;" if it be a good and valid authority, the ignorant and half-brutish will be entitled to vote upon all changes just as well as anybody else. The World, therefore, acknowledges very frankly that during the next four years there is no hope of undoing what has been done at the South as regards negro suffrage, and that, by the end of four years, "the question of setting the present State governments aside for flaws in their original title will have become so entangled with private rights and interests which will have grown up under their authority, that in all likelihood it will then be thought too late to reopen the controversy."

Mr. Curtis says, in anticipation of this objection, that if the result of the election of a Democratic President is not to be the repudiation of the reconstruction scheme and of all things done under it, he does not care who is President; and if the canvass is not to be conducted on this basis, "he, for one, does not know how they (the Democrats) are to conduct it so as to afford the people any reason for changing the administration of the Government."

The World does not offer to relieve him from the difficulty, and we confess that, after a careful reading of what both have to say, we are utterly unable to see with what aims or expectations the party is to engage in the coming contest at all, unless it be the repudiation of the public debt. On Mr. Curtis's showing, the President and Supreme Court are bound in all that relates to the validity of the new governments by the decision of Congress; on the World's showing, there is no chance of Congress changing its mind till it would be too late for the change to have any importance. What difference does it make, therefore, who is to be President? If the Democratic party agreed on any policy affecting any great public interest, the election of its President would, of course, be an important matter merely as an expression of opinion. But we believe it is not agreed on anything. If it accepts negro suffrage as a fait accompli; if it agrees not to touch the public debt; if it is not a free-trade party, nor a hard-money party, nor a white man's party, nor a civil service reform party; and if, in fact, it can give no better reason for its existence than general dissatisfaction, it leaves the general public in a position of extreme difficulty about its claims to office.

Its embarrassments, however, and the disagreement of two such doctors as Mr. Curtis and the World on such an important point as the status and prospects of the new Southern governments, may satisfy the Republicans of one thing, and that is, that all they have to do, in order to put an end to all trouble about equal suffrage, is to enforce law and order at the South for the next four years, or, in other words, to familiarize the country with the spectacle of negro voting, and to create a habit of mind in support of negro rights. The opposition to the Congressional plan of reconstruction was at first largely based on predictions of negro idleness and violence. This was the most powerful argument ever used against it, and it was an argument which experience only could refute. When people came forward and said that the freed negroes would lapse into barbarism and cut the throats of the whites, all that could be said in reply was, Wait and see. Time has proved the falsehood of this assumption. The negroes have, on the whole, perhaps, advanced more rapidly in civilization than their late masters, and certainly more rapidly than the poor whites; so that the only argument in favor of their disfranchisement which was worth the attention of reasonable politicians has been disposed of.

There still remains the white prejudice, the sentiment of dignity, the feeling that if you allow a black man to express an opinion at the poll as to what use he would wish to be made of the taxes he pays, or what kind of legislators he would like to see in the State capitol, or what kind of sheriffs he would like to sell him out or carry him to jail or hang him, you, in some mysterious manner, humiliate and degrade all men of a different complexion. For this, as for all other prejudices, there is no cure but time and repression. A prejudice in matters of right, and not matters of taste, perishes very rapidly under the blighting presence of the policeman. The locking up of conductors who turn negroes out of street-cars rapidly robs the admission of negroes into these vehicles of all its terrors. We have no doubt the law of association may be made in a very few years to act also as a complete solvent of Southern prejudice about negro voting. Only connect closely in the Southern mind violent interference with negro voting with the jail and its irksome industry, and there can be little doubt the colored man's appearance at the polls would soon come to excite as little remark, and to rouse as little bad passion, as the sight of a man on his own horse or of a woman married to a husband of her own choosing.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND THE CAUCUS SYSTEM.

A plan of great interest is being tried in Philadelphia for getting rid of the caucus nominations. Nominations by caucus work reasonably well for party purposes amongst the Democrats, because, the intelligence and morality of the rank and file being somewhat low, and the thinking, as well as the management, being done mainly by leaders, there is little difficulty in maintaining strict discipline. But the composition of the Republican party is such that the obedience of the rank and file cannot be counted on with any confidence at trying crises. It is often called, jokingly or contemptuously, "the party of great moral ideas," and it is essentially a party of ideas, while the Democratic party is essentially now, whatever it may once have been, a party of habits, prejudices, and traditions. The line which separates the two is the one which separates parties in every free country.

Now, you can generally keep a party of traditions and prejudices together without much difficulty, but a party of ideas requires delicate management. It is almost always composed of men whose moral sense and intelligence are in constant activity, and you have to satisfy them every time you ask for their votes that what you propose is not only an advantageous thing, but a right thing. There is not much use in telling them they are an army, and bidding them "rally round the flag." They will reason on their orders. The best way of managing them, therefore, is to adapt the organization to their mental and moral peculiarities, instead of trying to force them to give up their peculiarities for the sake of the organization. Cromwell's introduction of praying and exhortation into the regimental exercises of his Ironsides looked a monstrously absurd thing when he began it, but it worked amazingly well. It made the saints uncommonly ugly customers at Naseby and Worcester, though it would doubtless have utterly demoralized the Cavaliers.

Since the outbreak of the war the Republican party has been joined by a large number of recruits who have no mental or moral affinity with the party, who are not men of conscience or of ideas, and who belong to it because it is the winning party, and because it has been the national party, but who have no sympathy with reforming and progressive tendencies, and who have no idea of leading it on any but the old Democratic principle of "open your mouth and shut your eyes." It has, moreover, in its ranks a large body of men in whom long warfare has bred the besetting sin of veterans and fanatics—the sin of constantly appealing to immediate "utility" as a standard of action. The effect of this on the character and conduct of politicians and philanthropists has been so well described by a distinguished ethical philosopher that we cannot avoid quoting his words:

"It affords so fair a disguise for selfish and malignant passions as often to hide their nature from him who is their prey. Some taint of these mean and evil principles will at last spread itself, and a venomous animation not its own will be given to the cold desire of utility. Moralists who take an active part in those affairs which call out unamiable passions, ought to guard with peculiar watchfulness against such self-delusions. The sin that must most easily beset them is that of sliding from general to particular consequences; that of trying single actions instead of dispositions, habits, and rules by the standard of utility; that of authorizing too great a latitude for discretion and policy in moral conduct; that of readily allowing exceptions to the most important rules; that of too lenient a censure of the use of doubtful means when the end seems to them good; and that of believing unphilosophically, as well as dangerously, that any measure or scheme can be so useful to the world as the existence of men who would not do a base thing for any public advantage. It was said of Andrew Fletcher 'that he would lose his life to serve his country, but would not do a base thing to save it.' Let those preachers of utility who suppose that such a man sacrifices ends to means, consider whether the scorn of baseness be not akin to the contempt of danger, and whether a nation composed of such men would not be invincible."

Now, the portion of the Republican party which gives it its vitality feels all this, somewhat vaguely, perhaps, but firmly. The regular leaders—that is, the most active men of it—do not feel it, although earnest and zealous enough, and can hardly be got to believe that any such ideas are at work behind them. One of them was not many years ago discussing in a State caucus a step of party policy of doubtful morality, and finding it exposed by a brother of tender conscience, exclaimed, "Come, N——, don't let us be too damned virtuous." He is to-day an older man, but has lost, we feel sure, none of his faith in unscrupulousness as a weapon of party warfare; but the party has. The mass of the party are in favor of being as virtuous as possible, and the more they try, the less foolish virtue seems, even from a party point of view. The caucuses have naturally enough become the great strongholds of corruption, and all efforts to reform them have failed. All that exhortation can do to induce Republicans to attend primary meetings has been done in vain. Things have gone on from bad to worse. The nominators have grown more and more reckless, but have been enabled to hold their own thus far by the help of the press, which whipped the recalcitrant and doubtful into submission, at elections, by drawing fearful pictures of the consequences of defeat. For years, no knave, however notorious, has ever been put up for election that the party editors have not come forward and assured their readers, on the word of a patriot, that if he was not elected the country would be ruined; that doubtless there was room for reform in the party, but this was no time to talk of that; that the enemy was at the gates, and had to be defeated, and then the work of purification could be begun. This performance has been repeated so often, however, that it has ceased to be successful. The elections and legislation of the last three years have done much to open people's eyes. Candidates have been frequently defeated, and measure after measure, on which the national salvation was said to be staked, has failed, and yet the nation stands, and not the nation only, but the party stands, and is strong and hearty. In despair about other means of reform, the practice of "scratching" has crept in, and many of the best newspapers have refused to help to bolster up doubtful nominations and doubtful measures. The municipal elections in Philadelphia were lost last year by bad nominations, and the Union League of that city has been doing good work—work which we cannot help saying is very much more needed now than abuse of Johnson and the rebels—in trying to discover means of making the Republican vote at every election the expression of the ideas on which the Republican organization is based. The plan of keeping books open, in which any Republican can, at his leisure, inscribe his own name and the name of the candidate of his choice, has been instituted for the caucus nominations, and been adopted. How successful it has proved, and is proving, we do not yet know, but it certainly ought to succeed, and we hope to see it gradually supplant the other system everywhere. Precautions will, of course, be needed to prevent it too from being abused, and it will need, as any plan of reform must, the hearty support of good men.

If successful, it is difficult to overestimate the extent or value of the changes it would work. In the first place, it would give men of knowledge and character a chance of entering on public life. There are multitudes of such men in the country who are ready and willing to enter the public service. Moreover, the people want to get them into the public service. The idea common in Europe, and which finds constant expression amongst reactionary writers here, that it is only men of low standing and low reputation who can succeed in politics, because the voters prefer them, has not, we are satisfied, a particle of foundation outside the great cities—perhaps we might say outside New York. What fills the public offices with such men is the nature of the nominating machinery, which has been so complicated and so filthy that decent people have long resolutely refused to touch it; and yet it is no more a necessary part of democracy than of monarchy; in fact, there never was a machine less democratic both in its principle and structure.

In the second place, it would drive into some honest calling, or, at all events, some other calling, the lower order of political managers who now make politics a profession, and live by and make them offensive to everybody who has any respect for the human mind or the moral law. They are the curse of the country—the flies that swarm on every sore of the body politic, and make cure, in the ordinary course of nature, seem almost impossible. In the Democratic party their appearance is not very striking, but in the Republican party they furnish a spectacle at once ludicrous and painful. When they mount the stump or come out in editorials, as they constantly do, in defence of great "moral ideas," and blackguard everybody who differs from them, being all the while engaged in all the dirty jobs and intrigues by which the party is endangered or disgraced, and even boasting of their contempt for truth and decency, they probably subject the faith of good men in human progress to one of its greatest trials.

In the third place, it would help to force reformers into reliance for the progress of society on the general virtue and knowledge rather than on particular bills and tricks and dodges and arrangements, and destroy their vague hope that "something will turn up" to purify politics, without our taking any special thought about corruption. Nothing will "turn up," and corruption increases. The courts are gradually going, and so are the legislatures. The Massachusetts Legislature, which has perhaps stood longest and best against the rising tide, is said to have been demoralized utterly during the last session by jobbing and log-rolling. This is the stage immediately preceding corruption by money. Some observers flatter themselves that, as the English Parliament was corrupt in Walpole's day, and the French court and parliaments were corrupt in Louis XVI.'s day, and yet corruption in both countries passed away without the application of any special remedies, so we here shall recover in the same way. But we must call the attention of those who reason thus to the fact that there is not a solitary instance on record of political corruption having been banished without the introduction of a new element into politics. English corruption perished, towards the close of the last century, before the rise of the press and of public opinion, and the appearance in the public arena of the commercial class, which had been slowly growing in wealth and numbers, and brought to public affairs that stern Puritan morality and deep religious feeling which had made them, in an age of general indifferentism, the salt of English society. So, also, French corruption perished before the advent of the French people, who had what the nobility had not, enthusiasm, love of country, and a high though perhaps wild idea of the future of humanity. Even Christianity did not suffice to reform the Roman world. Vast hordes of northern heathen had to come in fresh from the forest, and build up a new moral and political structure on its ruins. Here we have no new class, or race, or influence, or religion, or philosophy, to look for. The evils that afflict must be cured by the agencies now in existence—the pulpit, the press, the school, working on the present population, and by the constant watchfulness and constant labor of those who believe that it is not so much on the laws as on the character of those who administer them that a nation's salvation depends.

THE LABOR CRISIS.

The bill passed the other day by the Senate, and which, of course, received the President's signature, making eight hours a legal day's labor in all Government yards and workshops, is not particularly important as regards its effect on the Government service. The national navy-yards and workshops, whatever else they may be, are not schools of industry, and we have no doubt whatever that most of the men employed in them can hardly help rendering about as much service in return for their wages in eight hours as in ten. As far as they are concerned, the bill simply gives them twelve hours a week to idle in, without any diminution of pay; but the loss to the public will hardly be perceptible.

The effect of the bill on the present employees of the yards and workshops was, however, only a secondary consideration with its promoters. Its real object is to lend the influence and authority of the United States Senate—we leave the House out of the question, because it votes on this kind of thing too often to make its votes of much value as an influence—to the theory that employers should be forced, either by legislation or working-men's combinations, into accepting eight hours as a day's labor, and treating it as worth as much as a day of ten hours. We have before us no full report of the debate at the final reading of the bill, and shall not attempt to discuss the arguments of the supporters of it on the strength of the summary which appears in the daily papers. But the list of yeas and nays is very suggestive as to the nature and value of these arguments. Anybody who is familiar with the character and attainments of the senators would have predicted, without hesitation, who would be found amongst the supporters of such a measure, and he would have made, we venture to say, only one or two mistakes. Mr. Wilson, for instance, he would have put on the other side. This gentleman voted for the bill, but unconsciously assailed it in his speech, by informing the Senate that "he had himself worked thirteen hours a day on a farm, and fifteen as a mechanic." We think this was too much; but we think, also, that had anybody stepped in and refused to allow Mr. Wilson to work more than eight hours, Mr. Wilson would probably never have made his appearance in the Senate. It is his wise use of his liberty, the employment of all his powers in such manner and for such periods of time as his own judgment dictated, that have made him what he is; and we must say we think he makes a sorry use of the authority which has come into his hands as the reward of his industry when he lends his vote and voice to the support of the delusion that a full-grown American man needs or ought to have any better guide in the employment of his faculties than his own reason.

Legislation that will make eight hours the real day's labor of the country is, of course, an impossibility. That may be considered proved. Like prohibitory liquor laws, it is simply an attempt to do what can only be done by a total change in human nature. Our objection, therefore, to legislation, whether State or Federal, on this subject is, not that it is likely to keep, by fear of legal penalty, any man from working as much as he pleases, but that it encourages working-men in the delusion that it is a good thing to keep him from doing it by means of combination amongst themselves, and turns their minds away from the true remedies for the evils of their condition. The first of these remedies is to make the working-man, as far as possible, a free and enlightened human being. It is only in so far as he is removed from being this that he is unfortunate or worthy of pity. He has been, in times past, too much tyrannized over by his employer. For this species of tyranny, which dwarfed both his mind and his body, he and his bad advisers are now trying to substitute the tyranny of his own fellows. We admit that, inasmuch as he has a voice in making the laws of the trades unions, their yoke is somewhat less injurious and certainly less humiliating than that of the masters. We admit, too, that trades unions are of unquestionable value in enabling him to bargain about wages on equal terms with the capitalists; but when they undertake to fix how much he shall work, or how little he shall take for it, or to decide whether he shall work at all, they are guilty of attempts against his mental and moral development and physical comfort.

The proper length of time for a man to work is the time he himself has fixed upon as what his necessities or his aims or ambition require. When anybody else steps in—be it Congress, legislature, or trades unions—to decide that question for him, he is so far pushed down towards the slave or the brute, and he may safely treat anybody who does so as his enemy, and that worst sort of enemy who comes in the guise of a friend. We claim for the working-man the same liberty we claim for men of every other order and calling—a liberty on which civilization, in our opinion, depends—the liberty of choosing between the various roads to happiness, real or seeming, which this world offers; of saying whether he will work twelve hours a day and have money, or work only eight hours a day and have leisure; whether he will pass his youth in toil, with the hope of a middle age of dignity or honor or repose, or surrender the prospect of rising in the world for the sake of present ease.

It is to the greater liberty of choice which we enjoy in this matter here that America, apart from her natural advantages, owes all the superiority she possesses over Europe. The eight-hour movement we look upon as a desperate attempt to destroy this liberty with regard to a large body of the population, and if successful, even by combinations amongst the working-men themselves, it would, to say nothing of its effect on the material prosperity of the country, put an end to one of the most hopeful and most pleasing phenomena of American society, that which most distinguishes it and says most for its healthiness—the rise of working-men of talent and industry into the position of capitalists, professional men, and legislators. We meet the "self-made men" in the front rank in every field of activity, and they all owe their success to the fact that when they were beginning their career they exercised their own judgment about the nature and amount of their labor. If they chose to work fifteen hours a day in order to save money to buy books, or to lay up money to go into business with, they did so, and they rapidly left the men who only chose to work eight hours behind in the race. What the trades unions are now trying to bring about, what the majority in the Senate by their votes and speeches have been encouraging them to bring about, is the subjection of all to a rule under which talent and industry and ambition shall count for nothing; under which Smith, who longs to raise himself and his children in the world, and is willing for that end to "scorn delights and live laborious days," shall be forced to lay down his tools at four o'clock in the afternoon, and chafe the evening through in idleness, merely because Jones wants to have two hours in the tavern to play poker, or booze, or chop logic. If any arrangement entered into by civilized men can be called hostile to civilization, this one certainly deserves to be so called.

Of this the very strike which is now on foot here is another remarkable illustration. The great want of New York is the want of houses, and no class suffers from it as the working classes suffer. The rich procure them at any cost; the people of moderate means can go to the country for them; but the laboring class cannot get away, and find their comforts curtailed, their health injured, and their morals depraved by the increasing dearness, wretchedness, and squalor of their abodes. It is well known that the high price of labor has for three or four years been deterring capitalists from building. Yet at this juncture the bricklayers deliberately refuse to work more than eight hours a day, and, after having thus raised their own rents, probably think they have achieved something very valuable when they have secured two hours a day more to idle in. Leisure is a good thing, but leisure procured at the cost of everything which distinguishes the leisure of a human being from the repose of an ox or a horse is not a good thing, or, in other words, is not leisure at all, and improves neither mind nor body.

It is not alone against their own fellows, however, that trades unions are sinning. They have begun to wage war upon the young of all classes by virtually closing certain callings to them, and reviving in effect the trade regulations of the Middle Ages. The bricklayers of this city who are now on strike in support of the eight-hour movement deny the masters the privilege of receiving more than two apprentices each. We grant that the masters in all trades have done much to bring this on themselves by their readiness to employ large numbers of apprentices and put them in the place of fully trained workmen, to the great damage of the public as well as of the trade. But then there ought to be measure and reason even in revenge or retaliation. A rule which allows only two apprentices each to the handful of builders who employ labor in such a city as this, for instance, is virtually to close one large field of industry to thousands of boys who want to enter it, would probably thrive in it, and do credit to it.

If Congress wants to exert an indirect influence on the condition of the working classes by the management of the Government works, it cannot do a better thing than order the distribution of Government work amongst co-operative associations of working-men, or amongst employers who admit the co-operative principle in fixing the amount of wages. If some of the "friends of the working-man" in the Senate had done this, they would have established a fair claim on his gratitude. They would have given a strong stimulus to a movement which promises the only real solution of the difficulties between capital and labor; because it is the only one in which all the working-man's faculties are brought into play and all his virtues appealed to, and which enables him to adapt his industry and his leisure intelligently to the wants of society, instead of passing his years in a blind, half-brute war with everybody who wants his services. We have no objection to eight hours being a day's work for anybody who likes to make it so. But it is reasonable that in this case wages be paid by the hour, and, when the eight hours are up, let not the industrious man who has aims for the attainment of which ten or twelve hours are necessary be forced to fold his arms also. A strike to secure this freedom of individual choice would deserve the sympathy of the public; the present one deserves none, and particularly the necessities of the country are such that everybody is bound rather to increase his exertions than diminish them.

PRANDIAL LITERATURE.

The present writer is neither a poet nor a veteran toast-master, but on several occasions he has produced "sentiments" for use at festive gatherings of his friends, and he knows a good many verses composed by way of tribute to gifted men who "partook of collations with a select circle" just before going to Europe or on their birthdays. He conceives himself, therefore, fully as well qualified to state views in regard to such semi-literary efforts as any one that is likely to free his mind in regard to them for some time to come. The day we celebrate is nigh at hand, too, and to write just now is to write on an auspicious occasion, as they say. That some qualified person ought to arise and denounce these things is a prevalent opinion. M. Blot and others apply to us the old proverb, that God sends us meat—game and oysters particularly—but the devil sends cooks. He sends us also our custom of excessive indulgence in toasts and sentiments and the speeches appurtenant, and the very singular custom of reading "poems of personal tribute" at farewell banquets.

We do not know that this latter enemy of good appetite flourishes elsewhere in anything like the luxuriance with which it overspreads our own dyspeptic country. "Hearken to a Persian tale," as it was the fashion to say in the social essays of a hundred years ago: "Noureddin Ali, an engaging youth just arrived at man's estate, was the favorite son of Schemseddin Mohammed, an officer of high rank in the household of the Shah of Persia. Being of an inquisitive spirit, and of manners so affable as to be distinguished even in that polished court, he frequently spent hours in conversing with the merchants and travellers sojourning in the caravansaries of Teheran, and listened with eagerness to the wonders they told him of the wisdom of Western nations, which almost equalled, they said, the wisdom of Suleiman ben Daoud himself. Fired with curiosity and emulation, Ali became ardently desirous of witnessing with his own eyes the customs and usages of nations whom he had learned to respect without ever having seen them, and whom to see would be, he thought, to reverence still more. 'O Western depositaries of intelligence!' he frequently cried, 'when will it be permitted me to lift the foot of desire and go to Chicago and Boston and New York?' Inexperience is ingenuous; it is proper to the young to admire what is excellent, and believe that somewhere on earth it is possible to find objects worthy of unlimited admiration." But Persian tales are rather laborious for the writer, though readers are fond of them. Besides, they are somewhat out of date. But our readers may imagine that the inquisitive Ali induces Schemseddin Mohammed to let him come over here to Boston and New York, and that in one of these cities he is invited to assist at a breakfast in honor of one of our distinguished bards, or statesmen, or artists, or artistes. He of course notices many things, his observations on most of which it would be more in Mr. Edward Everett Hale's way to describe than in ours. We shall say that he notices that while some of the company eat heartily, there are certain persons present who seem unable to enjoy their food; one intermittently keeps up a hollow show of partaking of the dainties, or satisfying the inner man, or doing ample justice to the skill of the well-known caterer; but the enlightened foreigner observes that every once in a while he feels in the breast-pocket of his coat, and before resuming his knife and fork glances at his immediate friends, or at the master of ceremonies, who in turn casts an eye on the distinguished fellow-townsman sitting at his right, who also appears to be uneasy about something, low-spirited in manner, and, as it were, prepared for any fate. By-and-by, however, this latter gentleman, at a hint from the chair, sits erect and calls into his face a look of unfeigned delight, whereupon the other rises in his place, draws out a manuscript, and reads in a loud voice a number of verses—each, in some cases, having a spirited chorus—highly laudatory of the guest of the evening. He for his part listens to them with perhaps as much pleasure as often falls to the lot of man; very sorry he must be when it is all done. We may imagine our philosophic traveller secretly repeating to his mentor texts from the Koran relating to hospitality, and learning from the sage how the truly terrible Hastings, when he had assembled his guests at table at Daylesford, regularly each morning read them little things in verse, and writing home to Schemseddin what peculiar ways the westernmost Franks have of encouraging men to be men of genius.

The origin of this custom of ours is obscure. Dr. Bushnell explains it, perhaps, in his "Moral Uses of Dark Things;" but, with deference to that author, we decide it to be an odd exhibition of a sort of adult childishness which has nothing to recommend it but the amusing gravity with which it is done. We have never said, we believe, that, as poetry, the poems of personal tribute are not of the highest order of excellence. No man who calls them rather poor can take refuge under the shadow of our authority, and we have no intention of ever abusing them. It is possible, we say, to conceive of Shakespeare sitting at the board of the Mermaid, with his left leg crossed over the knee of the right, and his head bowed on his hands, while Ben Jonson should stand up over against him and read into his face the praises of his giftedness and compliments to him on his lovableness. All we contend for is, that now when we have newspapers and magazines which would buy the verses under the title of "Lines to W. S. on his departure for Stratford," just as soon as under the title, "Lines read to W. S.," etc., there is no need, before printing them, of inflicting them on the beloved object himself, to the great injury of his shamefacedness, which is a principal evil, and to the discouragement of rising talent, which is an evil still greater, and to the ruin of the dinner, and, among a thousand other things, to the promotion of the cause of intemperance. "Let the poor man drink," Solomon says, and at these banquets he generally does, in order to drown anticipation, and in the hope of lulling memory asleep.

The Toast and Sentiment have a real justification which we are not able to find for the copy of verses. We do "take our pleasure sadly," as the reporters quote for us every Fourth of July, and the Toast and Sentiment are important parts of our public pleasuring. But besides that clinching argument in their favor—that is to say, in favor of the reasonable use of them—there is this other, which alone would be enough. When we are of ripe age for public festivals—as active or past members of engine and hose companies, or sachems of Tammany, or admirers of poets and statesmen and diplomatic representatives, or free and accepted Masons, or able journalists, or officers in the volunteer companies—we have long ceased to be blithe creatures of youth and innocence and joy, in whose gay young hearts there is perpetually a spontaneous bubbling of the springs of hilarious mirth, which is the proper thing on festal occasions. We are all worn pilgrims to a considerable extent, and need a regular organization—chairman, secretary, list of speakers, and of course, toasts and sentiments, if we are to have jollification and the flow of soul. The same thing is true of the feast of reason. Adam in Eden could fit converse hold and large discourse with angels without writing out his remarks beforehand, and finding out appropriate sentiments; but we see around us, as South says, and as John Foster used to tell his weakly friends, the mere ruins of that intellectual and moral perfection in which our great first father moved, Athens and London and Rome being but the marred fragments of Eden. Not only, then, as regards the joyfulness of spirit, but as regards the profitable working of the mind requisite for the conduct of feasts in these degenerate days, nothing is to be said against the Toast and Sentiment in moderation. Turn almost any set of unwarned men, even men of our own speech-making nation, into a room, and give them, as the business of an evening, the eating of a dinner and the making of a certain number of speeches, and the result would probably be not a very good one. The dinner party would resolve itself into several small conventional dinner parties, each of which would perform its functions in presence of the others—that is to say, under unnecessarily disagreeable circumstances—and by-and-by the art of public dining would be lost; would exist only in embryo as gregarious feeding, and be best illustrated by Wordsworth's cattle—"forty feeding like one." Or we may imagine the same effect produced by another cause. Amid the general silence, amid the usual unwillingness of the assembled men to speak—which is one good ground for "thinking nobly of the soul" and trusting in the future of humanity—some shameless and long-winded creature would rise and make night hideous with disquisition; but the Toast, and, in a less degree, we think, the Sentiment, prevent this. They give a chance to a large number of genial souls; every one is warned beforehand; "one of the best speeches of the evening" becomes of common occurrence, and all goes merry as a marriage bell around the groaning board when good digestion waits on appetite, etc.

The Sentiment we have just mentioned with less respect than we feel for the Toast. The Sentiment, we take it, is, in its essential nature, a regular proposition laid down to be enforced, explained, argued upon, and, generally, handled as one handles propositions. This, now, if we understand the matter, is a full-grown Sentiment, though it calls itself a Toast, and was drunk as such by the young men of Washington College the other day: "The true Men of the South! having courage without rashness, prudence without timidity, they neither quail before the frown of power nor fawn upon the hands that have manacled the liberties of their country!" And, on the other hand, one of the most famous of so-called Sentiments we take to be indisputably a Toast. Lord Cockburn tells the history of it. It appears (we trust to memory) that at one time in the career of that judge it was a pleasing rule among the Scotch gentry that at dinner parties every guest must sing a song in the course of the entertainment, or else must offer an original Sentiment. One day a highly respectable dominie, not much accustomed to grandeur, happened to be dining out—or away from his dinner, as he would probably have phrased it—and was informed of the necessity he was under of complying with the rule. He may be supposed to have become at once covered with a cold perspiration. Afterwards he was observed to be in deep thought, and when his turn came he boldly made this utterance: "The reflection o' the mune on the cawm boosom o' the lake," which was received with much laughter. As a Sentiment, it deserved no better, being, as we have said, essentially not a Sentiment, but a Toast; that is to say, it asked in the simplest way for an effusion of enthusiasm, and opened no door to dispute or to speechifying. It merely called before the mind an affecting image of beauty, something to be desired or admired, and there was nothing to do but to give the feelings course, and drink in its honor. It was precisely like "Woman," or "Health," or "Sweethearts and Wives," or "Each other and one other," or—as the wicked midshipmen, avid of promotion, used to say on the West India station, and on other stations, we fear—"A bloody war or a sickly season," or "The Press," or "The Army and Navy," or like any of the true and genuine toasts which, we think, will all be found to have in common the quality we have mentioned—namely, that they appeal primarily to the feelings and imagination; that the natural response to them—if one must needs either drink or orate—is to drink and not orate, and that—one for one reason and another for another—they do not at all address themselves to the ratiocinative faculties as sentiments do. As true sentiments do; in point of fact, there is such confusion in the minds of the committees who prepare Sentiments and Toasts in regard to the nature of the two, and the wide difference between them, that they are less often found pure than mixed. Committees of arrangement, or, rather, the sub-committees to whom Toasts and Sentiments are referred, are in the habit—it is excusable, doubtless—of giving their minds almost entirely to the providing of speeches. Having succeeded in getting hold of their orators, they prepare what they roughly call Toasts and Sentiments—the terms being generally interchangeable, so far as any distinction is sought to be preserved between the things—but which really ought to be called "points for speeches." This misapprehension in regard to the matter prevails among the speakers also, and the speeches are of as mixed a nature as the texts. It is rare enough that we find the pure Toast speech, which should be light rather than weighty, not argumentative, but addressed to man as a thing of impulse, or as only playfully intellectual. Instead of it, we generally have a humdrum repetition of the humdrum old platitudes on the army or the Presidential office or the power of the press—old stupid generalities that smell of the mahogany of centuries. It is rare to find a good speaker to Sentiments, though, of course, as regards mere speech-making, his task is very much easier than the other man's; but we do not know that practically he succeeds much better, despite the advantage that he has in having a more defined path in which to walk and a mark to talk at, so to speak. He, as well as the other, labors under the curse which seems to overhang all prandial literature, and to spoil most of it. The speech-maker, for example, never seems to himself nor to others to be doing a natural thing, and it is never man as he is to whom he delivers his remarks, but some abstract man—a being of the mind, a creature who laughs heartily if you tell him a Joe Miller; who is much struck by the sight of the moon reflected in the calm bosom of the lake; who has never heard any of the stock quotations; who finds much succulency in the remarks on the nature of our institutions and in compends of Revolutionary history; who lends an attent ear when the orator shifts his weight from one leg to the other and says, "It was then, sir, that Arnold, having formed the design of betraying his country, entered into negotiations with the British commander," etc., etc.; who is morally and religiously sound, but intellectually shaky, and of whom you may say in general that he does not resemble the average man of ordinary life more than he resembles the Village Idiot type, and would hardly command any respect if it were not that, like the latter, you must not take too many liberties with him, and it is always not easy to say just how many liberties he will allow.

Unsatisfactory as he is, he gets an immense number of speeches; for it is the fault of prandial literature that it is too voluminous. There is nothing more to be said when this can be said, that half a hundred people, having assembled and eaten and drunken, and listened to toasts and sentiments and orations from six o'clock to eleven, each man meantime getting what social talk he can out of his next neighbor on either hand, then very likely comes a Sentiment of an atrocious character, and a gentleman rises to make an oration on "Canadian Reciprocity" or the "Advantages of a Uniform Currency." This is decidedly overdoing the business, as nobody will deny; but a common way we have of doing business is, overdoing it.

Finally, as regards the poems of personal tribute—poems read at public dinners of one sort and another by poets who cannot make speeches, but can write poems, are not here commented upon,—as regards the poems of personal tribute, they ought surely to be reformed out of existence, and we have faith to believe that it will not be long before the last maker of them will finally clear his throat, and the last victim of them look "flustrated" for the last time. As for the Toasts and Sentiments, they are to be looked upon, we suppose, as a necessity—a concession to human weakness. We can only throw ourselves on the mercy of the committees, and beg them to remember that a good private dinner has no speech, and that a very little speech is enough for public dinners, which, if dinners, ought nine times in ten to have for their chief feature sociableness.

ENGLAND.

LONDON, June 19, 1868.

THE Parliamentary session has reached, not its conclusion, but the end of all important business. The party fights are practically at an end, and it is settled that the elections under the new constituencies shall be held in time for a short sitting before Christmas. The fate of the Ministry will then be determined, and we shall be able to form some guess as to the disposition of our new masters. Meanwhile, the few debates which take place will lead to no practical conclusion except as advertising certain members, and calling attention to matters which may be of importance in an electioneering point of view. The result of the political warfare may be said to have been that the Ministry have kept their seats at the expense of their dignity. It has also been decided that the Irish Church is to be the first question of the day, and, I fear, of many days to come. But as for any practical reforms, the session has been almost entirely thrown away. We can only hope that the democratic deluge with which we are constantly threatened will at least put us in motion in some direction or other. Anything is better than sheer stagnation, only varied by party squabbles.

I will leave for the present a subject which has become rather uninteresting. We are all looking, I think, rather to future changes than to the precise result of party intrigues, and amongst the questions agitated not the least interesting concerns the prospects of the Church of England. The approaching upset of the Irish Church does not necessarily involve the overthrow of the stronger and infinitely more useful branch of the Church; but it may be said that it puts it on its trial. It tends to establish the principle that a church, in order to justify its position, must prove that it is doing its duty; it can rely upon no indefeasible sanctity. Now what is the case with the Church of England? Some answer to this question may be found in a volume of essays published by a few of the Broad Church clergy. Amongst them are men of some distinction, such as Mr. Llewelyn Davies and Professor Seely, the author of "Ecce Homo." The essays are written in a spirit of candor which is far from usual amongst clerical authors; and they fully appreciate, instead of studiously putting out of sight, the difficulties usually felt amongst laymen. Their object is to show that the Church of England, under a liberal régime, may be made to discharge its functions to the immense improvement of the country, and that its disestablishment would be an irrevocable evil. The first essayist begins by putting the difficulty in a sufficiently emphatic form. The working classes, he tells us, are alienated from the Church. Out of fifty artisans of the better class, perhaps one will go to church, and there is one other who might be induced to go. The remaining forty-eight are simply but profoundly indifferent. The clergy, as the great distributors of public charity, are individually rather popular than otherwise. The people feel a certain traditional respect for the black coat and white tie, and know that in case of need they will generally find beneath them a benevolent person with a certain quantity of disposable funds. But to dogmas of all kinds they are profoundly indifferent, and they feel themselves as much out of place in a church as a coal-heaver in a drawing-room. This state of mind, as far as regards indifference to dogmas, is not, I imagine, peculiar to the English working classes. But it is just these men who will in another year possess all the political power of the country. No one imagines that they will use it to commence an immediate assault upon the Establishment; but suppose that internal or external causes should bring the Church into danger, is it likely that they will be at all disposed to support it? Will not the Irish precedent suggest to them the idea that these enormous endowments might be put to some better use? To this the essayist replies, that an establishment is essentially a democratic institution; on the ground, that is, that a democratic nation is likely to spend the public funds on some purpose of public utility. I quite grant the premiss, but the conclusion seems to me to be rather audacious. The public funds will, doubtless, be spent in some way which is apparently for the advantage of the people at large; but will the people like to spend it on churches to which not one in fifty of them cares to go? Will the tendency not be to disconnect the Church from the state, and to subsidize the different churches in proportion to their numbers; or, more likely, to follow again the Irish precedent and divert the funds to some such secular purpose as education? Undoubtedly, if the Church is to find a firm support in the constituencies of the future, it must in some way obtain a hold upon their sympathies.

The remainder of the volume is principally devoted to considering how this is to be done. The most tangible merits of the Church of England in the popular view are its use as a distributor of charity and as the great support of primary education. Nearly everything that has been done in educating the poor in country districts has been done by the clergy. From small incomes they have often built the schools, and are still their chief support. Their position, however, is threatened as the demand for education rises. It is becoming more evident every day that an effectual school system can no longer be trusted to voluntary efforts, and that we must have recourse to some scheme of rating. Of course, the ratepayers will then claim a share in the management of the schools. Now the difficulty is that the clergy have naturally considered the schools as a means of forcing the catechism upon the children, and their object has been to drill the country population into a proper respect for the squire and the parson—especially for the parson—and of course they will be likely to fight any system which threatens to deprive them of this power and to give Dissenters a voice in the management. They will endeavor, in short, to keep up a strictly denominational system, and to insist upon having their own way as they have had it hitherto. If so, they will probably be ousted to a considerable extent from the educational system altogether, and with a proportional loss of influence. The object of the essayists is to implore them to lower their tone and to be content with permission to teach the Bible, lest they should be allowed to teach nothing at all.

Undoubtedly, a loss of its educational position would weaken the Church amazingly; but this is at best, or at worst, a distant prospect. It is the really strong point of the Establishment, as Coleridge long ago remarked, that it puts a civilized and educated gentleman in every little country district. The consequence is that whatever laws may be passed, it will long be impossible to dispense with their assistance in the schools in the country districts at least. And the strongest reformers feel that the benefit derived from the Establishment is in this respect so great that it would be dangerous to interfere with it rashly. The Dissenters are for the most a comparatively uncultivated and bigoted generation, divided into petty cliques, and by no means the equals, with all their faults, of the Established clergy. It is rather from within than without that any immediate danger is to be feared. The Church may be said to consist of three parties—High, Low, and Broad, in ordinary parlance. Now the danger is that these parties are constantly tending to diverge, and, what is more, to pass beyond the limits of the Church. The Low-Church party, so far as it is active, has its hold on the lower part of the middle classes; and the most energetic of those classes are apt to be Protestant Dissenters of some school. The Broad Church again consists of the more intellectual clergy; but the class of which they form part is very apt to abandon Church trammels altogether. The thoroughgoing men of the same type are what Churchmen would call infidels, and, indeed, it is a matter of some wonder how such men as Colenso, or Jowett, or even Dr. Stanley, manage to keep within the necessary limits. It is equally plain that the High Churchmen tend to become Roman Catholics. The logical position of a man who attributes great authority to the Church, and yet holds that there are half-a-dozen Churches of authority, is very puzzling to the ordinary mind.

The consequence of all this is that the real strength of the Church lies in the careless Gallios, the men who prefer to keep things quiet, and prefer compromise to the logical carrying out of their principles. A body which rests upon the vis inertiæ, upon the conservative indifference of Englishmen, has certainly a good following, and may be carried on for a considerable time by its own momentum. But the weakness of the position is obvious. All the zealots of every party tend first to drag the Church in different directions, so that it is a matter of great difficulty to retain them in due cohesion, and are very apt to get beyond the sacred bounds altogether, and to be transformed from members into antagonists. It is therefore apparent that the position of the Church daily tends to grow weaker; and, in fact, the essayists, from whom I have been quoting, are obliged to confess that their hopes really depend on bringing about a greater unity of faith as a support to the unity of constitution. Whether this is probable or not, and whether the unity is likely to be obtained by the triumph of their principles, your readers can judge as well as I. To me it seems that the tendency of modern theologians is to converge towards two opposite and radically incompatible camps, between which the Church of England is only too likely to meet with the proverbial fate.

Meanwhile the Ritualist Commission continues to meet and put forth occasional reports. They discuss such weighty points as whether the clergy are to be allowed to have candles on the altars, and, if so, whether they are to be allowed to light them. Their general tendency is to give some additional power to the congregation to put a stop to ceremonies of which they disapprove. Any such legislation can of course but touch the mere outside of the question, and tends to bring into clearer light the extreme difficulty of reconciling the sacerdotal claims of the Ritualists to the theory of a state church. The party which most regrets the contest is perhaps that which admires beyond everything the liberty of an English clergyman. More than the clergyman of any other church, he can say what he likes and feel himself independent of the petty tyranny of a small congregation. But that merit, great as it is, is perhaps purchased too dearly by the stereotyped and inflexible constitution which is the result of state management. The scandal of private property and salable property in the appointment to many of the best livings is of itself sufficient to be a danger to the Church in more exciting times. And more exciting times are coming.

The public has lately been amusing itself chiefly with two or three sensational trials, whose interest is, I fear, scarcely sufficient to bear transmission across the Atlantic. We are promised a trial for libel which will bring to daylight some profound mysteries of the turf. The late Derby has stirred up such a cloud of disgraceful scandals that they urgently require examination. Only one thing seems plain: the turf rejoices in the possession of a certain number of gentlemen of high social position, who to some extent are supposed to hinder its decline and fall into the hands of blacklegs. It is beginning to be apparent that these gentlemen are more likely to get into scrapes themselves than to purify the air. The Marquis of Hastings is accused of being partly the accomplice and partly the victim of some specially discreditable transactions, and Admiral Rous, in trying to defend him, seems to have made his case worse than before. Unless the matter is cleared up, the turf runs the risk of being an amusement utterly unsuitable to any one who has a character to lose.

CRETAN AFFAIRS.

CANÉA, May 24, 1868.

THE Cretan insurrection threatens to become a chronic ailment of the sick man; it is like the brigandage of Southern Italy, the Algerian war to France; it only ebbs and flows like the sea. Everything has settled down into a recognized state of unsettlement. The troops quietly pursue their routine: now and then move out a little way, have a sharp skirmish, burn an enormous quantity of powder, and at night come back to camp, report 2 killed and 3 wounded, or, in desperate fights, as much as 3 killed and 7 wounded, and all goes on smoothly again for a week or so unless the Cretans get restive and come down to shake up their ill-willing neighbors. We get used to hear the booming of the guns from the ravines about Lakus, and only say "fighting again to-day" and think no more of it. At long intervals a bold raid into the lines wakes us up for two or three days, and some convoys of wounded come in from the Apokowna or Alikianu, but we hear nothing until a week after, when a letter quietly slips in under a fagot of sticks with the list of casualties. Kismet is on the Turks; they have lost all fire and military spirit; they grow bête and are taken in foolish traps, as the other day at Fokes, when Hadje Michali very nearly shut up a battalion in a bottle, and drove them back to Lakus leaving dead and wounded behind them. An Albanian who was in the row told, loafing about to chat with the consular cavasses, that they had hard running, adding very naïvely, "All who could n't carry themselves were done for."

Hadje Michali is by far the most remarkable chieftain so far developed by the war, and as a partisan leader he deserves a place in history. He is described by some of the European volunteers who have been with him as having a remarkable coup d'œil for strategic combinations, with a personal courage and dash which give him an almost absolute control over his subordinates. Tall, handsome, strong, swift of foot, he is the ideal of a Palikari. With the old Criaris, Ajax to his Achilles, he rules the western provinces. In Sphakia and Apokowna, Costa Velondaki, commonly known as Costaro, is the dominant spirit; brave, but cunning more even than brave, as perfect a reproduction of Ulysses as one need ask, reticent, taciturn but always heard when he speaks, more watchful and active than any of his men, prowling all night like a cat, no one knows where to find him or what to expect of him except real devotion to his country, unambitious patriotism, of which he is a striking example. He refused the presidency of the Assembly, and fights as a simple captain under the orders of the chief of the district. One of the most wealthy men of the island, he has lost everything; tempted by enormous bribes to work for conciliation, he has refused everything. He commanded at Vryus, one of the most remarkable victories ever won by an insurrection, and for more than six months he has baffled the largest corps of the Turkish army of occupation in all its efforts to occupy the Apokowna. He is, I am told, nearly eighty, tall, stooping, wiry, impassive, with an eye whose equal I never saw, set under a brow that overhangs it so that it seems caricatured—I should say at least an inch of sheer overhang with a maze of eye-brow black as the eye.

In the eastern provinces the most remarkable man is Corakas (the raven), a desperate, merciless, insatiate hunter of Turks, past eighty and a veteran in the war of 1821–30. In this war his youngest brother was taken by the Turks, who cut him to pieces alive and sent the pieces to Corakas, who then swore a merciless revenge. He has kept his oath, for never has he been known to spare one of his enemies who fell into his hands. In the "old war" he once drove a party of Turks into a church which they barricaded and successfully defended for some time, when Corakas, collecting a mass of pitchy brushwood, mounted the church, tore up the roof, and threw the lighted combustibles in, smothering the whole party. In one of the fights in Agios Basilios he saw a horse which he coveted, and, rushing into the medley of enemies, he seized him by the bridle, and three soldiers attacking him at once he killed them all, with the horse's rider, and carried him off. He fights on horseback when he can, and is a thorough horseman, as I need hardly say.

With such men, if in any way armed according to modern requirements, the Turkish army may fight indefinitely without achieving anything but its own ruin. The only hope, as they themselves admit, is in the construction of block-houses through all the difficult sections. But there are no roads, and all their block-houses are built where they can go at any time without a fight. In the contested country they have not yet put up one. And of those built the Cretans have already captured two, one of which they blew up, and the other they abandoned under bombardment from a frigate which came to the rescue. The Turks, with their discipline and advantage in communications, are no match for the Cretans, and so long as the blockade-runners can keep going there is no prospect of subjugation of the island. It is needless to enlarge on particular affairs, for none of them have individually much importance, except as they raise the morale of the Christians and demoralize the Turks. At a fight near Retimo two weeks ago the former took a Turkish post by storm and captured a gun, but without depots or commissariat, such a victory brings no advantage except victory.

A more serious element in the case is the ruin of the Turkish finances. The local administration has long been penniless; the troops—even officers and surgeons—unpaid for many months; local obligations undischarged; the butchers on strike now a month, and the troops without meat, even in the hospitals—these latter full of sick and empty of all else; the popular discontent so great that the Government cannot take the supplies it needs and cannot pay for, for fear of driving the Mussulman population over to the enemy; time passing and no progress made; an expensive blockade which takes nothing; fast ships, whose captains "funk" the blockade-runner—it is not Crete alone that Turkey is losing, but the empire which is perishing. The car of state goes down hill with military and financial ruin at either wheel to help it along.

No combination of circumstances could so well have helped the plans of Russia for the destruction of the Ottoman Empire—nothing so well have shown the delusion under which the Porte has so far kept the place the jealousies of Europe have assigned it. The Russian Government can desire nothing more than to keep up this state of things, and we can well conceive that is true which is reported of the Western Powers, especially England, that they are growing very uneasy at the prolongation of the insurrection.

But certain circumstances which have recently come to light make a more damning commentary on English policy and international humanity than even the indifference the Government of her Majesty have shown to the unmerited suffering of the Christians of Crete. The secret of England's hostility to Cretan annexation to Greece is in the importance she attaches to the Bay of Suda. In view of the probable success of the Suez Canal, it becomes imperative for England to hold some strong position to command this passage, and none is eligible in all respects save Suda, the strongest naval position in the Mediterranean. The insurrection commenced in a French intrigue for its possession, but the Emperor had not the bad courage to insist, in face of all the circumstances which so strongly supported annexation, on sacrificing Crete to his ambition. It remained for liberty-loving England to crush a Christian people, to assure her the best southeast passage, and secure it from attack. Every person who is now in official connection with the matter is perfectly assured that if to-morrow a volcano were to fill up the Bay of Suda, the day after annexation would become the most natural and easiest thing in the world.

A few weeks ago English agents began to operate in favor of an English protection here, and a movement is now going on to that end, but without much present chance of success. The English consul, however, has received a letter from Costaro, on behalf of many of his compatriots, demanding English mediation and protection. I am so confident in Costaro's patriotism, and his craftiness also, that I can put only one of two constructions on this letter. Either he is convinced that the state of European sentiment makes the Cretan cause hopeless, and wishes to stop a struggle which can only end favorably by the consent of the European powers; or he has taken the English movement as an opportunity to excite the jealousies of other powers. But from all I can learn a feeling is gaining ground that the Powers will now assent to the annexation, and as the Porte has offered everything short of that, they have only to cease their hostility to gain all the substantial fruits of successful revolution. It is this moral-pressure and diplomatic blockade to which I have always looked as the real danger to the Cretans, and to this alone will they owe defeat.

Then there can be no doubt that the Greek Government has, more or less, through imbecility or ambition, betrayed the nation and the Cretans. The feeling is becoming very prevalent that the Greek Government is about to abandon the insurrection, and unite its influences with those of England, and it is known that long ago the latter power offered, for such a change, to use its influence with the Porte for the cession of Epirus and Thessaly. But where, then, is the integrity of the Ottoman Empire? How is that less affected by Epirus and Thessaly than by Crete? Why should not England have said that when the Cretans laid down their arms, she would do all she could (which is all) to effect the annexation of the island? Simply, to my mind, because she had ulterior views with reference to Crete, and though she is not to-day disposed to take Suda, she will not allow it to pass into a definitive condition, and from which it would not be reclaimed when she finds that the occasion for taking it arrives. All the former friends of Crete in the Parliament have, in the recent discussion, declared against annexation, and all indications show an obstinate parti pris.

On the other hand, the French Government, convinced of the reality of the English plans, begins to trouble itself to prevent their having effect, and the upshot seems likely to be that one or the other will get possession of the coveted harbor at no distant day. If the Emperor were wise he would checkmate the English plan by going square for annexation, but as his wisdom seems to have failed him often of late, it may here again.

To-day embark for Albania 500 Albanians, who, with about 100 who remain here in the employ of the Government as zaptiés, cavasses, etc., are all that remain of 1,700 who came here a year and a half ago. These have only received three months' pay since they came, and their Bey has unsatisfied demands against the Government to the amount of 1,500,000 piastres for their support while here. They, Bey and privates alike, refuse to fight any longer without being paid. The 1,100 who have left their bones in Crete will, of course, make no more trouble, but those who go back will not increase the respect of their co-nationals for the Porte and its power. If these men, the hardiest and best adapted to this kind of warfare of all in the service of the Porte, have suffered so severely, how must those who had less liberty of forage or choice of the bed they would lie on? The best authorities in the service of the Porte here admit a loss of 10,000 men during the war, not counting Egyptians or irregulars, but that this is too little the following figures will show:

There are in the island about forty battalions which, full, would be 36,000 men, but none has more than 500 to 600, and the average is certainly not above 400, and 300 would express my opinion better. But at 400 we should have 16,000. Mustapha Pasha commenced with 23,000 Turks and Egyptians, and before he left had received in all 46 battalions, mostly full, or a total of not far from 40,000 men. When he returned from his Selino and Sphakia campaign he had not far from 17,000 men left. Omar Pasha brought and received reinforcements which enabled him to enter on his Sphakian campaign with 45,000 men, according to the estimates of the best informed men amongst the foreign officials, and he himself declared before leaving here that he had not above 20,000, while a colonel in the Egyptian service assured me that there were not above 18,000 regulars all told. Of these 5,000 to 6,000 Egyptians returned to Egypt, and four battalions have since arrived. Cipher it out. As for money, I know on the best authority that the affair cost the Viceroy alone 50,000,000 francs, while the lowest estimate made by any one here is 200,000,000 for the Porte, which, in my opinion, is low.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. Edward McPherson has in press the third of his political year-books, "The Political Manual for 1868," which will cover the time between April, 1867, and the first day of the current month.——Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "Tales for Little Convalescents," by Mrs. S. H. Bradford, and "The Instrument of Association," by George A. Potter.——G. W. Carleton & Co. will publish a new volume of comic matter, by Mr. Henry W. Shaw, entitled "Josh Billings on Ice;" a novel by E. A. Pollard, "The Lost Cause Regained;" and a new novel by R. B. Kimball—"Henry Powers, Banker," is the name of it.

—The prospectus is published of a new evening paper to be called the New York Evening Commonwealth. It avows its intention to support the Republican party, but is not, we judge, going to be a campaign paper merely. There is room, we believe, although the shipwreck of Every Afternoon was so complete and happened so recently—there is and has been room for a good evening paper in this city. The Evening Post is good, in its own well-known way, but the Evening Post is only one. The Commercial Advertiser, distinguished now, if not formerly, for its intimate knowledge of the puzzling politics of the State of New York, and admirable for the really excellent style which its present editor uses in expressing his mind, whatever that may be, is yet not a paper that the general reader of evening papers requires. The promised paper, if conducted with any ability, if written and managed by clever writers and men experienced in the business of journalism, will perhaps succeed. It would certainly succeed, we should say, if it were not that the Post, Commercial Advertiser, and Express will have the latest news, while the Commonwealth, we suppose, will not be able to get admittance to the Associated Press Company. Speaking of newspapers, the Tribune, we see, is anxious for the establishment of a really able political and literary weekly journal. It ought to be published from the Tribune office. It would require, we imagine, "truly American littérateurs" with no small "largeness" and "earnestness." Besides, we who read the writing of the present writers for the Tribune, "never did harm to them;" it would be a double service they would render us to stop spoiling the Tribune, and to give us a literary journal "thoughtful, earnest, vivacious, and elegant," and—this is a main point—which should reach "the best classes of American society." Saturday's Tribune, by the way, found a new kind of lie—"a blistering falsehood." It found a new kind of criticism, too—"Such knavery can only be fitly retorted with the cowhide"—which, let us remind the Tribune, was our old friend the man-stealer's way of confuting arguments. We may add that the man-stealer, if a person of any taste, and accustomed to "the best classes of American society," is perfectly delighted when moral organs take up the cowskin and frantically rage.

—The American Naturalist for July lacks nothing but a sea-green cover to be entirely marine. Its editors, mindful of the season in which the buyers of periodicals fail to buy of the newsdealers as usual, have ingeniously prepared one number which those at least who visit the sea-shore shall have no proper excuse for slighting. John L. Russell writes in a very entertaining way of sea-weeds. Mr. E. S. Morse leads to a stroll by the sea-side, and proves a very intelligent and intelligible guide. One of his subjects, the sea-anemone, is treated of in a full paper by A. E. Verrill. A marine aquarium is described for those desirous of forming one. Sea-worms—a few of them—are apologized for by A. S. Packard, Jr. There is a list of works mentioned appropriate for the sea-side, and the natural history miscellany is this month confined to marine zoölogy. Altogether, the Naturalist offers an effective antidote to the tedium and monotony of ocean watering-places.

—Dr. Packard is issuing, through the Essex Institute press, what promises to be also a very seasonable as well as useful work, and one which will commend itself to all country residents—"A Guide to the Study of Insects." It has been thought best to publish this in parts, stitched, the first being already out, and treating of insects in general—their structure, allied genera, reproduction and growth, etc. Part II. is announced for this month, and Part III. for August, with others to follow. The insects injurious and beneficial to vegetation are to be especially noticed. In typography and illustrations, the part before us leaves nothing to be desired, while the author's style is very perspicuous. We hope the work will be used as intended, in colleges and farm-schools, and by agriculturists.

—The National Quarterly Review is a periodical now seven or eight years old, which is usually filled with essays that seem to have been written for prizes offered by college faculties—essays, for example, on such subjects as "Lord Bacon," "Sir Philip Sidney," "Greek Comic Drama,—Aristophanes," "Mexican Antiquities," "Persian Poetry," "The Men and Women of Homer," "Sir Thomas More and his Times," and so on. The number before us has an article on "Seneca as a Moralist and Philosopher," "The Discoveries of Hipparchus and Ptolemy," "Thomas Aquinas and His Writings"—which is not so bad—and, besides others which are anything but good, an amusing performance relating to "The Impeachment Trial"—for which judicial process the writer entertains a most sovereign contempt, which he expresses fearlessly and with great freedom. To undergraduates of the University of South Carolina, we recommend it as very high-toned, in a small way—as high-toned things are perhaps apt to be—and extremely powerful. The reviews and literary notices are bad, we regret to say, every quarter—generally bad, that is to say, not in all cases. We give our unqualified assent to this dictum, which may be found in a critical notice of "Highland Rambles:" "The most beautiful and fascinating woman must not always talk in an amorous strain—if she would retain her hold on our affections." But the National Quarterly for June contains one article which many of our readers would like to read. It is by Dr. Shelton Mackenzie, we guess. The title of it—a title much too comprehensive for the contents of it—is "Illustrated Satirical Literature." It is full of information about almost all the satirical illustrated periodicals that have appeared in England since Hogarth's time. To say since Hogarth's time is to give them rather too long a date, for the social and political satirist and caricaturist did not enter into alliance with the periodical press till Hogarth had long been in his grave. The essay contains, also, much literary gossiping, Dr. Mackenzie's pen never taking him straight on through his subject—indeed, when he writes he has a principal subject rather than a subject, and is always at the mercy of an impertinent memory. It is an agreeable memory, however, and there is hardly anybody interested in satiric art who will not be glad to see what he has gathered together from all quarters into this talkative essay.

—We hope Congress will take favorable action on the memorial the other day presented by Mr. Edward D. Neill, an antiquarian favorably known as the writer of a little book to which we have previously called the attention of our readers, entitled "Terra Mariæ, or Threads of Maryland Colonial History"—a title, by the way, which is to the full as modest as it should be. While preparing "Terra Mariæ," Mr. Neill became acquainted and familiar with the records of the famous Virginia Company which makes so great a figure in our early history. He now offers—if Congress will appropriate $1,920 for the wages of two copyists for one year, and a small additional sum for the purchase of stationery—to undertake, without payment, the annotation and general preparation for the press of the whole body of the Company's minutes and transactions which are lying in the Library of Congress, neglected hitherto by our historians. The records, if printed, would make two octavo volumes of about five hundred pages each, and two volumes which would be welcomed by every student of the founding of the American nation, and which, printed or unprinted, will be of indispensable use to the American historian whom we shall yet have, though we have him not yet. Of the propriety and importance of having the work done, there is, however, no question. It is only a question of Mr. Neill's fitness for the editor's task, and as to that it will not be hard for Mr. Sumner, say, the ready and efficient guardian of literary interests in the Senate, to satisfy himself, nor, we should hope, to satisfy the Senate.

—We have had some "campaign literature" that survived the campaign, but not much. A little of the humorous writing done in the immediate interest of parties has outlived the occasion that called it forth, but the serious writing has generally gone by a short and steep descent to deserved oblivion. It will hardly be so with a "Hand-Book of Politics," specially prepared for the coming Presidential struggle by Mr. Edward McPherson, the Clerk of the House of Representatives. He intends that it shall set forth "the entire political record of the Government and of parties, from April, 1865, to July, 1868." It will, therefore, include the events of our political history from the assassination of Mr. Lincoln to the nomination of the Democratic candidate for the next presidency. It will give Mr. Johnson's orders, proclamations, speeches, and messages (with the text of bills vetoed); Congressional legislation in regard to the freedmen and reconstruction, with abstracts of the new Southern constitutions; the impeachment articles and the President's answer; the orders, letters, and Senatorial votes (in open and secret session) relative to Mr. Stanton's suspension, removal, and "relinquishment;" Grant's letters, testimony, and orders; the platforms, State and national; judicial opinions bearing on the struggle between the policy of Mr. Johnson and that of Congress—in short, as we have said, it will contain the political history of the last three years, and, beyond a doubt, it will be a valuable book of reference, for Mr. McPherson's abilities in this field are proved.

—Some time ago we had occasion to speak of a charge of plagiarism brought against Dr. March, of Philadelphia, by the Athenæum, Mr. Hepworth Dixon's paper, which said, without truth and with a good deal of insolence, that a book of Dr. March's was made up of pilferings from a book of Mr. Dixon's. We said that the attempt to prove this charge true was entirely a failure, and that the failure would have been obvious if, at the same time with the attack on Dr. March, the critic had not shrewdly brought forward a Scotch plagiarist and proved him unmistakably guilty of "lifting" passages from Dixon's "Holy Land." Having read parallel passages which showed a striking similarity between the Scotch writer's book and the injured editor's, the reader was in a frame of mind that disposed him to find parallelism in the passages afterwards cited from the editor's book and our American writer's. We have recently received a note from the Scotch writer—whom, as we did not before mention him by name we shall not mention by name now—in which he says that it was very unfair in us to call him guilty. Also, he sends us a copy of a letter which he wrote to the Athenæum, in which he denies the truth of that journal's accusations, and which that journal printed in full, and printed before our remarks about Dr. March were written. We desire that our correspondent may have no ground of complaint against us; therefore, although what we wrote was written in vindication of Dr. March, and though our Scotch correspondent was mentioned only incidentally, and was not mentioned by name, and though his book and its author may be said to be unknown to the American reading public, we are willing to say this in reply to his note: Mr. Dixon, or whoever wrote the Athenæum's article, having charged our correspondent with stealing from "The Holy Land" three things—his title, a picture, and much of his text—our correspondent makes answer, and proves very conclusively that he did not steal the picture, and says, not explicitly, but by implication, that he did not steal any of the text. (As for the stealing of the title, that charge was an utterly absurd one.) As regards the stealing of the text, our correspondent, in his letter to the Athenæum, "with the utmost confidence leaves the public to judge." What our judgment was our readers are informed. It is fair to say that it is a judgment based, not on examination of the two books, but on a perusal of the extracts given in the Athenæum's parallel columns.

—The first scientific expedition covered by the new flag of the North German Confederation is the reconnoissance designed to prepare the way for a great German expedition which shall definitively settle the topography of the polar regions. The prime mover in this enterprise is Dr. A. Petermann, the well-known geographer in the employ of Justus Perthes, at Gotha. Fearing lest his country should be outdone by France—which is solicited by a Captain Lambert, backed with fifty thousand francs from the Emperor, and ninety thousand from other sources, to fit out a similar expedition—and by Sweden, a single town of which, with a moderate popula tion, has equipped an expedition to Spitzbergen for this summer—Dr. Petermann has incurred the liabilities of this preliminary expedition, trusting to the support of his countrymen and to the friends of science the world over. The Prince Napoleon, King William of Prussia, and other dignitaries, have already contributed to his fund. On the 24th May, the so-called "Danish yacht" Germania—a vessel of some 80 tons burden, built for polar sea service, and additionally strengthened with an iron casing—which had been purchased by Dr. Petermann, sailed from Bergen, in 60° N. latitude, for the east coast of Greenland. Its object is not, as was Hudson's, when he left Gravesend in May, 1607, to sail straight across the North Pole, but rather to do what he did instead, with more success than any later navigator—coast along the east shore of Greenland, from 75° into as high latitudes as possible, in order to discover a point d'appui for subsequent explorations. William Scoresby, the younger, in July and August of 1822, coasted thus some four hundred geographical miles (69°-75° N.) in a whaler, finding the weather hot, the fields green, huts of Esquimaux deserted, and a species of rodents naturalized. Sabine and Clavering came to the same coast from Spitzbergen in 1823, also in July and August, and made a seven weeks' stay for scientific purposes. In 74½° N. they found the temperature so mild that they passed their nights in a tent. The Dane Grah spent four months of 1827 in latitude 60°-66° N., and, like his predecessors, observed the coast to be free from ice. The commander of the Germania is Karl Koldewey, who, to fourteen years' experience as a sailor and pilot, adds scholarly and scientific training in the gymnasium, the Polytechnic School of Hanover, and the University of Göttingen. His crew consists of about a dozen persons, of whom six are Germans, and all appear to have been well selected, several having had experience in polar sea navigation.

—Any person who is curious to track this expedition, cannot do better than procure of Mr. L. W. Schmidt, 24 Barclay Street, Berghaus's "Chart of the World," one of Perthes's best publications. Its delineation of the polar regions is, however, one of the least of its merits, though the limits of the ice-fields and of floating ice are indicated with the same minute fidelity which characterizes all the other parts of the chart. It aims chiefly to represent "the routes of international intercourse," and it does this by marking out not only the lines of steamship, packet, railroad, and telegraph communication, but the line of the deep sea, the soundings of the greatest depths, the principal shoals, the vast sea-weed drifts, the polar and equatorial currents, and a thousand other particulars which reward a thorough study of the chart, even by a practical navigator. The merchant may also find his account in studying it, following the courses of trade and emigration; and any one who would learn at a glance the present state of civilization, and guess at its course and progress hereafter, will obtain from this beautiful map the most lively and most trustworthy impressions. We must not forget to state that the orthography and, in fact, the language of the map are English, and not German.

THE SPANISH GYPSY.*

THE appearance of a new work by George Eliot is properly a cause of no small satisfaction to the lovers of good literature. She writes little compared with most of her distinguished comrades, and, still compared with them, she writes admirably well. She has shown no inclination to trade upon her popularity by anticipating—precipitating, one may say—the promptings of her genius, the moment of inspiration, or to humor the inconsiderate enthusiasm of that large body of critics who would fain persuade her, against her excellent sagacity, that she is at once a great romancer, a great poet, and a great philosopher. She is, as we have said, to our mind, one of the best of English writers; she is, incidentally to this, an excellent story-teller—a real novelist, in fact—and she is, finally, an elegant moralist. In her novels she had never struck us as possessing the poetic character. But at last, to-day, late in her career, she surprises the world with a long poem, which, if it fails materially to deepen our esteem for her remarkable talents, will certainly not diminish it. We should have read George Eliot to but little purpose if we could still suppose her capable of doing anything inconsiderable. Her mind is of that superior quality that impresses its distinction even upon works misbegotten and abortive. "The Spanish Gypsy" is certainly very far from being such a work; but to those who have read the author's novels attentively it will possess no further novelty than that of outward form. It exhibits the delightful qualities of "Romola," "The Mill on the Floss," and even "Silas Marner," applied to a new order of objects, and in a new fashion; but it exhibits, to our perception, no new qualities. George Eliot could not possess the large and rich intellect which shines in her writings without being something of a poet. We imagine that the poetic note could be not unfrequently detected by a delicate observer who should go through her novels in quest of it; but we believe, at the same time, that it would be found to sound neither very loud nor very long. There is a passage in the "Mill on the Floss" which may illustrate our meaning. The author is speaking of the eternal difference between the patient, drearily-vigilant lives of women, and the passionate, turbulent existence of men; of the difference having existed from the days of Hecuba and Hector; of the women crowding within the gates with streaming eyes and praying hands; of the men without on the plain (we quote only from recollection) "quenching memory in the stronger light of purpose, and losing the sense of battle and even of wounds in the hurrying ardor of action." Elsewhere, in "Romola," she speaks of the purifying influence of public confession, springing from the fact that "by it the hope in lies is for ever swept away, and the soul recovers the noble attitude of simplicity." In these two sentences, if we are not mistaken, there is a certain poetic light, a poetic ring. The qualities are not intense—they gleam, tremble, and vanish; but they indicate the manner in which a brilliant mind, when reason and sense guard the helm and direct the course, may yet, without effort, touch and hover upon the verge of poetry. "The Spanish Gypsy" contains far finer things than either of these simple specimens — things, indeed, marvellously fine; but they have been gathered, in our opinion, upon this cold outer verge—they are not the glowing, scented fruit that ripens beneath the meridian.

* "The Spanish Gypsy: A Poem. By George Eliot." Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1868.

The poem was composed, the author intimates, while Spain was yet known to her only by descriptions and recitals; it was then, after a visit to the country, rewritten and enlarged. These facts correspond somehow to an impression made upon the reader's mind. The work is primarily —like the author's other productions, we think—an eminently intellectual performance; not the result of experience, or of moral and sensuous impressions. In this circumstance reside at once its strength and its weakness; its want of heat, of a quickening central flame; and its admirable perfection of manner, its densely wrought, richly embroidered garment of thought and language. Never, assuredly, was a somewhat inefficient spirit so richly supplied with the outward organs and faculties of maturity and manhood. George Eliot has nothing in common, either in her merits or her defects, with the late Mrs. Browning. The critic is certainly not at his ease with Mrs. Browning until he has admitted, once for all, that she is a born poet. But she is without tact and without taste; her faults of detail are unceasing. George Eliot is not a born poet; but, on the other hand, her intellectual tact is equally delicate and vigorous, her taste is infallible, she is never guilty of errors or excesses. In the whole length of the volume before us we have not observed a single slovenly line, a single sentence unpolished or unfinished. And of strong and beautiful lines what a number; of thoughts deep and clear, of images vivid and complete, of heavily-burdened sentences happily delivered of their meaning, what an endless variety! The whole poem is a tissue of the most elegant, most intelligent rhetoric, from the beautiful exordium descriptive of > "Broad-breasted Spain, leaning with equal love

> (A calm earth-goddess, crowned with corn and vines)
> On the Mid Sea that moans with memories,
> And on the untravelled Ocean," to the majestic pathos of the final scene, in which, contrary to her wont, the author has brought herself fairly to disjoin her young lovers.

But fully to appreciate the writer's skill and the (for the most part) really profound character of her various conceptions, it is needful to acquaint one's mind with the outline of her story. This story, whether invented by the author or borrowed ready-made, is extremely thrilling and touching. It is, of course, a genuine romance, full of color and movement and dramatic opportunities. The scene is laid at the close of the fifteenth century, in the town and castle of Bedmár, in Andalusia. Warriors, inquisitors, astrologers, Moors, gypsies, minstrels—all the consecrated figures of Spanish romance—are effectively represented. "The time was great," as the author says; the Renaissance had just dawned, the Moorish dominion was hard pressed, America lay but just without the circle of the known and soon to be included, Spain had entered into her mighty, short-lived manhood. The hero of the poem—which we must premise is cast in the dramatic form, with occasional narrative interludes—Don Silva, the young Duke of Bedmár, personifies in a very vivid manner all the splendid tendencies and deep aspirations of the scene and the hour. Admirably well, it seems to us, has the author depicted in the mind of this generous nobleman the growth and fusion of a personal and egotistical consciousness into the sense of generic and national honor, governed and directed by his religion, his Christ, his patron saints, his ancestors, and

> "—— by the mystery of his Spanish blood > Charged with the awe and glories of the past."

The young duke's mother, recently deceased, has adopted and educated a girl of unknown parentage and remarkable beauty, by name Fedalma. Don Silva, on reaching manhood, conceives a passionate attachment to this young girl, and determines to make her his wife. The match is bitterly opposed by his uncle, a stern Dominican monk, on the ground that Fedalma is a creature of heretical lineage and sympathies. On the eve of the marriage, the young girl is suddenly claimed as the daughter of a certain Zarca, captain of a band of Zincali, captured by the duke and lodged as prisoners in the dungeons of his castle. The appeal is made to Fedalma by Zarca in person, and the material evidence, besides that of her own filial instincts, is so irresistible that she surrenders herself to her now strange destiny. It is her father's will that she shall cast away her love and her splendor, and espouse only the sorrows and the perpetual exile of her people. She assists Zarca and his followers to escape from Bedmár, and wanders forth into outlawry. Don Silva, distracted, pursues her, secretly, to the camp in which, with the assistance of a neighboring Moorish king, Zarca had fortified himself, and whence he meditates a vengeful attack upon Bedmár; entreats her to return; offers, vainly, to ransom her, and finally, in the fervor of his passion, casts off his allegiance to his king and unites himself, for his love's sake, with the beggarly Zincali. Zarca places him under guard, on probation, and proceeds with his Moors to attack Bedmár. The attack is successful and his revenge complete. He slays the dearest comrades of Don Silva and orders the execution of his uncle, the holy Father Isidor. Meanwhile Silva, hearing of the fate of his town, makes his way back, twice a recreant, inflamed with shame, rage, and grief. He intercedes, vainly, for his uncle, and as the grim old monk is swung into mid air from the shameful gibbet, he rushes upon Zarca and stabs him to the heart. The Gypsy, expiring, transfers his authority to Fedalma, charges her with his hopes of redemption, his visions of increase and empire, and with the burden of conducting her people into Africa, to certain lands granted from the Moors. Of course, with this dark stream of blood flowing between them, Don Silva and his mistress stand severed for ever. Fedalma prepares to embark with her comrades for the African shore and Don Silva determines, purified and absolved by the Papal hands, to consecrate himself, in sad devotion, to the services and glory of his king. The two meet on the shore of the sea in a solemn, supreme farewell. The reader will see that, having brought her hero and heroine to these soaring altitudes of passion, the author had touched a dramatic chord tense almost to breaking, but she raises her hand in time, and the poem ends.

Besides the characters whom we have indicated, there are several subordinate figures, such as George Eliot loves to draw, and such as even in this sombre antique romance she would not willingly dispense with—Lorenzo the innkeeper, Blasco the silversmith, and Roldan the conjurer, to say nothing of Annibal, the conjurer's ape. These persons belong to the delightful race of George Eliot's "worthies" —the simple, subtle, kindly village gossips, all gifted with the same true human accents, the same mild and unctuous humor, whether they be drinking beer beneath the oaks of modern England or quaffing wine beneath the olive trees of mediæval Spain. With these, and yet hardly with these, illumined as he is with a tender poetic glow, we would associate the minstrel Juan—the lounger, talker, singer—

"Living 'mid harnessed men
With limbs ungalled by armor, ready so
To soothe them weary and to cheer them sad.
Guest at the board, companion in the camp,
A crystal mirror to the life around,
. . . . . .
. . . . . singing as a listener
To the deep moans, the cries, the wild strong joys
Of universal Nature." . . .

This author has invested this character of Juan with a peculiar and affecting dignity. As a portrait, indeed, it is like those of all its companions, full of the most exquisite intentions, which confess themselves only on a second reading of the work. The chief motive of our interest in Juan is, of course, the contrast offered by his dreamy, sceptical, idle, disinterested mind, with the fervid intensity which burns around him, in war, and traffic, and piety. Let us add, however, that the lyrics which are laid upon his life and his lute, strike us as the least successful passages in the work. They have an unpardonable taint—they are cold, torpid; they are lyrics made, not lyrics born. The other characters, Silva, Zarca, and Fedalma, are all elaborate full-length portraits. The author has not felt it necessary, because she was writing a picturesque romance, to eschew psychology and morals. She has remembered that she was writing a drama, and that she would have written in vain unless each of her leading figures was fully rounded and defined. They are very human, these three props of the tragedy—or the two lovers, at least: they are warm, living, and distinct. But we can't help thinking that in making them distinct the author has somehow brought them very much too near to us. We may say, indeed, that here, as in "Romola," morally, she has shifted the action from the past to the present. But this error, if error it be, matters less here; the play goes on, at best, in an ideal world. Zarca, the Zincalo chieftain, is a purely ideal figure, but a figure of so much grandeur and power, that one may declare that if he is not real, so much the worse for reality. His character is conceived in a very large and noble manner, and cast in a massive and imposing shape. Especially well has the author possessed herself of the idea that the absolute obloquy and proscription that weighs upon his race is the basis of his courage and devotion. He moves and acts in a kind of sublime intoxication at the thought of being the all in all of a people alike destitute of a God, a heaven, and a home. "The sanctity of oaths," he says,

"Lies not in lightning that avenges them,
But in the injury wrought by broken bonds
And in the garnered good of human trust."

And elsewhere:

"No good is certain but the steadfast mind,
The undivided will to seek the good:
'Tis that compels the elements, and wrings
A human music from the indifferent air.
The greatest gift the hero leaves his race,
Is to have been a hero. Say we fail!—
We feed the high tradition of the world,
And leave our spirit in Zincalo breasts."

The gypsy captain who utters these great truths with such greatness of diction, certainly views the world from a lofty standpoint. Fedalma, his daughter, is throughout a very lovely and perfect creation, from the moment that we see her dancing on the plaza,

"With gentle wheeling sweep
Returning like the loveliest of the Hours
Strayed from her sisters, truant lingering," to where she bids farewell to her lover on the strand, and speaks of their ruined love, their "dear young love" having

"Grown upon a larger life
Which tore its roots asunder."

The author has drawn no purer and more radiant figure than this finely nurtured, deep-souled, double-natured Zincalo maiden; and she has drawn her manners with perfect lightness of touch, with an instrument that never blurs the graceful curve of the outline, or dims the luminous warmth of the coloring. The great success of the work, however, is the figure, Don Silva, with his stormy alternations of passion and reflection, of headlong devotion and intellectual reserve. The finest passages in the book, we think, are the pages descriptive of the restless tumult of his soul during the hours of his confinement, after he has burned his ships and pledged his faith to Zarca. These pages are deeply and nobly imaginative. We have no space to quote: they must be read, re-read, and pondered. But we cannot forego the pleasure of transcribing these few lines, the sweetest in the poem, borne upon Don Silva's lips from the ineffable joy of Fedalma's presence:

"Speech is but broken light upon the depths
Of the unspoken: even your loved words
Float in the larger meaning of your voice
As something dimmer."

Imagine a rich, masculine nature, all refined to the delicate temper of this compliment, and you have an idea of the splendid personality of George Eliot's hero. We may but qualify him by saying that he exhibits the highest reach, the broadest range, of the aristocratic character. This is the real tragedy. Silva is tortured and racked—even if he be finally redeemed—by his deep and exquisite sensibilities. Fedalma, the plebeian, certainly suffers less. If she had been of Silva's blood, she would never have forsworn the beauty of her love to espouse the vast vulgarity of the Zincali.

We had marked many passages for quotation, but we have come to the end of our space. The book itself will be in every one's hands by the time these remarks are printed.

In conclusion, we must express our deep sense of its beauty. One may say, indeed, that it has no faults (except its lyrics). As a composition, it is polished to defiance of all censure. It is, at most, deficient in certain virtues, which the success of the poem, as a whole, would tend to prove non-essential. It is deficient in natural heat; it does not smell of the Spanish soil, but of that of the author's mind. It is neither rapid nor simple. Reflection, not imagination, has presided at the work. Nevertheless it is a most fair achievement, and a valuable contribution to literature. It is the production of a noble intellect, of a moral vision equally broad and deep, and of marvellous ingenuity.

MEDIÆVAL INSTRUCTION FOR DAUGHTERS.*

THE Middle Ages have scarcely left to us a quainter record of their inner life than the book which the good knight of La Tour-Landry composed for the edification of his daughters. Long experience of the world, gained in the stormy period which saw Crécy and Poitiers, careful training which made him familiar with all the lore that could be expected of a gentleman, and heart-felt piety which rendered the observances of religion essential in every action of life—nothing was wanting to him as the representative of his time. As Montaigne is the embodiment of the careless scepticism of the sixteenth century, our good knight pictures to us the earnest faith of the fourteenth, and in this diversity the two men have much in common. Both were shrewd, hard-headed men of the world who, in the retirement of advanced life, recorded the results of their reading and observation. Yet the Knight of the Tower had a purpose which gives to his musings a life and warmth that are lacking in the essays of the Gascon. To train his three motherless daughters in all that is fitting and worthy in womanhood might well call forth his most earnest efforts, and the result affords a rare insight into the manners and modes of thought of the period. In all its good work the Early English Text Society has done nothing better than the publication of a fifteenth century translation of this curious little treatise. Had a similar essay, which the knight compiled for the instruction of his sons, been preserved, we should have had a complete manual of all that was considered, at the period, requisite for the perfect training of youth.

The good knight relates how, in April, 1371, he was walking in his garden, full of sorrow and heaviness, thinking of his "fayr wyff, and that was bothe faire and good, who had knowleche of alle honoure, alle good, and of fayre mayntenynge, and of all good she was bell and the floure," but now twenty and more years dead, when there came to him his three daughters, "of the whiche I was ioyfull, and had grete desire that thei shuld turne to good and worship aboue alle ertheli thinges, for thei were yonge and had but tendir witte." To gratify this praiseworthy impulse he set to work, with the aid of his chaplains, to collect histories of good and evil women from mother Eve to the dames and demoiselles of his own acquaintance. These he relates with delicious quaintness, drawing from them the moral that women should be chaste and modest, pious and charitable, submissive to their husbands, not given to dress, or flirting, or gluttony, or idle gossip, japing or ianglory.

Of course there is much in all this that would seem better fitted to the "Decameron" or the "Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles" than to the communing of a father with his young daughters; yet from stories which, to our modern ideas, seem to be of the foulest he draws the purest moral and the wisest rule of life. Yet many of his homilies afford striking evidence of the change which has been wrought in habits and manners and modes of thought. The theme on which he dwells with most persistence is the duty which the wife owes to her husband, and the theory which he lays down with respect to this must seem shocking to those who look back to the age of chivalry as a time when woman's lightest wish was law to her true knight. Is the husband unfaithful, the model set forth is his aunt, a noble and wealthy dame whose lord disgraced her with his promiscuous amours, until her patience and unwearying kindness gradually reformed him. Is it the lady, on the other hand, who is inclined to be light o' love, she is warned by the story of the man who, having well-grounded suspicions of his partner, bargained with a surgeon to cure two fractured limbs, and then went home and broke both his wife's legs with a beetle; and when this gentle hint proved insufficient to entice her from her evil ways, put her and her paramour to death, and was judged of his neighbors to have done well. So, if a husband abuses his wife, she is to bear it in all sweetness and humility. If she is inclined to retort, she is to be warned by the example of the lady who scolded her knight before company: "And he, that was angri of her governaunce, smote her with his fiste downe to the erthe, and than with hys fote he stroke her in the uisage and brake her nose, and alle her lyff after she had her nose croked. . . . And therefor the wiff ought to suffre and lete the husbonde haue the wordes, and to be maister, for that is her worshippe."

* "The Book of the Knight of La Tour-Landry, compiled for the instruction of his Daughters. Translated from the original French into English in the Reign of Henry VI., and edited for the first time from the unique MS. in the British Museum, with an Introduction and Notes by Thomas Wright, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., etc." London: Published for the Early English Text Society. 1868.

Yet ungallant as he may appear in this, our good knight held the loftiest ideal of pure and chivalric love. "For in loue is but good worship, withoute any euyll be thought in it. In this thenne wherin is thought any euyll is not loue, but rather it is grete falshede and mauuastye. . . . . Thus thenne I sayd to your moder, 'Lady, why shalle not the ladyes and damoysels loue paramours? For in certayne me semeth that in good loue and trewe may be but welthe and honour, and also the louer is the better therfore and more gay and ioly; and is also the more encouraged to excercyse hym selfe more ofte in armes, and taketh therfore better maner in al estates, for to please unto his lady or loue.'" Yet the shrewdness of the old Angevin did not let him blind himself to the dangers attendant upon this platonic affection, and the cool common sense of the long reply which he puts in the mouth of his wife refuses to admit that there can be any toying with so dangerous a passion.

Next to immodesty, the vice which our moralist censures with all the vehemence that his inborn courtesy will permit is the love of dress and personal adornment, the seeking after new fashions, the painting and farding and depilation with which the dames of his time were wont to render themselves attractive: "Faire doughtres y praie you that ye be not the furst to take new shappes and gises of array of women of straunge contrey"—whence it appears that foreign fashions were as much sought after then as now. The evil of these vanities he proceeds to show by many examples, drawn from his own experience as well as from legendary lore. The greatness of the sin he proves by the case of a false wife who for her sin escaped with a hundred years of purgatory, while a lady who painted her face was condemned to hell for eternity; and another who pilled, or plucked superfluous hairs from around her face, was punished by the devil thrusting daily a burning needle into every one of the pores from which a hair had been removed. Perhaps the ladies of the present day who cultivate entomological waists might take more seriously the history of a young damsel of our knight's acquaintance who lost a most advantageous match, on which she had set her heart, by making herself so excessively slim-waisted that she had no color, and so frightened her expected fiancé by her corpse-like appearance. The moral which he draws is surely as applicable now as when he wrote it: "Now haue ye herd good ensample how one ought not to coynte her body for to shewe it small and better shapen, and specially in the wynter, in so much that she lost her manere and colour."

There is much more of quaint and curious in the good knight's mingled simplicity and shrewdness; and it would be difficult in the space at our command to do justice to the truth and piety, the gentle courtesy and high breeding, which reveal themselves on every page, and prove their author to be as perfect a knight as the hero of La Mancha before his brain was crazed. It seems marvellous that one who had played a man's part in the fierce struggles of that tumultuous and lawless time should have retained so much of kindly gentleness and earnest faith, such reverence for the purity of woman and such boundless trust in the goodness of God.

The issues of the Early English Text Society have generally been so well edited, and Mr. Thomas Wright has done so much good work in antiquarian research, that we feel somewhat loth to criticise the manner in which the editorship of this work has been performed, and yet its slovenly character merits a few words of reprobation. Marshal Boucicaut is converted (Notes, p. 209) from Jean le Maingre, dit Boucicaut, to "Jean de Maingre de Boucicaut." The notes, in their aimless pointlessness, resemble strongly the inscriptions made by young ladies on the margins of novels from the circulating library—as when a very characteristic story concerning a contemporary of the author receives for comment (p. 218): "Messire Geoffroy de Lugre must have been a rather singular individual." The glossary, however, is the weakest part of the work. Such an appendix was hardly needed, for the book will present few difficulties to any one who can enjoy Shakespeare and Spenser. Mr. Wright has made it very short—less than four pages in large print—but has filled it with words requiring no explanation, as the variation in the spelling or meaning is of the slightest. If the reader requires to be told that acorded means agreed; ameruailed, astonished; assoiled, absolved; axsed, asked; cleped, called; couerture, covering; dethe, death; herkyn, hearken; hight, called; meruaile, marvel; next, nearest; priuely, privily; recouere, recover; science, knowledge; seruithe, serveth; or waxinge, increasing, then the glossary ought to be nearly half as bulky as the text, for hundreds of words quite as different as these from their modern forms are omitted. Still more incomprehensible is the passing over of many which might readily make the unaccustomed reader pause, such as the following, of which no explanation is given: Abeled, dressed; atysed, urged; burioys (bourgeoise), a woman of the middle class; cherlous, ill-bred; cote hardy, a gown; erce, err; faytte, action; fyamed (fyanced?), betrothed; ianglory, gossip; lasse, lest; meny, servants; myse, forgiveness; putyers, paramours; spille, to destroy; sourded, arose; unese, sorrow; yalde, gave; and numerous others. Nor are the significations given always correct. Leteres is translated "hinderers" in a passage in which it has a directly opposite signification; and chambrere is rendered "a wanton woman" in defiance of the fact that where once it is used in this sense, it is six times employed to mean servant or handmaiden, as when the Virgin and St. Elizabeth are repeatedly spoken of as the chambreres of God.

The shortcomings of the editor, however, do not affect the value of the text, which will be thoroughly enjoyed by any one who can relish the quaint simplicity of chivalric faith.

---

New Jersey and the Rebellion: a History of the Services of the Troops and People of New Jersey in Aid of the Union Cause. By John Y. Foster. Published by authority of the State. (Newark, N. J.: Martin R. Dennis & Co. 1868.)—This is a book of great bulk and moderate merit. It begins with a statement of the causes of the rebellion and of the relation of slavery to the war, then describes the condition of New Jersey as to military matters when the war broke out, and its unfitness for that new condition of things, then the means employed for raising troops and money and the use made of the first regiments sent forward, and then proceeds to give a history of the organization and experiences of all the bodies of troops raised for the war or any part of it in the State. The closing chapters of the book are devoted to Jerseymen in other than New Jersey organizations, the invasion of Pennsylvania in 1863 and the services rendered by Jerseymen at that time, the "Legislation of the War Period," the efforts of the people of the State in aid of the troops, the attitude of the Church, the distinguished general officers who represented the State, the number and efficiency of New Jersey chaplains and surgeons, and instances of gallantry in the military history of New Jersey soldiers.

Books of the class to which this volume belongs are sure of a certain local popularity, from their fulness of detail, and they may be so written and compiled as to be prized outside the limits of the State to which they peculiarly belong. If they are prepared in such a way as to inspire the reader with confidence in their trustworthiness, they are sought as valuable materials for history, and the more valuable because of their very voluminousness. But this book does not inspire implicit confidence. It reminds one of a poster often seen on blank walls, on which a trumpeter is seen blowing his trumpet with distended cheeks, and beneath a legend, "I blow for" some clothier or other tradesman. Mr. Foster "blows for" New Jersey. He says in his preface: "In whatever else the record may be defi cient, it certainly will be found to present conclusive evidences of the superiority of the troops who represented us in the field," and then follow some platitudes to the effect that the New Jersey volunteers were "in every combat girt about with memories of Princeton and Monmouth," etc. As for the first quotation, if Mr. Foster thinks superiority a synonym for excellence, as many imperfectly educated persons do, the statement is correct, but the body of his book shows that he means more than that, and claims for New Jersey troops superiority in the proper sense of the word. The facts do not support this claim. As for the second, if Mr. Foster believes his nonsense about Princeton and Monmouth, he does not know enough about the character of the Union volunteer to be his chronicler, but he probably doesn't. It would be well for him to lay to heart a certain caution given by Viscount Ipsden to his valet. "Saunders," said his lordship, "eloquence rather bores people."

Great credit is due to the State of New Jersey for the attitude she maintained during the rebellion. She did even better than could have been expected. The highest patriotism, as Northern men understand the term, was hardly to be looked for, in such a war, in a State, which had but recently become a free State, and which, moreover, was notoriously controlled, to an exceptional degree, by "railroad men." Yet she furnished some ten thousand men in excess of the number called for, and the quality of her troops was good. She also gave to the service several meritorious general officers and one brilliant soldier. Very few, if any, men have the requisite knowledge for pronouncing upon the comparative merits of troops from different States. There were great differences in the quality of regiments from the same State, and also in the same regiments at different times. Circumstances caused a constant and considerable fluctuation in the efficiency of the same organization. The character of the recruits sent forward had something to do with this, and the casualties among officers had more. In a country like ours it should be the aim of every writer to blunt the sharpness of State partialities, and a writer does a work of doubtful propriety when he claims superiority for the troops of his State, even when the facts support him. Mr. Foster does this, and the facts do not support him. A brief statement of the statistics of desertion and of battle mortality would show this conclusively, but we prefer not to be guilty of that which we have just noted as a fault in another. Passing from generals to particulars, we must say that we find the same tendency appearing all through the book. Undue credit is constantly claimed for New Jersey troops, sometimes positively, and sometimes with the addition of disparaging and untrue comparison between them and the troops of other States. The effect of the book is to diminish the readiness which the known merit of the New Jersey troops makes all who served with them ready to concede to them in liberal measure, to stimulate scrutiny and criticism, and to fill the mind of the reader with a feeling akin to doubt and distrust.

The best thing in the book is the abundance of reports of colonels and brigadiers which are printed in notes, and these give it a substantial value, and it is only fair to add that Mr. Foster has collected with commendable diligence a large amount of miscellaneous information in regard to the part played by New Jersey during the rebellion, and that much of it possesses a certain interest.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. | |
|---|---|---|
| Cammann (H. J.) and Camp (H. N.), The Charities of New York, Brooklyn, and Staten Island | (Hurd & Houghton) | $5 25 |
| Craven (Mme.), A Sister's Story | (Catholic Pub. Society) | 2 50 |
| Gray (J. C., jr.), Story's Commentaries on the Law of Partnership. | (Little, Brown & Co.) | |
| Harrison (W. B.), The Mechanic's Tool Book | (D. Van Nostrand) | |
| Harvey (Dr. P.), Footprints of Life, a Poem | (S. R. Wells) | |
| Hylton (Dr. J. D.), The Præsidicide, a Poem | (Philadelphia) | |
| Kingsbury (H.) and Graley (Rev. A. A.), Happy Hours, a Song-book. | (Taintor Bros.) | |
| Nellie Netterville, a Tale | (Catholic Pub. Society) | |
| Richardson (R.), Memoirs of Alexander Campbell, vol. i. | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | |
| Was it a Ghost? swd | (Loring) | 0 75 |

Fine Arts.

THE FINE ARTS OF JAPAN.

I.

THE Japanese are very little known to the people of the West, surprisingly little in comparison with the interest they excite. The old accounts are nearly all that we have to rely upon, and these are slight enough and a century and a half old. Since the American expedition of 1853 and the consequent partial opening of Japan to foreign intercourse, a number of travellers and officials have printed their experience in that country, but they have seen little and understood less; their record is generally not of the most important matters, and always vague and unmethodical; they seem to have been unskilled observers, and their opportunities were not large, so that we approach the study of the fine arts of Japan without much illustrative knowledge of those things which are the subjects of that art. The accounts we have of the Japanese Government and customs are very meagre, but are tolerably clear as far as they go. Our knowledge of Japanese history is confined to a few leading events, and even about these authorities differ as to dates and causes precedent. Of the religion, mythology, and legendary history of the people we know almost nothing; and the thousand superstitions and popular epics of adventure which enter into their pictorial art are to be guessed at, and no more. The topography of the islands, and the plants and animals they produce, we have some knowledge of, but not more than the pictorial accounts give us which the Japanese themselves furnish.

So it is with the most common subjects of art—as regards the practice of the arts themselves, both fine and industrial; we learn nothing from the travellers. Works of art and industry are brought to Europe and America—wood-cuts, carved ivories, lacquered boxes, and screens, embroideries, enamels, bronzes, painted china, woven fabrics, and utensils and ornaments of endless variety; what we can learn from these has not been taught to us, as yet. The Europeans and Americans who have visited Japan have done us good service by bringing away the beautiful things they have brought; but beyond getting together "curios," they have done nothing toward the elucidation of the dark questions in Japanese art,—as, indeed, was to have been expected.

The pure representative art of Japan can be critically estimated so far as concerns the delineation of objects, and so far as concerns the method of design employed, and the general power and delicacy shown in them; but criticism is checked by the impossibility of understanding, without knowledge of the language, all the countless subjects which this art tries to express. The applied or decorative art can be criticised only so far as we know the material employed, and the limitations attending its use; and this is a real hindrance to adequate criticism, for there are many handicrafts they practise which either are not known to the people of Europe, or are followed by them in a manner and with purposes so different from the Japanese that they take a different character. For instance, the lacquered work of Japan is unapproached in variety, durability, and finish by that of other nations, and no European artist has ever learned the way to make fine lacquer at all; so that France and England cannot even imitate the lacquers of Lahore. The East Indians have only two or three kinds of lacquer, and cannot produce work so perfect and highly finished as the Chinese. The Chinese are easily beaten by the Japanese of the present time, who themselves confess that the work of their grandfathers has a hopeless superiority. Of course the designs, whether representative of natural forms or merely decorative patterns, can be criticised independently of the material, but all criticism of ornamental work has to consider the difficulties and limitations of the material employed, and we instinctively overrate the delicacy and freedom of design executed in a medium so far beyond our powers or knowledge to meddle with. On the other hand, enamelling on metal is practised by our jewellers, and the processes employed by the mediæval enameller and by the Orientals are perfectly understood; but modern European work is in small pieces for jewelry, and has little in common with the freedom and variety of Japanese work, applied as it is on a large scale to vessels for use and for ornament.

Of Japanese art pure, that is, not applied as decoration to objects of utility, the most common form is the wood-cut. To speak very accurately, it is a sort of print in outline filled up with one or two tints or else with full color, resembling the impression from a wood block, and generally accepted as being so. This sort of picture, however produced, is to the Japanese what lithography and wood engraving, taken together, are to the Western people. By it are produced pictures in rich color used for wall hangings and screens, five or six feet high, with human figures half the size of life; smaller color-printed pictures of landscape, battle, domestic incident, mythology, and genre of the utmost variety; cheap books, in which letter-press and pictures are so mingled on one page as to suggest the idea that all has been printed together from one block; larger and better books, all pictures except for brief titles accompanying the scenes; still larger books, with a page about ten by fourteen inches, containing full-page illustrations of the same character as the color-printed pictures mentioned above, but more carefully printed; and other, very splendid books, in éditions de luxe, giving large birds and flowering plants, at nearly or quite life-size; the colors carefully studied from nature, and the texture of leaf or feather curiously suggested by a separate system of indented lines. Of these several kinds of Japanese wood-cut (to assume the correctness of that appellation) enormous numbers are known to collectors. What we shall say of them will be based upon an examination of over three thousand separate prints, and of these many contain several subjects each.

A standard kind of picture is about ten by fifteen inches, printed at one impression, but this print is often a third of a large composition, made up by gumming together the three sheets composing it, and forming a picture of convenient size, fifteen by thirty inches. These large three-fold prints are as varied in subject as the pictures on the walls of the Academy of Design; more varied, indeed, for the choice of subject is freer, less hampered by supposed artistic proprieties, more apt to fall upon the simplest incidents of life. One splendid one is an out-of-door scene, a composition containing seven figures, of which the one standing erect is ten inches high; a green bank slopes to the river, on the other side of which are the houses and temples of a considerable town. Two thorny trees are in full bloom, but without leaves, indicating spring-time, and under these trees are scattered our party of seven, six of them young women, and a man. They seem to have some work to do, or perhaps it is only play-work, for three of the girls have crowned themselves with flowers, not of the thorn-trees. Large baskets are being filled with some unknown small plant, which grows among the grass. A low table or platform is set out, and upon it are the materials for a meal. A young woman, kneeling beside these upon the table, is pouring tea for the gentleman of the party, into the white and blue cups which he holds. The dresses are very gorgeous; the table-top painted with a rich pattern; the boxes upon it decorated with black and gold lacquer.

Further to describe this picture,—and, with it, a whole class of pictures—it is without shadow. The colors are printed in delicate gradation, in some way not easy to understand, but this is for decorative effect, or because the dresses were of stuffs so woven. The figures and trees in the foreground—the river and town beyond, take their places in the landscape by force of perspective, as they would in a European picture. There is nothing forced or conventional, and nothing archaic in the general distribution; the general truth of line is entirely satisfactory. The folds of drapery and the irregularities of the grassy bank are drawn in firm black lines, and some idea of expressing form, by shade, is given in the slope of ground and in the tree-branches; but of cast shadow there is not a hint. And here let us say, that we have never seen a suggestion of shadow in any Japanese work of art, and that curious instances may be given of its absence where it would seem easier and more natural to have given it, even according to Japanese canons of art. Another point worthy of notice in our picnic scene is, that the sky is kept nearly white, faintly tinted with blue, and this doubtless to give it brilliancy and distance, while the colors of it are indicated by rapid gradation into deep blue at the extreme top of the picture, and into a deep pink at the horizon. Narrow labels, from an inch to three inches long, and set upright, give titles or illustrative text. There are eight of these, and three circular stamps like seals, which they probably are.

NOW READY.

THE ECLECTIC

FOR JULY

BEGINS A NEW VOLUME.

EMBELLISHMENT,

"THE BLACK BRUNSWICKER."

I. WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—London Review.
II. POPULAR EXPOSITION OF SCIENCE.—London Eclectic.
III. THE SCIENCE OF WAR.—Dublin University.
IV. THE HOLY LAND.—Dublin University.
V. ST. GEORGE AND THE DRAGON.—Bentley's Miscellany.
VI. M. ROUHER, MINISTER OF FRANCE.—Leisure Hour.
VII. SINGULAR FULFILMENT OF A PREDICTION.—Popular Journal.
VIII. THE EDUCATION OF WOMEN.—Macmillan's Magazine.
XI. IMPOSTURE AND CREDULITY.—Dublin University.
X. IDEAL WOMEN.—Saturday Review.
XI. VENTILATION AND VENTILATORS.—Popular Science Review.
XII. SPRING DAYS.—Leisure Hour.
XIII. AMERICAN LETTERS FROM EUROPE.—Saturday Review.
XIV. THE NIGHT-WANDERER OF AN AFGHAUN FORT.—Blackwood's Magazine.
XV. A NIGHT IN THE TOMBS.—Chambers's Journal.
XVI. THE BLOCKADE: AN EPISODE OF THE END OF THE EMPIRE (concluded).—Translated from the French for the Eclectic.
XVII. WRITING-MACHINE FOR THE BLIND.—Chambers's Journal.
XVIII. POETRY.
XIX. NOTES ON BOOKS.
XX. SCIENCE.
XXI. VARIETIES.

TERMS OF THE ECLECTIC:

Single copies, 45 cents; one copy, one year, $5; two copies, one year, $9; five copies, one year, $20.
Address

E. R. PELTON, Publisher,
108 Fulton Street, New York.

REMOVAL.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1868.

ALLEN EBBS,

IMPORTER OF

FINE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Has removed from 183 Broadway to

76 CHAMBERS STREET,

One door west of Broadway.

A. E. has lately received from London a most elegant collection of fine Books.

AMERICAN LAW REVIEW,

VOL. II., NO. 4.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO., Boston,

PUBLISH JULY 1,

THE

AMERICAN LAW REVIEW,

VOL. II., NO. 4.

CONTENTS:

I. Navigable Rivers.
II. A Code of Private International Law.
III. The Liability of Telegraph Companies.
IV. Law of Sales.—Warranty and Fraud.
V. The Customs Revenue System.
VI. Digest of the English Law Reports for February, March, and April, 1868.
VII. Selected Digest of State Reports.
VIII. Book Notices.
IX. List of New Law Books Published in England and America since April 1, 1868.
X. Summary of Events.

This number closes Vol. II., which will be ready, bound in law sheep, on the 10th inst. Vols. I. and II., bound, sent post-paid by mail for six dollars each.

Subscription to the REVIEW, $5 per annum, payable in advance; single numbers, $1 25.

PUBLISHED JULY 1, NEW EDITION OF

BISHOP ON CRIMINAL LAW.

COMMENTARIES ON THE CRIMINAL LAW. By JOEL PRENTISS BISHOP. Fourth edition. 2 vols. 8vo, $15.

PUBLISHED JUNE 25, NEW EDITION OF

STORY ON PARTNERSHIP.

COMMENTARIES ON THE LAW OF PARTNERSHIP, as a Branch of Commercial and Maritime Jurisprudence, with Occasional Illustrations from the Civil and Foreign Law. By JOSEPH STORY, LL.D. Sixth edition. Edited by JOHN C. GRAY, JR., of the Boston Bar. 8vo, $7 50.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK,

Have received the first four numbers of a new Musical Magazine, entitled

EXETER HALL.

A Monthly Magazine of Sacred Music, Vocal and Instrumental, especially adapted for Sunday evening in the family circle. The list of contributors includes many of the foremost living authors and composers of Devotional Music, whose works hitherto have not been popularly accessible. Each number contains a beautiful illustration, in lithograph.

Single numbers, 50 cents; single subscriptions, $6 a year. Extra terms offered to clubs.

NEW BOOKS.

THE CHRIST OF HISTORY. By JOHN YOUNG, LL.D. Fifth edition, revised. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

"WIND WAFTED SEED." Edited by NORMAN MACLEOD and THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

STUDIES OF CHARACTER FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 50.

"GOOD NEWS"

FOR

JULY, 1868.

CONTENTS:

GOOD NEWS.
HEEDLESSNESS.
AMERICAN CHURCH.
BELIEF.
JEAN INGELOW.
MY FIELD.
YOUNG MEN.
GREAT, STRONG, AND FREE.
NEW YORK: ITS SOCIAL AND SANITARY CONDITION.
WOMAN'S RIGHTS.
ITALIAN ART.
MY LIFE. By a Retired Clergyman.
NOTES AND COMMENTS.
BOOK NOTICES.

"GOOD NEWS."

A scholarly Christian Monthly for popular reading has long been a desideratum in this country. "GOOD NEWS" will endeavor to supply the need.

64 pages double column. Subscription, $2 50 per year; single numbers, 25 cents.

P. S. WYNKOOP & SON,
Booksellers and Publishers,
108 Fulton St., New York.

COMMENCING VOL. II

THE JULY NUMBER

OF

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE

OF

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND EDUCATION.

CONTENTS:

1. DALLAS GALBRAITH. Part VII
2. REBECCA.
3. MISS JUDE'S REVENGE.
4. THE CHINESE IN CALIFORNIA.
5. A LITERARY HOSPITAL.
6. THE LEGEND OF BALL'S LAKE.
7. ON EXPRESSION IN PAINTING.
8. TO A BOOK-WORM.
9. A PILGRIMAGE TO THE GRAVE OF HUMBOLDT.
10. MAPPING OF THE MOON.
11. MADE WHOLE.
12. DROWNED.
13. NO MORE METAPHYSICS.
14. ENGLISH SOCIETY IN PARIS.
15. LADY HOUGHTON'S MISTAKE.
16. OLD LETTERS.
17. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
18. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

Yearly subscription, $4; single number, 35 cents.

Specimen numbers sent to any address on receipt of thirty-five cents by the publishers.

NOW READY:

Volume I. of Lippincott's Magazine.

Containing a Serial Novel; numerous entertaining Tales and Sketches; Papers on Finance, Science, and Education; Poetry; Miscellanies; Reviews, etc., etc. By Eminent Writers. Large 8vo, 680 pages. Printed on toned paper, fine cloth, $2 50.

N.B.—Cloth cases furnished separately for binding volumes. Price 50 cents. Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

---

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT
451 Broome Street, N. Y.

---

MECHANICS' TOOL BOOK,

WITH

PRACTICAL RULES AND SUGGESTIONS,

FOR USE OF

MACHINISTS, IRON-WORKERS, AND OTHERS.

BY W. B. HARRISON,

ASSOCIATE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN ARTISAN.

ILLUSTRATED WITH 44 ENGRAVINGS.

12mo, cloth, $2 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 BROADWAY.

 Copies sent free by mail.

---

Booksellers and Bookbuyers, Librarians and Teachers, Lawyers and Doctors,

ARE REQUESTED TO SEND FOR THE

PUBLISHERS' TRADE LIST DIRECTORY, NOW READY.

It embraces all the WORKS, old and new, published by over two hundred houses, classified and arranged so their specialty can be determined, and correspondence with the houses named will give the enquirer all the information desired. All the best theological and religious books, literary, scientific, law, and medical works, can be found in its pages. Fiction and belles-lettres, from Dime Novels to the higher order of light literature, are represented. It is indispensable for

BOOKSELLERS,
LIBRARIANS, and
BOOKBUYERS,

in making up orders or desiring to learn the prices of books.

Price, $5 cloth, or $3 in paper.

HOWARD CHALLEN, Publisher,
PHILADELPHIA.

---

G. P. PHILES & CO.,

172 FULTON STREET (opposite St. Paul's Church),

IMPORTERS OF

RARE AND VALUABLE BOOKS,

Are now receiving choice Stock selected by Mr. Philes in Europe. Catalogues issued and sent to any address.

---

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

---

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. Cloth, price $1 50.

CATSKILL MOUNTAINS,

And the Region around; their Scenery, Legends, and History. By Rev. CHARLES ROCKWELL. Cloth, price $2.

The above books mailed free on receipt of price.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, New York.

---

TO HOUSEKEEPERS!!

PYLE'S SALERATUS,

CREAM TARTAR,

AND

O. K. SOAP

Are acknowledged the most efficient and economical household articles of American production. Each article in its use will speak for itself. But our claims are supported by the most intelligent classes throughout New England and the Middle States. Among the tens of thousands of our patrons are some of the most distinguished personages of the age, a few of whose names are as follows:

Hon. Schuyler Colfax.
Hon. Cyrus W. Field.
Hon. Horace Greeley.
Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, D.D.
Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D.D.
Rev. Thomas Armitage, D.D.
P. T. Barnum, Esq.
Editors of the Independent.
Editors of the Evangelist.
Editors of the Christian Advocate.
Editors of the Evening Post.
Editors of the Journal of Commerce.

And hundreds too numerous to mention.

All first-class Grocers keep them.

JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer,
350 Washington Street,
Corner Franklin Street.

---

"AMER. SCHOOL INST.,"

Founded 1855,
Is a reliable Educational Bureau,
To aid all who seek well-qualified Teachers;
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange school properties.

Thirteen years' trial has proved the AMER. SCHOOL INST a useful and efficient auxiliary in securing

"The Right Teacher for the Right Place."

Those who want Teachers should have the "Teachers' Bulletin," published in the AMER. EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY.

Those who want positions should have the "Application Form."

Circulars explaining plan, and giving Testimony from first-class educational and business men, sent when asked for.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,
14 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.

Branch Offices in San Francisco, Chicago, and Boston.

---

REPUBLICAN

CAMPAIGN ENVELOPES FOR 1868.

Unique, Handsome, Significant, True, Ornamental, Useful, and Historical.

ON THE FRONT—The names of the distinguished candidates, with the latest heart sentiment of each. ON THE REVERSE—A Complete Synopsis of the Republican Platform.

The Political campaign of 1868 is destined to be the most memorable of any since the foundation of the Republic. There can be no more expressive souvenir of the Republican aspect of it than these envelopes.

Every Citizen should have a few, at least, to keep for posterity. Copyright secured. Republicans will, of course, use and circulate them extensively as possible.

100 sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.
500 " " " " " " 4.
1,000 " " " " " " 7.
5,000 sent by express, at $5 per 1,000.
10,000 or more, sent by express, at $4 per 1,000.

WM. P. LYON & SON,
Envelope Manufacturers,
537 Pearl Street, New York.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 158. THURSDAY, JULY 9, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 21
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Traitors in the Camp ..... 24
The Real Obstacle to Loans at Low Interest ..... 25
The Latest Phase of the Rights of Neutrals ..... 26
Russian Newspapers and Magazines .... 27
The New Process of Mummification .... 29
CORRESPONDENCE:
Mr. Waring's Elements of Agriculture ..... 30
The Church Militant ..... 30
The Agricultural Prospect ..... 31
Horses and Bonds ..... 31
NOTES:
Literary ..... 31
The Earthly Paradise ..... 33
Bigelow's Franklin ..... 34
Arkism ..... 35
CURRENT LITERATURE:
Words from the Poets.—The Book of Evergreens ..... 37
Books of the Week ..... 37

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

FOR the last week the Democracy has fairly overrun the city, which it seems to be enjoying with extreme relish despite the great heat. Whatever the delegates may think of it, the heat is not, from the point of view of the spectator, to be regretted. It has added very much to the picturesqueness of our visitors, not having been great enough to induce hair-cutting on their part, and yet having caused a pretty general discarding of "the vest"—a garment perhaps as much steeped in conventionalism and the mere proprieties as almost any of man's integuments this side of his skin. The absence of it brings out in great prominence that "unterrified" quality of the Democracy on which the true Democrat prides himself as much, we suppose, as on the honesty, consistency, and so on of the party. But, so far as we have information at the present time of writing, the party might fairly be exhibiting some signs of amenability to the influence of terror—indeed, it may be only in outward show that it is so overflowing with almost vainglorious courage. The differences between the various cliques in regard to men and lines of policy seem to be all but irreconcilable, and a tremendous amount of hard work has been done by the leaders in the hope of bringing about a tolerable "campaign" show of unity. The Pendleton men have from the beginning been the chief obstacle, being very strong, yet not quite strong enough, in the Convention; being very decided as to what they want; and wanting something that a large section of the party hate either on principle or as being fatal to the chance of success in November. The Pendleton men have made more noise than all others put together. It is a wonder that they did not fall more than they seem to have done in the opinion of the other delegates—or, at any rate, in popular estimation—when the singular-looking, small squad of people, which had been heralded as the "Pendleton Escort" that was to look after the interests of "Ohio's Favorite Son," appeared on the streets—a woful keeping of the grand promises that Mr. Pendleton's journals have been making to us, and which had led us to expect a multitudinous and fierce host, capable of overawing even the Democracy of this metropolis. The three hundred and fifty braves who really put in an appearance would not, we should imagine, exert "a great popular pressure" on a political vacuum. We may safely remit our readers to the daily papers for reports of the speeches—none of which has been good, though Mr. Belmont's was artful—for lists of the names of the officers and drafters of resolutions and committees on credentials. The South seems to furnish most of the names that are very well known to the people at large. Wade Hampton, B. F. Perry, C. C. Langdon, and their friends—who, by the way, are behaving quietly, as, all things considered, becomes them—are better known than Mr. Sanford Church and Mr. H. C. Murphy and the Northern Democrats who have been serving the country in the State Legislatures. As we go to press, we share the inability of the Convention to name its candidates. The ballotings of Tuesday, under the two-thirds rule, left Pendleton in the advance, but a good way behind the requisite number of votes, and with no rapid or considerable gains to encourage his friends to hope for a panic and a stampede in his favor.

---

The platform of the Democratic party is nearly as good as the Republicans could have desired. It gives up slavery and secession, though this cannot be called anything very remarkable, considered as a concession. It demands the immediate restoration of the Southern States, which is not a very dreadful requirement, as they are all in but three, and these are coming. It calls for the payment of the United States bonds in lawful money of the United States, and for the taxation of the interest, as if it were not already taxed; or, in other words, advocates repudiation in the meanest of ways. In relation to the tariff, the only thing remarkable in the platform is that it calls for "incidental protection," which is an open abandonment of the old Democratic position. The eighth resolution is entirely given up to abuse of the Republicans, and ends in affirming the right of the several States to regulate the suffrage, as the Republican platform has done. The only striking feature of the whole is the denunciation of the Reconstruction acts as "unconstitutional and void." It would, altogether, have been difficult for the party to take up a position more satisfactory to the Republicans. There is nothing left whatever, not a vestige even, of the old Democratic party in the platform. It has not only declared once more against the war and its consequences, but has laid aside all the old party principles. The only new principle it produces to take their place is, the right and duty of the nation to cheat its creditors. If a party can now be founded on this, or can escape defeat on this, it will certainly be a comical as well as tragical termination to the great struggle for the Union.

---

The Committee of Ways and Means, and the sober Republicans who follow their lead rather than that of those two "good old Democrats," Mr. Logan and Mr. Butler, have taken away the shame brought upon the party by the late proposal to tax the interest of the bonds. The Committee, in reporting the bill which they were ordered to prepare, accompanied it by a protest which we warrant will make more of the votes that Mr. Butler is anxious for than the bill or Mr. Butler's repudiation speeches. On Wednesday week Mr. Edmunds introduced a resolution to this effect: that the votes for President of the Southern States shall not be counted by the Electoral College unless each State shall have made a constitution and organized under it a State government which shall be in operation at the time of the election, and shall have regularly chosen electors, and its representatives and senators shall have been admitted to Congress. This resolution Mr. Trumbull opposed. Arkansas and Florida, he declared, were as much in the Union as Massachusetts or New Jersey, and Congress had no right to interfere in regard to the Presidential election in those States. Mr. Trumbull's general ground of objection was that the resolution was intended to reopen a settled matter and give to Congress revisory power to count the electoral vote or not. Mr. Edmunds afterwards withdrew his resolution. In the House, on the same day, there was a debate on the Alaska purchase, and more hostility than had been generally looked for became apparent. The duty of the House to pay is, we fear, undeniable, unfortunate as it may be that Mr. Seward and the Senate have laid that duty upon it. Mr. Stevens, on Thursday, introduced a bill for the division of Texas into two States—a measure which he might as well have allowed to wait till a more convenient season. On Monday, three of the North Carolina representatives presented themselves, and were sworn in. Mr. Jenckes, whose Civil Service Bill has been discussed a great deal outside the House, and very little inside it, will call it up as soon as the Appropriation Bill has been passed. We believe Mr. Woodbridge, of Vermont, is the only representative who has made a set speech against it—a most remarkable speech it was too—and one might fancy there could be no doubt about its passage; but there is little hope of its passage. We suggest the time of the final vote upon the bill as a very fit period for the constituents to "watch vigilantly" the course of their representatives. On Tuesday, Mr. Stevens introduced several additional articles of impeachment against the President, and his colleague, Mr. Williams, gave notice of his intention to do likewise in a few days.

---

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means in obedience to the Cobb resolution, was exactly what the case needed. They obeyed the order of the House, but so drew the required bill as to put the real nature of the transaction aimed at before the House and the country, and appended to it a hearty expression of their own disgust with the business. There is, of course, no chance that any such measure will be passed; but this fact, which was patent from the beginning, only makes the conduct of the sixty-one Republicans mysterious. The most probable of the motives attributed to them is a desire to get the better of the Democrats at the West by showing a little leaning to one of the prominent Democratic doctrines; but then they might have accomplished this result at less cost by passing a resolution denouncing military government at the South and abusing the negroes. This would greatly disconcert the Democrats and seriously damage the Republican party, but it would not injure the public credit as this last performance has done. In other words, it would be fully as foolish, but less mischievous.

---

Mr. Butler has brought in his report on senatorial corruption. To treat an investigation into the motives of the judges who tried a cause, conducted in secret by one of the defeated counsel, as in any sense of the word a judicial investigation, would be an offence against sound principles of jurisprudence as well as against good morals of which we shall not be guilty. That Mr. Butler should, in this instance, have been furnished by the House with parliamentary power to send for persons and papers was as great a scandal as can be found in parliamentary annals, and the result of his labors is, of course, simply a specimen of his own powers in working up a case against people who have greatly annoyed and disappointed him. It has been received by the press with decent contempt or silence. It does not contain a particle of proof against any senator; but, of course, it bristles with insinuations. Other comment it does not deserve; but to one passage in it we cannot avoid calling attention, as an illustration both of the Butler mode of working and of the depth of the disgrace the House has brought on itself and on the party in letting him have his way—we mean that in which he treats the failure of the witnesses to mention any of the seven senators as having been subjects of discussion amongst the corrupters, as proof that these gentlemen were considered as certainly corruptible. We ought long ago to have spoken of the creditable way in which Messrs. Boutwell, Wilson, and Bingham have acted in abstaining from all participation in this discreditable farce. Mr. Boutwell went home to Massachusetts, and proved himself a gentleman and a man of sense by telling his constituents that the trial was fair, that he did not agree with the verdict, but that there was the end of the affair.

---

If Shook and Woolley want employment, we cannot suggest better work to them than intriguing with certain Republicans to get them to join the Democratic party. If Woolley would go on to Washington, and engage in this species of corruption, we think he would meet with a good deal of support from better men than he is used to, and would find funds in abundance. In fact, the Republican Committee could not make a better use of some of its money than to place it at Woolley's disposal for this purpose, and if he should engage in attempts on Mr. Butler's virtue, for instance, we think the process would be one of the most amusing and most interesting ever witnessed. But we warn both him and Shook that, with a fish of this description at the end of their line, it would not do to carouse over-night and pass the next day in unconsciousness. They would have need of all their faculties, but, if they succeeded, they would render more service to their country than we fear they are ever likely to render in any other way.

---

The reply of Mr. Fessenden to the invitation he recently received to a public dinner in Boston contains an admirable exposure of the nature of the influences which raised the outcry against him, but it leaves one passage in the history of impeachment as dark as ever. How was it that the great mass of the public in and out of Congress were so completely deceived, and remained so long under the deception, touching the effect of the Tenure-of-Office Act? As Mr. Fessenden says, all the offences charged against the President in the articles, except his violation of this act, had been thoroughly canvassed by the House with a view to impeachment, and pronounced insufficient to sustain a prosecution long before the late trial was thought of. When he removed Mr. Stanton, however, the impression became general—we shared it ourselves—that at last he was within the meshes of the law; but it now seems that the main body of the senators knew all along that this removal had not caught him, and that something else was necessary to bring him to grief. The senators were not alone in this opinion. Thaddeus Stevens said that all the articles were worthless except the eleventh, and this eleventh was certainly hard to swallow, for it alleged the removal of Stanton in 1868 was effected in pursuance of threats and denunciations uttered in a half-drunken speech in 1866. How was it that the public remained in this fog so long?

---

Mr. Fessenden touches on one point to which we called attention ourselves at the close of the trial, and which was in our opinion the most remarkable incident connected with it—that those who imputed corrupt motives to any Republican senator who voted for acquittal always allowed that any senator might clear himself of the suspicion by voting guilty on any one charge. The proof of purity was in finding a verdict of guilty, it made no difference for what reason. For instance, if all the Republican senators had agreed to acquit on all articles but the eleventh, Mr. Fessenden might have said not guilty on this one, if he could have said guilty on, say, the second, without laying himself open to any imputation. But if he refused to say guilty on the eleventh, and at the same time failed to select some other article on which he would say guilty, it showed him to be a corrupt perjurer. Nothing could illustrate better than this little circumstance either the knavery or the stupidity of those who were most active in getting up the crusade against the seven senators. We do not remember a case in history in which a clumsier attempt was made to prostitute the forms of law in the service of party passions. We were in favor of having Mr. Johnson found guilty; we were prepared to see him found guilty, and, as we have said, shared the popular impression that he was guilty, but his conviction by such influences as were brought to bear on the trial would have been a great national misfortune. If the devil himself were on trial, and it was found that the prosecutor was using his own weapons against him, the place of good and wise men would be on the devil's side. The devil is nothing in such a case, the maintenance of the principles against which he wars is everything.

---

One other point Mr. Fessenden has not cleared up, and that is the fact that "his own brother" differed from him in opinion on Mr. Johnson's guilt. There was so much said about this during the sitting of the convention at Chicago, and it has been so often referred to by some of the "whole-souled" newspapers, that we presume it must be an important circumstance. Has Mr. Fessenden nothing to say about it? How is it that his brother was able to pronounce Mr. Johnson guilty without having heard the case, when William Pitt Fessenden, after having fully studied it, acquitted Mr. Johnson? Of course, this does not prove William Pitt Fessenden to be a base man, but it certainly seems to raise most harrowing doubts about him in many ingenuous minds. Thousands are asking themselves with sorrowing hearts, "Can a man be pure whose blood relations differ from him on points of law?" Will Mr. Fessenden not speak and explain? Perhaps the brother is only a half-brother after all; perhaps he was simply adopted by Mr. Fessenden's parents, and is not connected with him by blood; or perhaps there is another brother or an uncle who thought Mr. Johnson not guilty, and thus can be used as a set-off. As friends of justice, we ask the public to suspend their judgment on this grave matter till Mr. Fessenden is relieved from his Congressional labors and reaches his home. We ourselves feel sure that he will offer a satisfactory explanation.

---

The Catholic archbishops have issued an official manifesto, declaring that the proposal to raise a battalion for the Pope in this country did not originate with them, and has been persistently urged upon the military authorities at Rome by "some party or parties who have assumed to represent them, not only without their sanction or authority, but without their knowledge." They add, moreover, with great cruelty, that the "gentleman who has succeeded in securing for himself the command of the battalion does not enjoy, and is not entitled to their confidence," and that "the Catholic papers which have given place to his ill-advised correspondence are not to be recognized as reliable exponents of Catholic views or sentiments, still less as discreet or commendable advocates of the Catholic cause." This is very hard on the military gentleman and on the journalists; but very creditable to the archbishops. They add that money is what the Pope most needs, and not men. If this be true, why not disband the army, and use the funds which now go to feed and pay the lazy scamps who compose it in missionary labors? Here are heathen, as any one of the archbishops will tell us, going to destruction in enormous numbers every day, for want of instruction, and the money that would send out missionaries to them is put into "Zouaves," who are certainly neither a credit to the Church nor the world.

---

The Austrian Reichsrath has forced the ministry into taxing the coupons of the Government bonds—in some cases 20, in others 16 per cent. The loans are largely held in England, and a large body of the London bankers have consequently protested, through the Foreign Office. Baron von Beust has replied in a calm, conciliatory despatch, in which he makes no attempt to disguise the real nature of the transaction. He simply says that, considering what the condition of the Austrian Empire has been during the last twenty years, the holders of its securities must have been prepared for some such result as this sooner or later, and that the high rate of interest they have been receiving was in reality a sort of insurance against disaster; that the Dutch creditors of the Government so considered it, and put aside all they received over five per cent. as clear gain; that the question which presented itself for solution in 1866, when he came into power, was not whether the public liabilities should be punctually met, but whether the empire could be saved from total destruction; that it was hoped at first that Hungary would have assumed, on the separation of interests, what Austrian financiers considered her legitimate share of the debt; but that she had refused to do so. It was then proposed simply to mulct the creditors in the amount—12,000,000 florins—which Hungary refused to assume; but this, it was found, would hardly give any relief. In order to keep the machinery of government in motion at all, it was felt to be necessary to bring the debt within limits with which the treasury could deal without danger to the whole amount. The creditors generally seem to feel they have gained in security by this composition, and the bonds have slightly risen in the market.

---

This is, it is to be hoped, the last of the long series of Austrian humiliations. The Emperor has, considering his education, which was priest-given and outrageously bad—so bad, that it is only recently, for instance, that he has become acquainted with the history of the English Stuarts—shown a good deal of good sense under his misfortunes. His selection of Baron von Beust, a foreigner and a Protestant, as Prime Minister, after the battle of Sadowa, to extricate the empire from its difficulties and the Government from the hands of the priests and the nobility, proved uncommon force of character. But he must, nevertheless, suffer still in ways which, to the modern man, are now almost unknown. He signed the bill abrogating the Concordat; but sent in anguish to the Pope, immediately afterwards, to ask for pardon, on the plea of overwhelming necessity. The Pope, like a practical man, as he is, granted the desired pardon, but holds the Concordat to be as good and as binding as ever.

---

The Italians have followed the Austrian example in endeavoring to throw a portion of their financial burden on the public creditors. The majority in the Parliament have forced Count Cambray-Digny to tax all Government coupons 10 per cent., those in the hands of foreigners as well as those in the hands of natives. Count Cambray-Digny in vain pointed out that there would be, at the close of the present year, a deficit of $126,000,000, and that to meet this something beside taxation would be necessary, and that, no matter what expedient they resorted to, general reliance in the good faith of the Government and people would be necessary to success; that, therefore, anything which looked like a breach of faith would be an act of folly. He added that there was no use in maintaining that taxing coupons held by foreigners was not a violation either of "the letter or spirit" of the public contract. He said that there was no doubt that when the foreigners lent the money—and foreigners have lent most of what Italy owes—they never anticipated a reduction of 10 per cent. in the amount of their interest to meet the necessities of their debtor, and no such thing was, by anybody, supposed either probable or possible. The only answer to this is, that if foreigners were exempted, native holders of Government obligations would escape taxation by fraudulent transfers; but even if they did, there are so few of them, the loss would be very small. As it is, the gain from taxing the foreigners will be but small after all; in comparison with the deficit, it may be said to be next to nothing. Most of Italy's creditors have been so alarmed of late, however, by the state of things, that they will probably not grumble much over a reduction of the interest, which may be only temporary, if it can be shown them that it will, even in a small degree, increase the security of their capital.

---

There is, however, both in the Austrian and Italian financial breakdown something respectable. The politicians of neither country attempt to deceive people as to the nature of their course. They acknowledge that what they are doing would be a disgraceful thing if there were any way of avoiding it. They do not attempt to excuse it by any other plea than overwhelming necessity. They have not the ineffable impudence to come before the world, as our repudiators do, to quibble about "the letter of the law," and in the same breath announce their unwillingness to pay, boast of the wealth and resources of the country, and invite the entire human family to come over and share their prosperity with them. Nor do they propose to "pay" their debts in promissory notes of their own making. Moreover, all the Italians do is to subject the interest on government bonds to the same tax which is imposed on all other kinds of property; they do not clamor, as our repudiators do, for an additional tax over and above this, or talk as if there were some occult quality in government interest which made it a proper subject for double burdens.

---

In France the financial question is still the great question of the day. M. Victor Bonnet, one of the ablest French writers on financial questions, has been discussing Baron Haussmann's "beautifying" expenditure with terrible clearness. His conclusion is that the Baron has been the cause of an outlay in Paris, inside of fifteen years, of $1,400,000,000, of which $40,000,000 are merely for property destroyed. He shows, moreover, that he has not only brought an army of 80,000 mechanics and laborers to the capital, but a vast body of other persons, who are indirectly dependent for their support on the continuance of this expenditure, and whom a stoppage of the works would plunge in misery, and who, in all probability, could not now be induced to go back to the country, and whom the Government has therefore on its hands as a veritable plebs. He points out, also, that national decline has always followed "the concentration of the whole life of a people on the embellishment of their capital," and that such embellishment should always be slow, gradual, and natural, in order to be safe.

TRAITORS IN THE CAMP.

If anybody will consult the newspaper files of the summer and fall of 1865, he will find that for six months at least before the meeting of Congress many of the Radical chiefs were in a state of great anxiety lest the Southern representatives should get back into their places before conditions had been imposed on them. At that time negro suffrage had not begun to be advocated, or, at least, was only advocated by very few on grounds of right or justice. Even Wendell Phillips relied largely on the expediency of the thing, and one of the great reasons why negro suffrage was pronounced to be expedient, was that the negro vote would be needed to help the Republican party to defend the public credit from the assaults which the Southerners were expected to make upon it. Senator Sumner, we remember, quoted with horror a passage from one of the letters of our correspondent, who was then travelling in the South, in which he reported an interview with a young man—we believe in Virginia—in which the young man said he was willing to acknowledge himself whipped; but that if anybody supposed he was going to help to pay the cost of whipping him, that person was—we veil his language under a paraphrase—in a very remarkable degree mistaken. We accordingly all set to work to get the negroes enfranchised—our motives, of course, being mixed. Some were affected most powerfully by one consideration and some by another; but we presume there has hardly been any advocate of the Congressional plan of reconstruction who was not affected powerfully by the hope that negro suffrage would strengthen the Republican party sufficiently to enable it to fulfil the national obligations to the persons whom the party had induced to lend money to carry on the war.

The negroes have been enfranchised, and the South is nearly back into the Union. The process of reconstruction has lasted long, and caused much irritation, and given rise to much discussion. The Southerners have certainly not kept very quiet, and adversity has apparently deprived them of none of their old frankness. We believe we know pretty well from their own acts and declarations what it is that is uppermost in their minds, and yet, as far as our observation has gone, nothing worthy of note has come from any Southern source indicating that a desire to evade or prevent the punctual payment of the national debt is prevalent amongst the Secessionists, or, at all events, influences their political action or forms part of their political programme. They are troubled about many things, but apparently the best means of cheating the public creditor is not one of the things which seriously occupies them.

Yet the public credit is generally admitted to be suffering more or less damage. The Republican party has done all it can to uphold it, by formally denouncing all attacks on it as a "crime," and making its defence a part of the party platform, but somebody is attacking it, and damaging it, too. It is not the Southerners. They say nothing about it. It is not the negroes. As far as they have spoken their minds about it at all, they have given every reason to believe that it, at least, has nothing to fear from them. It is not the Democrats. It is true, a large portion of the Democrats are in favor of repudiation in a disguised form, and just now are putting this idea in the forefront of their battle, and abuse the "rascally bondholders" a good deal. But then this is, after all, rather harmless work, for two reasons: one is, that the Democrats are not in power; the other is, that they are not likely to be. What Pendleton says on this subject is not much heeded in the money markets of the world, because Pendleton is well known to be a private gentleman, and to be likely to remain so. Nor are the utterances of the Democrats in Congress of much consequence, because they are a very insignificant minority.

Who is it, then, that is filling the world with alarm about the national good faith, and disgusting and disheartening everybody who looks to the United States for the display not simply of greater material prosperity, but of a higher moral tone than older nations? Why, a knot of arch-radicals—men who have been the chief supporters of negro suffrage, who have had more than most men to do with "putting the war through," and getting people to advance money to carry it on—none of your weak-kneed, weak-backed, milk-and-water brethren, but regular "whole-souled, reliable statesmen," "educated up" to the highest attainable point of ardor and enthusiasm—"friends of mankind," too, whose performances, could he behold them, would kill Anacharsis Clootz with envy. There is Mr. Benjamin F. Butler at the head of them; there is—we were going to print a list of the names of his followers—but our daily contemporaries have done it much more effectively than we could do it. Suffice it to say, that amongst the names of those who voted with him last week to cheat the public creditor of the tenth part of his interest, will be found those of few men whose "soundness" has ever been doubtful, or who have ever allowed themselves to lag in the rear when any "leaping ahead" was to be done. Having exhausted nearly every extreme except the extreme of dishonesty, they have fallen back on repudiation. The impracticable and unreasonable they have begun to find intolerably stupid and monotonous, so they are now trying the knavish in search of a new sensation.

Moreover, there was an argument in very common use during the war, which Bentham in his "Book of Fallacies" calls the noscitur a sociis fallacy, and which consists in alleging that what you say cannot be sound, because certain persons known to be bad agree with you in it. This played a very prominent part in the argumentation of the New York Tribune, and of all that peculiar school of logicians of which it is the head, and has been constantly used by them to refute the plainest and most sensible opinions upon the questions of the day. There is no fallacy by which the voice of reason is so often drowned, for it has the great recommendation of being within the reach of the meanest capacity. It is one of the first weapons which your thoroughbred blatherskite clutches when he finds himself hard pressed. During the last three years—though we are glad to see it is rapidly losing its effect—it has been constantly employed to frighten timid or sensitive men into acquiescence in all sorts of follies. Under it, any Copperhead or Democrat has only to concur in your opinions, or to take up a position beside you, in order to cover you with confusion and destroy all confidence in you. For instance, when we were arguing against the return of P. T. Barnum to Congress, we were informed that none of the reasons we gave for desiring his defeat were worth attention, inasmuch as they gave satisfaction to the Copperheads of the Fourth Connecticut District.

This being the accepted orthodox logic, however, we hardly expected to see prominent Republicans ranging themselves with Copperheads in the House of Representatives in assaults on the public credit, and yet that is the spectacle we now witness. It is, to say the least, singular that in the various attacks Mr. Butler and his followers have been making on the Tax Bill, he has had the hearty co-operation of the Democrats; but what is more singular is, that the same persons who did not think there was time for Mr. Schenck's Tax Bill to pass, also think that the interest on the national bonds should be taxed ten per cent. What is most singular is, however, that such a doctor in the law as Mr. Butler should now make light of the great noscitur a sociis argument as a foolish argument which has no weight, and impudently persevere in his evil courses. We trust that some of the "organs" which admire this gentleman, and consider him a pillar of the Church, will take note of his heresies, and put in force whatever course of discipline may be necessary to prevent his giving further scandal, and to correct his manners and excesses.

There is one other argument about which the present course of events causes us serious anxiety. We have found no proper name for it in the ordinary works on logic, but it ought to have one, and a good one, and we have contrived one ourselves, which we offer with great diffidence, but which we trust will not be found unsuitable. We propose to call it the argumentum a gaudio infidelium—the argument that you cannot be an honest or good man because what you say or do rejoices the Copperheads. This, too, was a favorite one with the Tribune, until Mr. Greeley bailed Jefferson Davis, when it was used against him by the New York Times in a cruel and indecent manner, and it fell out of use in Mr. Greeley's paper. Its ordinary form is this: "On Mr. ——'s motives we cast no imputation; they may be good, or they may be bad; but this we do know, that there is not a Copperhead from Maine to California who is not made happier by what he did last Monday," or Tuesday or Wednesday, as the case may be. Now, we do not ourselves think much of this argument. We have known it to fail, and we ourselves never use it. It is too delicate for ordinary political discussion, and it is certainly falling into disrepute. But before it loses all its power, we propose to turn it against the sixty-one Republicans who followed Messrs. Cobb and Butler in their attempt to disgrace their country last week, and ask them whether they know that there is not a Copperhead or Secessionist in the United States whom their conduct has not delighted and inspired with hope? Nay, more, whether they know that there is not an enemy of popular government on the face of the earth who will not hear of it with delight, and who will not treasure it up for use in defence of caste and privilege, and that there is probably nobody who, during the next five years, in any quarter of the globe, preaches great political possibilities for the human race, who will not have it cast in his teeth, and whom it will not confound and make ashamed?

THE REAL OBSTACLE TO LOANS AT LOW INTEREST.

One great difficulty in dealing with the repudiators in the Republican party arises from the fact that they resolutely refuse to discuss—a trick which they have not unnaturally learned from the War-Horse section of the House of Representatives. Mr. Cobb, our readers may have noticed, immediately after moving his resolution—a most important resolution, too, likely to depreciate the property of millions of people in all parts of the Union and the world—"moved the previous question." He was unwilling to allow one word of debate upon one of the most momentous subjects that has ever come before the House. During the short parley which followed, only one approach to argument was made, and that was by Mr. Butler; he informed us that what he and his confederates proposed to do was what the English did. This, let us say, was a perfectly characteristic speech. Your genuine War-Horse always turns his tail in a menacing manner towards anybody who ventures to question the superiority of the United States to all the other nations of the earth; but when, as is not at all uncommon, he has himself some scheme of unusual folly in contemplation, one of the first things he does is to search the records of foreign countries, and especially those of England, for some similar piece of wickedness and absurdity, and if he finds one he produces it triumphantly, and rests his case—as if the sole mission of the United States was to be no worse than the worst of other nations, and as if a companion in his sin was all that a sinner needed to purge him of his guilt.

Unfortunately for Mr. Butler, in this case the argument is worthless. England has never inflicted a special and exceptional tax on revenue derived from government securities. The question of taxing them at all was fully debated when the first income-tax was proposed, and all the arguments pro and con. were carefully considered. It was decided that it would be unfair to exempt income derived from one source from burdens to which incomes from all other sources were subjected. The holders of government securities were, moreover, more than any other class, interested in the safety of the government. This argument did not apply, it is true, to foreign holders, and a sincere desire was manifested to exempt them, if possible; but the foreign creditors of England were then, as they are still, so exceedingly few in number that it was not worth while to make special provision for their exemption, and even if their number had been larger, it would have been impossible to exempt them without opening the door to frauds, which would have made the collection of the tax from the native holders practically impossible. It was decided, too, and rightly decided, that in placing the government securities under the same tax as all other species of property, the best possible security was provided against any attempt to cheat the owners by disguised repudiation, inasmuch as a tax which pressed them too hard would not be submitted to by the rest of the community. Sacrifices which people are to share, they are not generally so ready to impose. We feel satisfied that if Mr. Butler will put a considerable portion of his fortune into the hands of trustees, with instructions to keep it invested in government bonds, all other holders will cheerfully submit to any special tax which he may think the welfare of the people requires to be levied on the interest.

A tax imposed on the interest of government securities has always something suspicious and abnormal about it, because it is a tax imposed by a debtor on his creditor at the discretion of the former, and sound morality, therefore—the care which every man ought to have both in his private and public course for the moral sense of his children—requires that no such tax should ever be imposed without every precaution being taken to deprive it even of the appearance of unfairness, and the only way of doing this is to treat the creditor simply as a member of the community—tax all alike, and ask no questions for the purpose of discriminating between incomes derived from different sources, unless there has been a special agreement not to tax him. In that case anybody who says, "Tax him nevertheless, he has no remedy," deserves the penitentiary a great deal more richly than nine-tenths of its present inmates.

For the only precedent for the Cobb-Butler resolution we must look to Austria and Italy. The Reichsrath has just passed a law taxing government coupons about 16 per cent., in some cases by the simple imposition of a tax, and in others by a forced conversion in which new securities at a lower rate of interest are given in exchange for the present ones. All that can be said about this is that it is either a fraud or an act of bankruptcy. The Austrian empire has been within the last three years on the point of extinction. Its escape from its present difficulties is still doubtful. It is threatened by nearly every danger, internal and external, by which a state has ever been beset. The revenue is at present little more than sufficient to pay the army and the civil servants of the government, and any increase of taxation in the present temper of the various races of which the empire is composed would be futile or perilous. Under these circumstances, the choice of the government lies between total bankruptcy and partial repudiation, and the creditors are so well aware of this that they accept the latter, if we may judge by the rise of the Austrian funds, with thankfulness.

Italy, on the other hand, is struggling frantically for bare life. She is burdened with charges which it is generally believed she cannot meet by ordinary taxation, and yet failure to meet them means death. Nearly all her creditors are foreigners, and her parliament has forced on the ministry the levy of a tax on their interest. The thing is a disgrace and scandal. There can be only one excuse for it, and the Italians themselves do not offer any other—overwhelming necessity. It is the act of a nation at its wits' ends, an act which no high-minded Italian likes to talk of or think of. The other great European repudiator is Spain, whose swindles have been so barefaced that the quotation of her securities is not permitted on any bourse in Europe, and a measure of similar severity is now in contemplation with regard to Italy and Austria. Yet it is these three countries that some of the men whom an inscrutable Providence has permitted to assume a prominent position in the Republican party, ask us to copy or compare ourselves with in regulating the dealings of the United States with those who trusted it in the hour of its distress. They tell us in one breath of the magnitude of our national resources, of the prodigious capacity of our population, of the unparalleled rapidity with which the national wealth and national strength increase; they are never tired of picturing the magnificence of the future, both near and remote, which awaits us, and the dread and envy with which the wearied and despondent Old World regards us—and in the next they ask us to descend to expedients for saving a few millions a year to which only the poorest, weakest, most sorely tried, or the most demoralized and shameless of civilized nations resort.

The Chicago Platform hit the nail on the head when it said that the true way to convert our debt at a lower rate of interest was to raise our credit. No government pays as high a rate of interest as money will bring if invested in industrial undertakings; but people are content to take a lower rate of interest from governments for the sake of great security and regularity. But if you make government securities doubtful, either as regards the payment of the interest or principal, they are the worst securities in the world. On all others, the courts of law may enable one to realize something if the worst comes to the worst; but if a government proves unfaithful to its engagements there is no remedy. Our bonds were all issued on disadvantageous terms because the security was very poor. The nation was engaged in a war of which no man could foresee the termination; it was rolling up a debt of which nobody could foresee the total amount; and that debt was dependent for its payment simply upon the good faith of a people who had never been greatly tried, and the shrewdest financiers in the world doubted its good faith. Those who lent the money were, in fact, the laughing-stock of the European exchanges. The Republican orators and editors encouraged them to lend it, however. They said the Government would soon come out of the war victoriously, and they proved to be right. They said the debt would not prove too large for the national capacity, and they proved to be right. They said it would be held sacred by the people—as sacred as the memory of the dead who died in the war, and would be paid as promised without ifs or buts or excuses. Whether they were right in this still remains to be proved. We believe they were; but it must be admitted, too, that such incidents as the Cobb-Butler vote in the House of Representatives go far to justify those who during the war decried the Government loans. These are the very things they predicted. They said, even if the North won, even if the debt did not prove too large for its capacity, it would not pay; they said that the high rate of interest was all humbug; that it would be lowered in a few years under the preaching of unscrupulous demagogues to an unscrupulous multitude, and at this moment it is impossible to say that this was pure calumny.

It cannot be too widely known that all assertions that England has ever forced a conversion at a reduced rate of interest are gross misrepresentations. Mr. Butler produced it a year ago in support of his first attack on the public credit. It was promptly exposed in Boston, but he characteristically takes no notice of the refutation, and is still using the argument for the delusion of the masses. The price of the English funds in the market is of itself a proof that the English Government has not been guilty of this particular form of swindle. No government which has ever evaded its obligations can get 97 per cent. for its promises to pay. It has effected several conversions when it found itself paying a higher rate of interest than could be obtained on similar security elsewhere; but the penalty with which it threatened its creditors, in case of non-compliance, was payment in coin. There is only one reason why the credit of the United States should stand lower in the market than that of England; there are a dozen reasons why it should be able to borrow on better terms than any government in the world. In the present condition of the European continent, the enormous armaments, and the great political uncertainty with which every nation is afflicted, the bonds of this Government ought to be eagerly sought at even four per cent. per annum by the vast body of annuitants which is found in every civilized country in the Old World, and they would be sought but for the recurrence of such incidents as the voting of the Cobb resolution, and the figure which politicians like Mr. Butler are allowed to cut by the party which carried on the war and incurred the national debt. No prudent man likes to place his fortune, or that of his wife and children, at the mercy of a body which suddenly proposes to clap a tax of ten per cent. on interest under the "previous question," and in violation of the public faith solemnly pledged; and those who desire to see the United States borrow at low rates will do well to set a mark on Cobb's followers, and do what in them lies to see that they go back to Congress no more.

The mode of dealing with the creditors of a great nation which these men seem to think suitable would cover a private firm with everlasting infamy. Suppose Brown Brothers & Co. were, during a crisis like 1857, when they were suffering some losses from failures, to summon their creditors to their parlor, and the senior partner were to address them in this fashion: "Gentlemen, the times are hard; we have been suffering some losses, but our resources are still great; in fact, they may be said to be unimpaired. We have, however, effected assignments of our property, so as to leave you without legal remedy and leave us free to act as our judgment shall prescribe. We are abundantly able to meet our engagements in full, but we have determined to pay you only fifty cents on the dollar; to do more would necessitate a certain amount of care and self-restraint and hard work on the part of ourselves and our families, to which both they and we are unwilling to submit, and, in fact, will not submit, particularly as most of you, it is quite evident, are well off, and can do without the money. We have only to add that in making this announcement to you we are acting under the advice of the well-known Tombs lawyer, Mr. Baker. He has assured us, and you are doubtless aware, that worse swindles than this are perpetrated every day, so that this of ours need not, and will not, excite any great astonishment. Numerous cases have occurred in his experience in which mercantile and banking firms have not only not called their creditors together and made them the handsome offer we make you, but have gone clean off without paying a cent—a course which, in Mr. Baker's opinion, was even more sensible than that which we are adopting. We trust we shall hear no complaints from you; indeed, you will hardly have the impudence to make any, considering that your motives in dealing with us have been throughout purely mercenary. If any of you have ever honored our drafts from personal affection, we have yet to hear of it."

What would the world say to this?

THE LATEST PHASE OF THE RIGHTS OF NEUTRALS.

The report of the English Commissioners on the Neutrality Laws has at last been made. It is now six years since the necessity for some addition to the Foreign Enlistment Act was conclusively shown by the easy departure of the Alabama and other Confederate cruisers from English ports. But if we complain of the length of the period which England has consumed in swinging around towards our position, our strictures can at least go no further; for her ponderous momentum has carried her over so large an arc that this report places her at a distance even further removed than that of the United States from her former objectionable stand-point. The proposed legislation is briefly as follows: That it shall be a misdemeanor to fit out, arm, despatch, or cause to be despatched, any ship with intent or knowledge that the same shall or will be employed in the military or naval service of a belligerent against another belligerent with whom England is at peace; or to build or equip any ship with the like intent; or to commence or attempt to do, or aid in doing, any of these acts. When reasonable and probable cause is shown to the Secretary of State for suspecting any breach of this statute, he has power—a power which it is to be presumed that no Secretary would be at the peril of declining to exert—to issue a warrant for the arrest and search of the vessel and for her detention until proof of the incorrectness of the suspicion is duly made. Further, a prima facie case is taken to have been thus made out against the vessel; and the burden of proof is accordingly shifted upon her owners, who must thereupon, before they can obtain her release, furnish positive affirmative evidence sufficient to put it beyond a doubt that they and their vessel do not fall within the purview of the act.

Certainly such legislation is thorough enough and severe enough. Mr. Vernon Harcourt, one of the commissioners, regards it as far too severe. The true object of a Foreign Enlistment Act, as it is called in England, or a Neutrality Act, as it is called in this country, is simply to aid the nation which passes it to meet those obligations to other nations which are imposed upon her by international law; and to this end such acts give power to government officials to interfere for the prevention of the breach of such obligations; they have never been designed to curtail any privileges which a people would otherwise be free to enjoy. Such, then, being the true object of the act under discussion, Mr. Harcourt's objection lies to making the simple building of the ship a misdemeanor. He argues that such mere building is allowed by international law; and that, therefore, it is unnecessary and unjust to push the statute beyond its proper purpose in order to subject a strictly legal business to needless, vexatious, and perhaps ruinous interference. There seems to us considerable force in this objection. It is certainly founded on a very sound distinction of international law—the distinction between the lawful trade with, and unlawful assistance to, a belligerent—the distinction which creates the difference between the cases of the Confederate cruisers built and equipped in England and the case of the Meteor.

The distinction is so important that we will endeavor, by the help of these two cases, to make it clear. Judge Nelson's recent decision in the latter case we regard as sound law and pure justice. Even if the Government had succeeded in proving that this vessel, without martial equipment or a fighting crew, was to be sent to Panama in the hope that either Spain or Chili might there buy her, she was bound on a strictly legal venture. Nay if, going in such condition to Panama, negotiations for her sale to Chili upon her arrival there had been already opened, or had even been concluded—we only suppose this case, we saw nothing in the evidence to support it—she could then only have been subject to the risk of seizure on the way thither—confiscation by Spain as contraband of war. Beyond this, our Government would have been under no liabilities, would have broken no obligations, to Spain by reason of her open clearance and departure. Such a vessel is, as Mr. Harcourt says, a fair and proper subject of trade between a neutral and a belligerent. On such a voyage she is just like gunpowder or muskets, a simple commercial venture in contraband of war; which means only that if captured she may be confiscated, not that the government who knowingly allowed her departure from one of its ports has broken any obligation of international law.

On the other hand, the Confederate cruisers when they left the English ports were already in a great measure armed and equipped vessels of war; practically, they were then and there fighting ships of the rebels. Their despatch was virtually a coalition pro tanto between the neutral and the belligerent; it was not simply an effort to trade in the ordinary and regular course of commerce. They sailed not to find a good market, but to prey upon American commerce. This was the purpose which the parties in England who despatched them had in their minds at the time.

This last statement brings us to the fact that the crucial test between legality and illegality lies in the intent of the builders or owners. The intent that the vessel shall be employed by one belligerent in hostile operations against the other creates criminality. But the phrase "intent" is construed with great strictness. A hope, a wish, an expectation, is not necessarily an intent within the meaning of the law. Neither is an intent to offer the vessel for sale to a belligerent an intent that she shall be employed in hostile operations against the other belligerent. The Meteor was built for the use of our own Government; it was only at the close of our war that her owners thought it desirable to sell her if they could get a good price. In herself she was a legal article of merchandise, of sale, if the transaction was not tainted by any illegal intent. Her owners could have sent her to Panama with the hope or the expectation that she would be there bought by either Spain or Chili. Their grounds for such hope or expectation might be more or less satisfactory, but in no case could this have been construed into an illegal intent. On the other hand, the builders of the Alabama sent her out from Liverpool with the clear intent then present in their minds, and with the distinct purpose, that she should at once enter into the service of the Confederate States as a hostile war cruiser against American merchantmen. The difference is substantial, not technical. Since, therefore, it is clear that the building and the sale of vessels suitable for warlike purposes may be a strictly legal business on the part of a citizen of a neutral country, Mr. Harcourt's fear that the proposed enactment against the mere building, or even beginning to build, might often ruin the projectors of perfectly justifiable enterprises, seems to us far from groundless. If England, though gratuitously, put such restrictions upon herself, it is probable that hereafter she may, upon occasion, expect us to do likewise. Probably we shall be unwilling to comply, and should deny her right to require it of us. No one now demands it of her, and it seems to us a pity needlessly to include the clause in her proposed legislation.

RUSSIAN NEWSPAPERS AND MAGAZINES.

I.

THIRTEEN years ago Alexander the Second ascended the throne of the Czars, and over a decade has already elapsed since the inauguration of the new era in Russia. Everybody is familiar with the vast domestic reforms which have been carried into effect during this period; but what is less generally known is the fact that the participation of the public by word and deed in the domestic affairs of that country likewise dates only from the dawn of the new era. The public and the press of Russia are alike young and inexperienced in political life. At the same time, the position which the press occupies toward the population is entirely different from what it is in the countries of Western Europe. The Russians are still exceedingly impressible by anything printed; as a general thing, they treat it as indisputably true, and not as a mere individual opinion. Consequently, the few journalists and authors of the country never take great pains to present that which they lay before their readers in as strong a light as possible; and, moreover, the small number of cities, the sparseness of the villages in the interior of the country, and the almost entire absence of an intermediate class between the summits and the lowest layers of society, are decidedly unfavorable to a sifting and winnowing discussion of what is to be read The press, in discussing political, scientific, and social questions generally, must aim not only at the further development of the knowledge of the educated classes, but oftentimes also at the diffusion of the most elementary information. The whole public life of the country is a series of political events but slightly connected with one another, rather than an organic and progressive process of civilization; fluctuations, sudden leaps forward and backward, impart an exceedingly lively physiognomy to it, but are extremely unfavorable to steadiness of progress and to the stability of the reforms which have already been achieved.

Until 1862, the revolutionary journals, pamphlets, and books which gifted agitators, such as Alexander Herzen, Bakunin, Dolgorukoff, and kindred spirits smuggled into Russia by tens, nay, by hundreds of thousands, exerted a powerful influence upon public opinion, and most of the domestic journals, having democratic and socialistic tendencies, added to the longing of the people for radical reforms. But the terrible conflagrations which devastated St. Petersburg in May, 1862, and the outbreak of the insurrection in Poland and Lithuania, seemingly put an end to the strifes of the contending parties, and blended them all into a fierce and irresistible blaze of national sentiment. The organs of the democratic and socialistic era either were silenced or lost their influence over public opinion. Two journalists, Katkoff and Leontyeff, the editors of the Moscow Gazette, by fiercely inveighing against the former tendencies of the press, paved the way for the truly wonderful influence which their journal was soon after to gain over the national party of Russia. The so-called liberal journals demanded that the Government should extend over the whole country the violent and socialistic measures introduced in the western provinces, and destined to elevate the lower classes at the expense of the boyars. The conservative press opposed this line of policy, asserting that the Russian nobility deserved more considerate treatment at the hands of the Government. But when the Government, in its course toward Poland and Lithuania, acted more and more in accordance with the law of conquest and theories of confiscation and forfeiture, the national party took a bolder stand in favor of the extension of the Russian system over all of the western provinces, and the political differences of its organs disappeared in the common attacks which all of them made upon the peculiar system of administration still prevailing in the non-Russian provinces of the empire. A terrible væ victis resounded, in the first place, against Finland, and then, for several years, against the Baltic provinces, and their social, political, and religious peculiarities, their language and ancient privileges, were assailed with intense bitterness. Under the pretext that separatistic tendencies were on the eve of assuming a character extremely dangerous to the existence of the whole empire, that their leading men had entered into a conspiracy with the Polish insurgents, and that they were in favor of the annexation of their provinces to Prussia, Denmark, or Sweden, the whole press of the national party finally sought to render the Government distrustful of the frontier provinces, in order to induce it to pursue toward them the same system of Russification which, the Government says, the law of self-preservation compels it to employ in Poland and Lithuania.

In one respect, however, the national press of St. Petersburg differed from that of Moscow: in the former, political democracy and conservatism, or rather revolution and reform, were the two elements opposed to each other; in the national press of Moscow the adherents of Russianism were opposed by the advocates of Panslavism. The Petersburg press was milder and more theoretical in its tone and polemics; the journals of Moscow were more reckless in their choice of means, and more radical and outspoken in advocating the national cause, but, at the same time, less servile toward the Government. In consequence, their influence was soon by far greater than that of their Petersburg contemporaries. The tone of the Moscow papers, flattering as it did the vanity of the Russian people, was, at the same time, more in keeping with their intellectual condition, and, consequently, they obtained in the course of a few months a very large circulation. The Government maintained a sort of reserved neutrality between the various camps of the national party and press, so that it would have been difficult to say with which side it sympathized. Its whole attention seemed to be engrossed by the preparations for the convocation of the provincial assemblies and the reforms of the courts and several branches of the administration, which were to be carried into effect at the beginning of the new year.

Suddenly, on the 1st (13th) of September, 1865, the whole country was startled by the appearance of an imperial ukase which established a sort of liberty of the press for the daily papers of the two capitals, St. Petersburg and Moscow. By this ukase all such journals were fully authorized to decide whether or not they intended to submit, as heretofore, to the censorship of the press officials. During the next two months nearly all the large and influential papers resolved to avail themselves of the new privilege. Strange to say, however, while a great many papers had formerly advocated the abolition of press censorship in the most emphatic manner, the ukase excited more astonishment than enthusiasm, nor did it add materially, as had been expected, to the circulation of the newspapers. This was the more singular as the new system, although it was to be applied only to the newspapers published at the two capitals, in reality delivered nearly the whole press in the old Russian provinces from the shackles of the censorship; for that the intellectual life of the Russian people centers in, and is almost exclusively confined to, St. Petersburg and Moscow, is a fact which the organs of the national party never tire of deploring. Thus, one of the most prominent journalists of St. Petersburg, Mr. Korsch, says in one of the leading national papers, the Russian St. Petersburg Gazette (January 11, 1866), that not a single new journal had been started during the preceding year in the old Russian provinces. "In the silent solitudes," he says, "which are called Russian provinces, there are only two or three oases which seem to be animated by political life. In all these provinces there are but two daily papers. The two journals published at Kiev are triweeklies, and the papers issued in the interior of Russia are weeklies, controlled by the local authorities, whose decrees they print without ever devoting any attention to general politics. Moreover, the two dailies above referred to, the Odessa Gazette and the Wilna Gazette, are published in annexed provinces, and the latter is an official organ."

What was still more singular, the abolition of the censorship did not exert a very perceptible influence on the intellectual character of the Russian press. Nearly all the papers seemed to be utterly destitute of a true sense of the dignity of journalism, and at a loss to understand that it was now incumbent on them to place the new achievement on so solid a foundation that the first gust of wind should not be able to overthrow it. It was as if all they cared for was to prevent such a gust from reaching them. The control which they exercised over their own columns arose not so much from the desire to lay valuable and carefully prepared matter before their readers as from their apprehension lest the Government should inflict on them some of the rigorous penalties fixed by the press law. The journals scarcely ventured to discuss questions which the censors had formerly forbidden them to allude to, but confined themselves to less guarded comments on topics that would not be likely to involve them in difficulties with the Government. The most visible fruit of the new press régime was the increased virulence with which the newspapers attacked one another.

At the same time, the monthly press, the magazines, and reviews, which had hitherto played such a distinguished part in the political and literary life of the nation, lost much of their former importance. It seemed as if they had deemed it worth while to discuss social and political doctrines, to record and characterize the progress of Russia since the inauguration of the new era, to familiarize the Russian people with the developments of Western civilization, and to communicate to them the results and achievements of modern science, only as long as they had to wrest their pages one by one from the clutches of their reluctant and distrustful censors. In place of their somewhat diffuse, but withal profound and valuable, essays, their columns contained henceforth nothing but flippant and puerile criticisms of what had been achieved during the reign of the Emperor Alexander, or the trashiest and dullest tales and essays. Little attention was henceforth paid to the enlightenment of the Russian people in regard to the progress made by the Western nations in art, science, and literature.

Shortly after issuing the new press ukase, the Government, by another decree, granted additional privileges to the metropolitan newspapers by reducing the postage upon them throughout the empire, while that charged for the provincial journals remained as exorbitant as it always had been. This newspaper postage business in Russia is an exceedingly curious one, and it really seems as if the rates of postage were fixed according to the political proclivities of the journals, and as if the post-office forwarded those papers which are on good terms with the Government at much lower rates than those which are hostile to it. Thus, for instance, the following semi-official papers, the Northern Post, of St. Petersburg, the Wilna Gazette, and the Odessa Messenger pay the lowest postage—namely, two silver rubles—throughout the empire. The Journal de St. Pétersbourg, the organ of the Department of Foreign Affairs, the Börsenzeitung (printed in German), which is sometimes used as a semi-official organ, and the Moscow Gazette, favored by the Government on account of its large circulation and great influence, pay three silver rubles a year; the Russian St. Petersburg Gazette, the Golos (the Voice), etc., four silver rubles. Four silver rubles are also the postage rates charged for all the daily papers in the Baltic provinces, while the Polish papers have to pay five silver rubles a year.

Compared with all these advantages granted to the metropolitan journals, the continuance of the censorship for provincial papers, as well as for all kinds of pamphlets and books, exerted, as a matter of course, the most depressing effect upon the latter. It is well known that in countries where the daily press is impaired in influence or character, or neglects any of the tasks imposed upon it, the writers of brochures and books seize upon the field thus left unimproved, and, owing to the greater thoroughness and method with which they treat the subjects in question, cause the journals to resume their discussion under more favorable circumstances. Such, however, is not the case in Russia. Aside from the fact that the peculiar character of the book trade in that country, and the exceedingly imperfect means of communication between the different cities, render the distribution of books and pamphlets both difficult and very slow, the censors never allow a brochure, much less a large book, to appear at the very moment when the public takes the liveliest interest in the subject of which it treats. In Russia it is almost impossible to publish even the smallest political pamphlet in the nick of time, unless the moment when it will tell best is known a long time in advance. And yet it is nowhere more necessary than in Russia that every literary manifestation should follow in the wake of the event to which it refers, inasmuch as the public at first takes the liveliest interest in all public affairs, but, with astonishing fickleness, loses all interest in them as soon as another event, however unimportant it may be, attracts its attention.

The character of the daily press of St. Petersburg and Moscow is in perfect keeping with this peculiarity of the Russian public; it is extremely fickle, flighty, and inconsistent; it treats the most insignificant matters with the same zeal and emphasis as the most important subjects. Now, it might be supposed that the more important events and questions, after being dropped by the metropolitan papers, would be taken up by the provincial press, and thus be kept before the people, so that a salutary interchange of views would take place between the organs of the central provinces and those of the frontier provinces. But no such thing is possible in Russia. Not only was the censorship of the provincial press maintained in its full rigor, but it was rendered even more oppressive and intolerable in the very provinces most noted for their literary activity and productiveness. Such was the case both in Poland and in the Baltic provinces. Owing to the ukase of the 14th (26th) of December, 1865, the newspapers published at Riga, Revel, Dorpat, Mitau, etc., no more dare to criticise any act of the Government than they did during the reign of the Emperor Nicholas, when even the most timid criticisms were resented in the most barbarous manner. The extreme severity with which the Polish press was treated is, of course, to be accounted for by the process of Russification then in course of execution in that province. But in the Baltic provinces the Government did not consent to pursue the same course until the almost unanimous voice of the Russian press, which had been repeatedly worsted in argument by the German papers of those provinces, had called upon it again and again to do so.

The press of the western provinces having been effectually muzzled, and the press of the interior being too insignificant to be considered either a rival or a formidable opponent, the papers of St. Petersburg and Moscow now held undisputed sway over the whole field of Russian journalism. But this time again the influence of these seeming advantages was far from salutary. While the tone of the metropolitan journals became more arrogant and overbearing than ever, the quality of their reading-matter grew more and more unsatisfactory. The simple fact was, that there was in the whole of Russia almost no editor capable of treating in a thorough and intelligent manner the great social and political reforms which the Government was intent on carrying into execution. As long as the Russian press had only to point out what reforms should be introduced, it was perfectly equal to its task, powerfully supported and assisted as it was in its opposition to the existing state of affairs by the doctrines and spirit of the so-called Russian "Nihilism," which at one time seemed to have affected nearly the whole people, and which, if the system of oppression pursued under the Emperor Nicholas had been persisted in after his death, would have been certain to bring about a terrible democratic revolution. But no sooner had the Government entered the path of reform than the press seemed utterly unable to grapple with the questions arising from the new state of affairs. "Nihilism" still lingered in, and exerted a powerful influence over, the minds of most of the prominent journalists, and this accounts, to some extent, for the lack of ability which they displayed after their journalistic task had assumed an entirely different aspect.

THE NEW PROCESS OF MUMMIFICATION.

FLORENCE, Italy, June 20, 1868.

SOME few months since the French and Italian papers were full of descriptions of Prof. Marini's discoveries of the process of mummification, petrifaction, and his methods for restoring mummified bodies, or portions of the same, to their original volume, color, and appearance. The English papers pooh-poohed the accounts; decided a priori that they must be exaggerated. Our curiosity was aroused, and, availing ourselves of an introduction, we visited the professor in his modest abode, and spent yesterday afternoon in examining his specimens and in listening to his explanations; and as his labors bid fair not only to advance science, to protect students of anatomy from its attendant dangers, but also to alleviate human sufferings, we feel no doubt that the subject is one fraught with interest for all classes and all countries.

The first specimen the professor showed us was the foot of an Egyptian mummy, of which the half remained in its mummified condition; the other half was restored to its normal color, form, dimensions, and suppleness. Shutting the window and holding a candle behind the foot, you see the transparency of the soft, the shadows of the hard, substances. Another foot, perforated by a ribbon and sealed, with the inscription: "Pied à l'état sec vu le 29 janvier, 1868, Nelaton," was presented supple, fresh, and of normal color, and on the reverse of the parchment was written: "Ce même pied examiné le 26 février, a repris sa souplesse assez complètement pour que j'aie pu disséquer assez facilement le muscle abducteur du cinquième orteil, Nelaton." Next came a hand, on which was written: "Paris, 14 novembre, 1864. La main est à l'état sec, C. Sapey;" and lower down: "Le 25 novembre, 1864. Cette main a repris sa flexibilité et tous les caractères qu' elle présente à l'état frais, C. Sapey."

On this hand Nelaton experimented. Hitherto it has been impossible to inject the arteries with wax or other substances used in anatomical studios, on account of the salts which form in the arteries themselves, preserved by systems hitherto known; whéreas by Marini's system a corpse may be injected with the substances necessary to facilitate a perfect study of all the arteries, even after many years of preservation.

Considering the number of students who annually lose life or limb in the act of dissecting, if Marini's system shall denude the corpse of its venom and present a harmless subject to the student, for this gain alone humanity will have cause for gratitude. According to some of the most celebrated anatomists this point is already gained. "Where," writes Professor Corrado Tommasi, "Marini has reached the summit of art in anatomical preparations, is in the process by which he obtains the preservation of animal tissues in a fresh state. Among his preparations he possesses an arm detached in September, 1864, from a corpse in the École pratique of Paris (bearing the seal and signature of Professor Sapey), which seems freshly severed from the body to which it belonged. All the organs which enter into the composition of this member—skin, tissue, nerve, muscle, etc.—have preserved the size, color, consistency, and suppleness of a fresh corpse not yet rigid. This arm may be desiccated to-day, and be used for an anatomical demonstration precisely as it was used three years since in the Practical School of Paris.

"Nor is this process of Marini applicable solely to partial fragments of the human form, since he preserved for an entire year in a fresh state the corpse of Professor Martini, of Cagliari, previous to petrifying it, and four months after death dressed it, and had a photograph taken so perfect and expressive as to delight all those to whom Martini was known. In the experiments performed before the commission of the Medical Academy of Florence, Marini arrested the already commenced putrefaction of the corpse of a four-years child, restoring to it all the appearance of freshness, which it still maintains despite the intense heat of last year's summer. The brain, the spinal marrow, the most delicate tissues of pathological formation, are perfectly preserved with all their normal appearances, and apparently for ever. A microscopic examination of all these preparations demonstrates that the elements of the tissues have suffered no variation of form or dimensions; possibly one observes a slight opacity, especially where albuminous matters abound. But there is no coagulation even of these substances, no granulous appearance in the contents of the cellular elements or of their derivations."

The photograph of Professor Martini to which Tommasi alludes I enclose, leaving it to those who see it to say whether it appears to have been taken four months after death, as the acts and documents of the municipality of Cagliari prove beyond all doubt that it was.

These two processes of transitory mummification, and the preservation of animal tissues in a fresh state, are obtained by the immersion of the body in a liquid composed of vegetable substances whose component parts are Marini's secret, jealously kept hitherto, to the displeasure of the medical faculty, who fear that, like Segato, he will take his discovery with him into the grave. On this point I ventured to question him, and he assures me that he has no such intention, that he has already declared to the commission of the Medical Academy of Florence that he will reveal his secret to them, and afterwards to the public, as soon as they shall present their report on the experiments of which they have been witnesses. As usual, Marini has not proved a prophet in his own country. Even as in the case of the brothers Lollini, it was left for the Professors Tardieu and Nelaton to proclaim to the world the excellence of their surgical instruments, and to award them the first-class gold medal at the Paris Industrial Exposition, while Italian surgeons persisted in exalting the superiority of the Charrière manufactory, and the Italian Government in supplying the army and navy from the same, so it was to Nelaton and his confrères that Marini had to look for any official recognition of his wonderful discovery. But a worthier motive than this natural pique keeps him silent yet. His experience in the substances best adapted to preserve inanimate matter from decay led Marini to experiment on animate matter affected, if we may so express it, by premature decay, by death in life.

In the hospital of S. Maria Nuova, in Florence, with the consent of the attendant surgeons, Marini applied his lotion to several patients affected with cancer, ulcer, and similar diseases. In the first place, this lotion was applied to a foot covered with ulcerated and bleeding sores, or, as the Sperimentale expresses it, large fungous masses abundantly sanguineous. The ordinary method adopted by Dr. Rosati and by his predecessor, Professor Paoli, had not succeeded in bringing about any useful modification of the wound which could point to the hope of cicatrization of the surface. On the contrary, the rapid reappearance of the fungi after their removal pointed to the necessity of operation. Marini's liquid was tried for a month. Rapid and profound were the modifications that ensued. At the end of the month two-thirds of the affected part were cicatrized. Professor Marini absenting himself from Florence, the application was discontinued. In a few days the wound broke out afresh, nor did the cicatrization proceed one step. The lotion again applied, the patient has recovered all that he lost during the professor's absence.

In the case of another patient the liquid produced, in a very short space of time, cicatrization of a varicose wound which had defied all other treatment. After the quotation of other cases by Dr. Rosati, one of which he requested the members of the society from whose procès-verbal we quote to watch and examine, Dr. Billi certified that he had applied the Marini liquid to one of his own relations affected with cancer of the tongue; that said cancer, which had proceeded with frightful rapidity for two months, and which, according to the first surgeons, could not be extirpated, had been arrested by the application of Marini's liquid. Other cases are still under cure. Two women affected with internal cancer are now being treated by him in the hospital, and but last week he was summoned to attend the sister of the Syndic of Naples, on whom his liquid has already produced the desired effect. The surgeons, even those who apply his lotion, are not on good terms with him, because he will not reveal the ingredients of which it is composed. He justifies himself by saying, that when he first applied the lotion to cancer, especially to internal cancer, it had the great defect of fostering, rather than stopping hemorrhage; that for this defect he has found the remedy, and that when he has brought his liquid to what he considers perfection, he will, in his own way and on his own terms, reveal his secret.

It is to the curative results of Marini's discovery, to the cure of cancer and of hospital gangrene, now in course of experiment, that we attach more importance than to any other, singular and interesting as all are. His preservation of animal food is also a useful invention; meat desiccated in one year has been eaten the next, as his liquid has no smell and no deleterious effects.

His petrifactions are the most curious, though perhaps of least practical utility, of all his discoveries, as any animal substance once reduced to a state of petrifaction cannot be restored to its fresh state as when only mummified or dried. He showed us petrified livers of human beings and animals, a petrified medal of Garibaldi's blood, a petrified rabbit, etc., etc.; strike them with a hammer, and they give the ring of stone, and, like stone, they break into fragments if hit hard enough; but they are not as cold as stone, and, if you hold a light behind them, they are transparent at the edges. As his last specimen, the professor uncovered a small table standing in the middle of the room, which, to all appearances, was made of Florentine mosaic encrusted in the ordinary cement. Pointing to the bright red bits, he said: "That is human blood, that bullock's, that fowl's. Those purple bits are liver; those, lights; those, lungs; that is bile; the cement of the whole is human brain." We laid our hands on this extraordinary conglomeration and found it less cold than marble, but to the touch of the hammer it gave forth a similar sound.

A similar, though far more elaborate, table was presented to the Emperor of the French, who was deeply interested in Marini's discoveries, which he caused to be thoroughly investigated by Professor Nelaton.

In this table, composed of blood, bile, liver, tissues, brain, four human ears are encrusted; in the centre is poised a woman's foot, which preserves its natural color and transparency, the whole bearing an even and brilliant polish. It has been sent by the Emperor to the Orfila Museum, whence it is to be transferred to the Museum of Natural History. W. M.

Correspondence.

MR. WARING'S ELEMENTS OF AGRICULTURE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

My love for precision of statement—a love which has waxed strong under the sound teachings of the Nation—impels me to ask you to correct two errors into which you have fallen in the review of my "Elements of Agriculture," in your issue of 18th inst.:

1st. The book has been reduced in size, not "enlarged," in its present edition; and far from being offered as a "general treatise," it is offered conspicuously as "a book for young farmers."

2d. I am at a loss to know upon what paragraph of the book you could have based your assertion that I say that "the subject of agriculture is too large and varied to be treated in a small compass, and that accordingly he has been compelled to make general statements—some almost inaccurate, and many very unscientific—in order to save time and space, but hopes the reader will excuse the want of finish and possible confusion."

Surely, I never entertained precisely this opinion of my work; and on a close examination of it, I can see nothing to suggest to you the idea that I express it. If you find that I am correct in my opinion, will you kindly modify your charge of—absurdity?

Respectfully,
G. E. Waring, Jr.

Newport, R. I., June 25, 1868.

[We think Mr. Waring has just cause of complaint, in that the notice of his book which appeared in the Nation made him seem to say of it things which it would undoubtedly have been self-stultification for him to say, and which, moreover, he did not say. The injustice is due, however, to clumsy phraseology, and not to intention on the part of the reviewer. Mr. Waring's preface is deprecatory, perhaps too much so, and with the impression made by it, and by his own examination of the book, strong on the reviewer's mind, a little want of care in the construction of his opening sentences did the mischief. We are very sorry for it, all the more because the reviewer thought exceedingly well of the book, and did not mean to take any lower estimate of it than perhaps Mr. Waring would take himself.

As regards the size, the reviewer read, liked, and reviewed the first edition, but not having it by him when he read the second, he was led by the appearance of passages in the latter with which he was not familiar to suppose it had been enlarged. In speaking of some of its statements as "unscientific" and "inaccurate" he simply meant that they did not contain the whole truth, or mixed and confused it so as to throw difficulties in the way of the unscientific reader; but there was not one of these which he deemed of serious weight or looked upon as injuring the book for general use. They deserved mentioning, but this was all, and we do not think it would be worth our while, or that of our readers, to point them out in detail. We can say with truth that anybody who buys Mr. Waring's book will not only have a much better book than Mr. Waring's preface leads them to expect, but the best book of the kind there is in existence.—Ed. Nation.]

THE CHURCH MILITANT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In your paper of the 18th instant, under the head of "The Church Militant," referring to the movement to enlist soldiers for the Pope's army in the United States, you say that it is illegal—call it a "breach of the law." Will not you in a future article show, for the benefit of those who are not learned in the law, wherein this breach exists? I am ignorant of the fact. I supposed that such things were only illegal when done for the purpose of raising troops or procuring munitions of war to be used against a power with which we are at peace—that is, violating our neutrality laws. If the Papa of Christendom is now at peace with our friends, armed men for him are not for the immediate purpose of being used against our friends, therefore not for the purpose of violating our neutrality laws. But I am really ignorant on this point, and write in good faith to ask for enlightenment. I should also be extremely glad if you would give, more at length than heretofore, the points yielded under the Concordat of 1855 by Austria, and the changes made under the recent laws in respect of marriage in that kingdom in particular. I should be very glad if you would also tell us the civil relations of marriage in France and Italy, and indeed in the different countries of Europe, so as to show how the civil power asserts itself in France, and, I believe, in Catholic Italy as well.

I am very glad that in the article referred to you are bold enough to expose the pretensions of Romanism—that equality is a deprivation of her just rights. Nothing short of supremacy over the consciences of men will ever satisfy that cormorant. J. S. P.

256 Livingston St., Brooklyn, N. Y., June 29, 1868.

[The law of the matter is plain as a pikestaff. The second section of the act of 1818 declares:

"That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlist, or enter himself, or hire, or retain another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, state, colony, district, or people as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war or letter of marque or privateer, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding three years."

The only exception to this rule is the case of foreign men-of-war in our ports, which are permitted to recruit among persons of their own nation temporarily sojourning in this country. It has been decided, however, that it is not a crime to go abroad with the intention of enlisting, or to transport persons with their own consent who have such intention; the crime is in engaging persons here to go abroad with such intention, so that anything the Pope's agents may do here to get recruits for him will be a clear violation of the law. We are glad to see that the Catholic bishops in this country have, as becomes them, formally repudiated all connection with the scheme, and have denounced it and thrown the responsibility of it on the simulacrum of a "War Department" which the Vicar of Jesus Christ keeps up in Rome. But the Pope's moral responsibility cannot be got rid of in this way. His generals cannot and are not likely to send out crimps to the ends of the earth to collect recruits without his knowledge or consent.

The Concordat of 1855 was a reversal of the policy which Austria had pursued since the time of Joseph II., who made the clergy almost independent of Rome, at least as far as the law could do it. It not only secured free intercourse between the clergy and the Pope without the intervention of the state, which was reasonable enough, but it secured for the church the right of holding property to any amount of any kind free from state control. It perpetuated tithes wherever they had not been already abolished. It gave the bishops complete control of all schools and colleges both as regarded teachers, books, courses, and discipline. It made marriage a purely religious rite, with the form or consequences or conditions of which the state had nothing to do, and gave the ecclesiastical courts exclusive jurisdiction over all cases of divorce and suits raising questions of legitimacy and the like. The measure caused the most intense exasperation among the people, but this circumstance the clergy treated as of no consequence, and took and kept as long as they could all the power the besotted court chose to give them. In France and Italy marriage is a purely civil contract, entered into before a civil officer, under conditions prescribed by the code. The religious ceremony the parties add afterward or not, as they please. It does not in any way affect the validity of the contract.—Ed. Nation.]

THE AGRICULTURAL PROSPECT.

To the Editor of the Nation:

The very startling figures of your article on the "Financial Prospect" are incontrovertible. Nothing remains to us but to accept them, and enquire after the causes which are producing effects so humbling to our pride and depressing to our hopes.

Some of the causes are certainly indicated by the fact that so many young men are leaving agricultural pursuits, and crowding, to excess, all the avenues to professional and mercantile life. This process is going on with remarkable activity, even in those portions of the country where undeveloped agricultural resources are most abundant, and where agriculture is certainly more profitable than any other branch of industry. What malign causes are at work among us to produce such a state of things is worthy of most serious enquiry.

I cannot help believing that the unstable and fluctuating character of our currency is exerting a good deal of influence in this direction. It encourages the hope of stepping into a fortune without labor, by a few lucky speculations; and thus fosters a gambling spirit, which is most unfriendly to regular industry in any laborious occupation. Society has been in a condition to favor and stimulate such a spirit from the very beginning of the late war, and will continue to be so till our standard of value becomes again as unchangeable as a stable currency can make it. This cause is powerful enough, and has been long enough in a state of activity, to produce very disastrous results upon a whole generation of young men.

It is also to be feared that another and perhaps more permanent cause is acting in the same direction. Foreign immigration is constantly furnishing us so many farm laborers that men of American birth and education are strongly tempted to leave the work of the farm to them. The influx of foreigners discountenances and disparages labor, in the estimation of native-born Americans, almost in the same manner as slave labor disparaged and discountenanced the labor of the white man. Neither American men nor women expect or are willing to work as their fathers and mothers did before them.

If this is so, it must, ere long, produce a very disastrous change in our national character. The rapid increase of our wealth, in former years, was largely owing to the fact that the American farmer was at once the laborer and the intelligent, educated landholder. The union of the hard hand and brawny arm of the laborer, the intelligence of the educated man, and the independence of the land-owner, in the same person, constitutes one of the most characteristic features of American life. If causes are at work among us tending to obliterate this characteristic, very serious evil consequences are to be apprehended to every interest of American society. If one of these consequences shall be found to be that our national wealth declines, it will be matter of regret, but not of surprise, to thoughtful men. While we have abolished slavery by a war of almost unprecedented cost, have we not been at the same time, in another direction, producing and perpetuating some of the worst consequences of slavery?

There is a third cause of the decline of our agricultural wealth, perhaps more powerful than either of those which I have named, which I have not room to remark upon. I mean a partial and inequitable system of taxation.

J. M. S.

HORSES AND BONDS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: A citizen of this town sold to the Government in 1861 three horses, for which he holds a voucher for four hundred and fifty dollars.

Another citizen in July, 1863, subscribed for and purchased five one hundred dollar five-twenty bonds, gold being then at a premium of, say, $1 40. Both instruments are silent as to kind of currency. To-day both claims mature. You claim that the Government is bound to pay the one in gold, the other in greenbacks. Why the difference?

Yours truly,

Charles M. Walker.

Adrian, Mich., June 26, 1868.

[Did the officers and agents of the Government, high and low, assure the First Citizen when he sold his horses that his vouchers would be redeemed in gold? Did the leading members of Congress, including the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, encourage him and others in open Congress to bring in their horses freely, and hand them over to the quartermaster, with the assurance that they should eventually receive hard cash for them? Was he induced to sell the horses on the faith of representations to the same effect made month after month in long advertisements in all the papers of the Union, signed by the agents and brokers of the Government, and in editorial articles which these agents caused or procured to be written, and which the loyal editors wrote or published in good faith? If he did, he is on precisely the same footing as the Second Citizen, and anybody who seeks to pay him for his horses against his will in paper, bearing forty per cent. discount, or who advocates and supports such payment, is a person with whom we advise both Citizens to hold no more intercourse than is absolutely necessary. Let us add that it is not at all uncommon to buy horses with promissory notes. We do not approve of the practice; but it exists. All kinds of goods are purchased in the same way; but when and where has Mr. Walker heard of anybody who seriously proposed to redeem interest-bearing bonds payable at a certain date by a promissory note payable at no particular time, and bearing no interest?—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Mr. James Miller announces the publication, from advance sheets, of Rev. Henry Kingsley's "Stretton."——Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. intend issuing, under the general title of Lippincott's "Boys' Globe Library," a series of the standard books of adventure in the torrid, frigid, and temperate zones, of expeditions against the carnivora and other sections of the animal kingdom, of deeds of bravery and chivalry, and so on, through the list of things in which boys take delight. "Sanford and Merton" is to begin the series, and is to be immediately followed by "Robinson Crusoe." Among Lippincott & Co.'s republications to come, are Tallack's "George Fox, the Friends, and the Early Baptists;" a third edition of "A Handbook of Average (brought down to the present time, and including Spence vs. Union Insurance Company)," by Manley Hopkins; Chavasse's "Advice to a Wife on the Management of her own Health," etc.; Professor Wilhelm Lubke's "History of Art," as translated by Miss F. E. Bunnett; and "Greater Britain," by Mr. Wentworth Dilke, who was in this country with Mr. W. H. Dixon.——Messrs. Leypoldt & Holt announce "Chikkin Hazard," the very amusing travesty on "Foul Play" which has been appearing in Punch, and a translation of a German work, "Free Soil," by Karl Trenzel. ——W. J. Widdleton will publish Doctor Doran's "Saints and Sinners," and I. Disraeli's "Literary Character of Men of Genius."——Roberts Brothers will issue, as two volumes of the "Handy Volume Series," Shenstone's "Essays on Men and Manners," and Miss M. B. Edwards's "Doctor Jacob." Two other works announced by the same house are "The Prodigal Son," which consists of four sermons by the Rev. Morley Punshon, and "The Nature of the Atonement, and its Relation to the Remission of Sin and Eternal Life."——J. C. Garrigues & Co. announce "The Teacher's Guide to Palestine; containing a Complete List of the Names of all the Cities of Palestine, their Historical Interest and Scriptural Associations." It is prepared by Mr. Henry S. Osborn.

—Professor Max Müller has recently written a note to Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. which disposes of a report that perhaps has been current here, although we have heard nothing of it, to the effect that he intended coming to this country and while here would deliver lectures. For the reason set forth in the note we copy what the distinguished professor says in reference to the matter: "I have received several invitations to lecture in the United States. I suppose some mistake has occurred. A colleague of mine, Professor Goldwin Smith, intends to visit the United States. My professional work at Oxford makes it impossible for me to absent myself from England long enough to give a course of lectures in the United States. Perhaps a short notice in the American papers would save trouble to the presidents or secretaries of the colleges or institutes who are writing to me on the subject. Much as I should like to visit the United States, I should feel that, as a lecturer on language and religion, I was carrying coals to Newcastle, considering how many excellent lecturers on those subjects you possess in America."

—The late decision of the House of Lords in regard to copyright begins already to affect the dealings of English publishing houses with our American houses and American authors. We hear of two London firms that have recently made offers which would not have been made if the Lords had not decided that books published in Great Britain before publication elsewhere are exclusively the property of the author or his representatives, whether written and owned by British subjects or by foreigners. Of these proposals, one is made to a New York firm which does a heavy publishing business. It covers the whole list of their publications; that it will be accepted is not yet certain. The other offer was made to a lady of this city who has written a successful book for children, and is asked to write another. Let us say to such of our national legislators as desire "a truly American literature" that probably the lady in question will not write the worse because she knows that her book will be sold on both sides of the Atlantic, and will not be stolen on either side. And no one will say that the better she writes, the more un-American she will be.

—The Indiana School Journal for July lays down and establishes by statistics three propositions in regard to female teachers: 1st (what is very natural), That the older States employ more than the new; 2d, That in every State their ratio increases from year to year; 3d, That the cities especially show a very large excess of them—the older the greater. The tendency being very clear, the editor concludes that it is idle to oppose the employment of female teachers, even if it were desirable to do so, which he is far from thinking. The facts might suggest, however, quite other reflections. We believe that women as teachers have done less service on the side of education than of discipline, in which they have manifested a decided superiority over men both as to means and results. They could not govern by force, and they have governed without it; but they would probably not have had the chance if they had not consented to work for smaller wages than men. We are not disposed to deny the female teacher "her patience, her self-sacrifice, her quick sympathies, her warm affections, her deep devotion to her work," and to admire "often her admirable success in that work." But all these useful and, in some measure or other, indispensable qualities, are combined in the great majority of instances with very limited attainments and intellectual development, not to speak of temptations, from which men are exempt, to quit the profession at the earliest opportunity. The virtual monopoly by women of teaching in all the primary grades is therefore, perhaps, not wholly to be regarded with complacency; and although it certainly distinguishes American institutions from those of any other country that provides for popular instruction —notably from the Prussian school system—it ought not to be accepted as the equivalent of a service upon which each member enters for life, with a high degree of scholarly preparation, and sustained by the certainty of an honorable retirement with a pension when age shall have rendered him incapable of teaching any longer. Viewed in this light, the statistics referred to furnish one of the most forcible arguments for the higher education of all our women—using, we may say, that term in its widest acceptance.

—The Florence Diritto, a democratic paper with decided anti-Garibaldian leanings, declares that the chief fault of the press of Italy is its habit of discussing not principles but persons. It eschews study, the Diritto truly says, and sets little store by thought, and devotes itself to the easier labor of abusing this man and lauding that; the substance of things it shows a wonderful unwillingness to touch. The Diritto proposes, then, in order that this bad state of things may come to an end, that all the journalists of the kingdom should meet in convention and frame a set of rules for the securing of journalistic courtesy and fair play. The covenanters are to be put upon their honor not to disobey the provisions of the code thus made and adopted. No such rules will ever do much towards keeping journalists in order, and we fancy their practical effect among the Italian editors would hardly be more than this, that editorial duels, whether with pens or other weapons, would become considerably more frequent than they are now, a new field for wrangling being added to the arena already at their disposal. As was recently pointed out in these columns, Italy has so very few readers that very few of the journals are anything more than the organ of some one of the all but innumerable cliques into which Italian politicians are divided. The journalist there does not throw himself upon the general public, write to please them, and decline to be owned by a party or a set—probably he would starve if he tried to do so—he is hired to fight for some leader. Under such circumstances it is easy for journalism, even when it represents a leader who represents a great principle, to be personal and undignified. We all know that infinitely too much of the same thing is to be seen among us, and how it affects the character of our press we know. There is a kindred thing observed often among the smaller papers of the remoter districts, though by no means always among them only, which is highly amusing—not less amusing, we take it, to the fierce "gentlemen of the quill" themselves, when they consider of it, than to the distant spectator. We refer to the "dog-eat-dog" terms on which the rural editor is apt to live with his brethren. Never is he so vivacious in manner, so bold and full of glad activity, so efficacious, as when he has it in hand to expose the political, moral, social, even physical, deformities and shortcomings of "the knight of the scissors" who keeps the shop over the way. And in his less vigorous moments, when he declines battle and allows himself rest, his eye is still filled to a most remarkable extent with the doings of his kind. Next in importance to the political movements of the statesmen of his own party and the low demagogues of the other, he seems to estimate the activities of other editors like himself and journals like his own. We are in the habit of looking at dozens—we were going to say hundreds—of newspapers which are entirely made up of attacks on other papers, news about other papers, or "conveyings" from other papers. Most of it is done in good humor, however, and much of a carnage-lover and cannibal as he seems to be, the editor, small or great, at heart is generally at peace with the whole fraternity.

—There is a custom which we have observed in this State, in New Jersey, and in Pennsylvania, but nowhere in New England, among builders, of fastening a bush or small tree to the ridge-pole of a new house as soon as the rafters are raised. The last instance we noticed was of a ferry-house on the North River—a building far removed in sentiment from the home-dwelling with which, we suppose, the custom originated. In Switzerland, we believe, the same practice prevails. In an illustration to Uhland's "Zimmerspruch" which we find in the Familien-Zeitung, the roof is decked not with a bush, but with an elaborate dome of evergreen garlands, while an extemporized rustic quartette accompanies with music the master's invocation of God's blessing on the house yet open to rain and sunshine. The paper whose title we have quoted began to be published in this city on the 1st of June (Francis Hart & Co., 63 Cortlandt Street, and L. W. Schmidt, 24 Barclay Street), promising to appear fortnightly at the low price of six cents a number. The form is a sixteen-page quarto, and the first two numbers are very attractive in typography and in the illustrations, which are quite numerous. The prospectus foreshadows a paper of the same kind with those transatlantic publications which reach so wide a circulation in this country, made up mostly of stories, and more or less profuse in illustrations; but special pains will be taken to reproduce the best works of the authors and painters of the Fatherland. Accordingly portraits and biographical sketches are here given of Caspar Braun and Karl von Enhuber, artists scarcely known to the American public. There is also a wood engraving after E. Bosch, of Düsseldorf, who has tried to paint Oliver Twist learning bad ways in Fagan's den; but Fagan looks like a benevolent grandfather watching a game of blind-man's buff. Other engravings deal with current events, accidents, trials, street life, etc., etc. For a family journal the Zeitung makes rather a bad start in printing, as its first "editorial," an article on life insurance, and a thrilling story that runs through the first two numbers, and turns upon life insurance. We have in dubious connection with these a full-page advertisement of a well-known company of this city. In a more conspicuous place is an advertisement of a quack medicine.

—The Rev. Dr. Robert Vaughan, editor of the British Quarterly Review, and formerly Professor of Ancient and Modern History in the University of London, is recently dead. He was a very diligent worker, and produced a considerable number of works, chiefly historical, which ensure respect for his abilities and a certain degree of permanence for his name. Though a Nonconformist, and affiliated with the Liberal party in England, he took strong sides in his Review against the North in our late struggle; and when he visited this country, in 1866, was severely dealt with for his unfriendliness by Chaplain Quint, at the Congregational Council. He was at least seventy years of age when he died.

—A curious controversy has arisen in Berlin, owing to the declaration of Mr. Knak, a very orthodox member of the Synod, that he believed the earth stood still, and that the sun moved round it. This very unscientific doctrine finds its counterpart, to go no further back, in the edict of the first Alexander of Russia, that geology should not be so taught in the universities as to be inconsistent with the Book of Genesis. Mr. Knak, however, has a less tractable following than the Emperor, and no sooner had he made his remarkable delivery in the Synod than the agitation which had been for some time going on against the orthodox majority of that body broke out into a meeting in the Town-hall—into two meetings, attended by many eminent literary and scientific men, at which letters were read from Professor Raumer and President Lette. These resulted in a declaration which "concludes with the statement that the Holy Scriptures are the book of religious life, and not intended to give information respecting the laws of nature;" and that eppur si muove. To make sure of a fact so jealously guarded since Galileo's day, a hundred professors, academicians, schoolmasters, etc., subscribed to the declaration. It is said that the protest will not stop here, but is likely to raise the question of the influence of the clergy upon the schools.

—Two new weekly papers that have arisen in Paris under the new press law are to be styled the Electeur and the Tribune. The former is one of the names which has been slighted in this country, and the latter may or may not have been borrowed from Mr. Greeley's paper. MM. Jules Favre and Picard are the best-known names on the staff of the Electeur. A correspondent of the Daily News expresses some doubt as to the success of journals to which leading orators of the Corps Législatif contribute, and believes that these men will not long be content to repeat—and we should be disposed to add, to anticipate—their speeches in articles under their own signature. In France, however, the natural opposition between tongue and pen is perhaps less general than in any other country; and M. Eugène Pelletan, who is to write for the Tribune, is an instance of a deputy who passes from the Chamber to the printing-office, and back again to his bench, with no loss of power or of reputation. His acutest collaborateur is M. Glais-Bizoin, whose forte as a deputy consists in sharp interjections and queries when ministers are on their feet. In the same company appears Gen. Cluseret, who, since his return to France, has been writing for the Courrier Français. His checkered career while in this country is not yet forgotten: how he started the New Nation in the interest of Gen. Frémont, with whom he presently quarrelled irretrievably; how he kept a famous account-current with Gen. Grant from the Wilderness down, which the Democrats will do well to unearth, along with the editor's prophecies; and how he ended by turning Fenian, as the best opportunity of employing his military genius and making it recognized, and was to have commanded a Fenian force in Ireland. The Tribune has received permission to be sold in the streets while opposing the Government.

THE EARTHLY PARADISE.*

This new volume of Mr. Morris is, we think, a book for all time; but it is especially a book for these ripening summer days. To sit in the open shade, inhaling the heated air, and, while you read these perfect fairy tales, these rich and pathetic human traditions, to glance up from your page at the clouds and the trees, is to do as pleasant a thing as the heart of man can desire. Mr. Morris's book abounds in all the sounds and sights and sensations of nature, in the warmth of the sunshine, the murmur of forests, and the breath of ocean-scented breezes. The fulness of physical existence which belongs to climates where life is spent in the open air, is largely diffused through its pages:

> . . . "Hot July was drawing to an end,
> And August came the fainting year to mend
> With fruit and grain; so 'neath the trellises,
> Nigh blossomless, did they lie well at ease,
> And watched the poppies burn across the grass,
> And o'er the bindweed's bells the brown bee pass,
> Still murmuring of his gains: windless and bright
> The morn had been, to help their dear delight.
> . . . . . Then a light wind arose
> That shook the light stems of that flowery close,
> And made men sigh for pleasure."

This is a random specimen. As you read, the fictitious universe of the poem seems to expand and advance out of its remoteness, to surge musically about your senses, and merge itself utterly in the universe which surrounds you. The summer brightness of the real world goes half-way to meet it; and the beautiful figures which throb with life in Mr. Morris's stories pass lightly to and fro between the realm of poetry and the mild atmosphere of fact. This quality was half the charm of the author's former poem, "The Life and Death of Jason," published last summer. We seemed really to follow, beneath the changing sky, the fantastic boatload of wanderers in their circuit of the ancient world. For people compelled to stay at home, the perusal of the book in a couple of mornings was very nearly as good as a fortnight's holiday. The poem appeared to reflect so clearly and forcibly the poet's natural sympathies with the external world, and his joy in personal contact with it, that the reader obtained something very like a sense of physical transposition, without either physical or intellectual weariness. This ample and direct presentment of the joys of action and locomotion seems to us to impart to these two works a truly national and English tone. They taste not perhaps of the English soil, but of those strong English sensibilities which the great insular race carry with them through their wanderings, which they preserve and apply with such energy in every terrestrial clime, and which make them such incomparable travellers. We heartily recommend such persons as have a desire to accommodate their reading to the season—as are vexed with a delicate longing to place themselves intellectually in relation with the genius of the summer—to take this "Earthly Paradise" with them to the country.

The book is a collection of tales in verse—found, without exception, we take it, rather than imagined, and linked together, somewhat loosely, by a narrative prologue. The following is the "argument" of the prologue—already often enough quoted, but pretty enough, in its ingenious prose, to quote again:

> "Certain gentlemen and mariners of Norway, having considered all that they had heard of the Earthly Paradise, set sail to find it, and, after many troubles and the lapse of many years, came old men to some Western land, of which they had never before heard: there they died, when they had dwelt there certain years, much honored of the strange people."

The adventures of these wanderers, told by one of their number, Rolf the Norseman, born at Byzantium—a happy origin for the teller of a heroic tale, as the author doubtless felt—make, to begin with, a poem of considerable length, and of a beauty superior perhaps to that of the succeeding tales. An admirable romance of adventure has Mr. Morris unfolded in the melodious energy of this half-hurrying, half-lingering narrative—a romance to make old hearts beat again with the boyish longing for transmarine mysteries, and to plunge boys themselves into a delicious agony of unrest. The story is a tragedy, or very near it—as what story of the search for an Earthly Paradise could fail to be? Fate reserves for the poor storm-tossed adventurers a sort of fantastic compromise between their actual misery and their ideal bliss, whereby a kindly warmth is infused into the autumn of their days, and to the reader, at least, a very tolerable Earthly Paradise is laid open. The elders and civic worthies of the western land which finally sheltered them summon them every month to a feast, where, when all grosser desires have been duly pacified, the company sit at their ease and listen to the recital of stories. Mr. Morris gives in this volume the stories of the six midmonths of the year, two tales being allotted to each month—one from the Greek mythology, and one, to express it broadly, of a Gothic quality. He announces a second series in which, we infer, he will in the same manner give us the stories rehearsed at the winter fireside. The Greek stories are the various histories of Atalanta, of Perseus, of Cupid and Psyche, of Alcestis, of Atys, the hapless son of Crœsus, and of Pygmalion. The companion pieces, which always serve excellently well to place in relief the perfect pagan character of their elder mates, deal of course with elements less generally known.

"Atalanta's Race," the first of Mr. Morris's Greek legends, is to our mind almost the best. There is something wonderfully simple and child-like in the story, and the author has given it ample dignity, at the same time that he has preserved this quality. Most vividly does he present the mild invincibility of his fleet-footed heroine and the half-boyish simplicity of her demeanor—a perfect model of a belle inhumaine. But the most beautiful passage in the poem is the description of the vigil of the love-sick Milanion in the lonely sea-side temple of Venus. The author has conveyed with exquisite art the sense of devout stillness and of pagan sanctity which invests this remote and prayerful spot. The yellow torch-light,

> "Wherein with fluttering gown and half-bared limb
> The temple damsels sung their evening hymn;"

the sound of the shallow-flowing sea without, the young man's restless sleep on the pavement, besprinkled with the ocean spray, the apparition of the goddess with the early dawn, bearing the golden apple—all these delicate points are presented in the light of true poetry. The narrative of the adventures of Danaë and of Perseus and Andromeda is, with the exception of the tale of Cupid and Psyche which follows it, the longest piece in the volume. Of the two, we think we prefer the latter. Unutterably touching is the career of the tender and helpless Psyche, and most impressive the terrible hostility of Venus. The author, we think, throughout manages this lady extremely well. She appears to us in a sort of rosy dimness, through which she looms as formidable as she is beautiful, and gazing with "gentle eyes and unmoved smile,"

> "Such as in Cyprus, the fair-blossomed isle,
> When on the altar in the summer night
> They pile the roses up for her delight,
> Men see within their hearts."

"The Love of Alcestis" is the beautiful story of the excellent wife who, when her husband was ill, gave up her life, so that he might recover and live for ever. Half the interest here, however, lies in the servitude of Apollo in disguise, and in the touching picture of the radiant god doing in perfection the homely work of his office, and yet from time to time emitting flashes, as it were, of genius and deity, while the good Admetus observes him half in kindness and half in awe. The story of the "Son of Crœsus," the poor young man who is slain by his best friend because the gods had foredoomed it, is simple, pathetic, and brief. The finest and sweetest poem in the volume, to our taste, is the tale of "Pygmalion and the Image." The merit of execution is perhaps not appreciably greater here than in the other pieces, but the legend is so unutterably charming that it claims precedence of its companions. As beautiful as anything in all our later poetry, we think, is the description of the growth and dominance in the poor sculptor's heart of his marvellous passion for the stony daughter of his hands. Borne along on the steady, changing flow of his large and limpid verse, the author glides into the situation with an ease and grace and fulness of sympathy worthy of a great master. Here, as elsewhere, there is no sign of effort or of strain. In spite of the studied and recherché character of his diction, there is not a symptom of affectation in thought or speech. We seem in this tale of "Pgymalion" truly to inhabit the bright and silent workroom of a great Greek artist, and, standing among shapes and forms of perfect beauty, to breathe the incense-tainted air in which lovely statues were conceived and shining stones chiselled into immortality. Mr. Morris is indubitably a sensuous poet, to his credit be it said; his senses are constantly proffering their testimony and crying out their delight. But while they take their freedom, they employ it in no degree to their own debasement. Just as there is modesty of temperament we conceive there is modesty of imagination, and Mr. Morris possesses the latter distinction. The total absence of it is, doubtless, the long and short of Mr. Swinburne's various troubles. We may imagine Mr. Swinburne making a very clever poem of this story of "Pygmalion," but we cannot fancy him making it anything less than utterly disagreeable. The thoroughly agreeable way in which Mr. Morris tells it is what especially strikes us. We feel that his imagination is equally fearless and irreproachable, and that while he tells us what we may call a sensuous story in all its breadth, he likewise tells it in all its purity. It has, doubtless, an impure side; but of the two he prefers the other. While Pygmalion is all aglow with his unanswered passion, he one day sits down before his image:

* "The Earthly Paradise: A Poem. By William Morris, author of 'The Life and Death of Jason.'" Boston: Roberts Bros. 1868.

> "And at the last drew forth a book of rhymes,
> Wherein were writ the tales of many climes,
> And read aloud the sweetness hid therein
> Of lovers' sorrows and their tangled sin."

He reads aloud to his marble torment: would Mr. Swinburne have touched that note?

We have left ourselves no space to describe in detail the other series of tales—"The Man born to be King," "The Proud King," "The Writing on the Image," "The Lady of the Land," "The Watching of the Falcon," and "Ogier the Dane." The author in his "Jason" identified himself with the successful treatment of Greek subjects to such a degree as to make it easy to suppose that these matters were the specialty of his genius. But in these romantic modern stories the same easy power is revealed, the same admirable union of natural gifts and cultivated perceptions. Mr. Morris is evidently a poet in the broad sense of the word—a singer of human joys and sorrows, whenever and wherever found. His somewhat artificial diction, which would seem to militate against our claim that his genius is of the general and comprehensive order, is, we imagine, simply an achievement of his own. It is not imposed from without, but developed from within. Whatever may be said of it, it certainly will not be accused of being unpoetical; and except this charge, what serious one can be made? The author's style—according to our impression—is neither Chaucerian, Spenserian, nor imitative; it is literary, indeed, but it has a freedom and irregularity, an adaptability to the movements of the author's mind, which make it an ample vehicle of poetical utterance. He says in this language of his own the most various and the most truthful things; he moves, melts, and delights. Such, at least, is our own experience. Other persons, we know, find it difficult to take him entirely au sérieux. But we, taking him—and our critical duties too—in the most serious manner our mind permits of, feel strongly impelled, both by gratitude and by reflection, to pronounce him a noble and delightful poet. To call a man healthy nowadays is almost an insult—invalids learn so many secrets. But the health of the intellect is often promoted by physical disability. We say therefore, finally, that however the faculty may have been promoted—with the minimum of suffering, we certainly hope—Mr. Morris is a supremely healthy writer. This poem is marked by all that is broad and deep in nature, and all that is elevating, profitable, and curious in art.

BIGELOW'S FRANKLIN.*

Apparently Mr. William Temple Franklin was an early but well-developed specimen of the Cultivated American Gentleman, as we were wont to meet him in the marginal notes to articles in old English reviews. He used to hold "a recent conversation" with the reviewers, in which he deprecated the melancholy spirit of mob violence rampant in "The States." He had found it impossible to engage in politics in this country, because, had he attempted to do so, it would have been first necessary to submit himself in every way—socially, morally, intellectually—to the tyranny of the majority. Popular favor over here was to be secured only by slavish subserviency to the crude opinions of a herd which no man of education and refinement could respect. The Americans in general—the reviewer was compelled to believe after conversing with him, and extremely sorry he was to say so—were definitively opposed to the marriage relation, to the payment of taxes, to the stated preaching of the Gospel, except by the most ungrammatical persons, and to the wearing by anybody of any apparel not composed of undressed coon-skins. They worshipped nothing but money, for the acquisition of which idol they would do anything. For example, the rightful owner of the soil—the untutored Indian—in order that he might sign away all his lands, was frequently intoxicated with rum by the Federal Congress, and then was exposed to the contagion of the small-pox, and goaded into a declaration of war against his cold-blooded and more scientific neighbor. In short, if the reviewer had not been misinformed, several millions of people of English blood, having crossed the Atlantic, or having been born on the western side of that ocean, had utterly lost their respect and liking for intellect and for character, and developed a besotted fondness for mental and moral worthlessness, and an affection for the scum of Europe.

William Franklin, the son of the philosopher and the father of Temple Franklin, was never a loyalist; on the contrary, he was the last royalist governor of New Jersey, was imprisoned by Congress on account of his activity in opposition, and after the war lived and died in the mother country as a government pensioner. His son, so far as he took sides, was with his grandfather and the republicans; not, however, in perfect contentment. He thought the government had treated him unjustly; that he ought to have been sent abroad in a diplomatic capacity. So on his grandfather's decease, in 1790, he betook himself to England to his father, and was ever afterward as good an Englishman as being a soured American could make him. He had in his charge most of Benjamin Franklin's papers, and, among the rest, the manuscript of the famous "Autobiography." This he withheld from the public for more than a quarter of a century. There is a theory that he was bribed to this course by the British ministry, who were afraid of revelations from Franklin as to the secret history of the American war. The charge was more than once brought against him in his lifetime, and his indignant denial had small effect in disposing people to disbelieve it. Mr. Bigelow, though he does not formally adopt it, is inclined, apparently, to think it correct, and he adds something of importance to the evidence previously before us. He discovers in one of Temple Franklin's letters, written in England in 1791, a statement that he had just then received seven thousand pounds sterling, from some unnamed source and for a reason which was never made known. It is not unnatural to infer that probably this sudden sum of money was the consideration which moved young Franklin to make his surprising delay of twenty-six or twenty-seven years in publishing a work that adds so much to the honor of his name. It may, however, be an incorrect inference; we are inclined to think that it is. It is very likely that neither William Franklin nor his son was at all convinced that the "Autobiography" would add greatly to the honor of their name; that it would be for their best interests in English society to publish the story in which the great philosopher Franklin, the very ingenious Doctor Franklin, the profound statesman "qui eripuit fulmen cœlo sceptrumque tyrannis," and so forth, appears as a runaway apprentice, as a journeyman printer, as the son of a poor and dissenting mechanic, as bound in wedlock to a woman who, it was reasonably believed, had another husband knocking about the world somewhere—who, in short, to say the best of it, was a very unaristocratic progenitor to be acknowledged as an immediate ancestor by a gentleman who had been his Excellency the Governor, and had been widely pitied as a person who had been driven from a country where the mob had risen against their betters. William Franklin died in 1813, and we, for our part, imagine that had he lived four years longer we should have had no edition so early as "the edition of 1817." Then again, in considering the question of Temple Franklin's bribery, it must be borne in mind that the manuscript autobiography was by no means all of his grandfather's works that he had in his hands; there is no certainty that others of Franklin's papers may not have been dangerous, and may not have been purchased. It is hardly to be supposed that the British ministry gave pounds sterling by the seven thousand for the suppression of a work which they had not examined; it is no more to be supposed, we should say, that George the Third himself, had he been the examiner, would have recommended the outlay of more than sixpence or a shilling for the suppression of this particular work. It has no secret history in it, a good half of it was already in print in France, and it stops short in 1757, nearly twenty years before the War of the Revolution, and eight or ten years before the troubles began.

* "Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin. Edited from his Manuscript, with Notes and an Introduction. By John Bigelow." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

It must be remembered, too, that even if the publication of Franklin's memoirs had been laid on William Franklin and his son as a duty, it very likely would not have been regarded by them as a sacred duty. Judging from the "Autobiography," family affection among the prudent Franklins in general was not specially strong; and as to the particular case of William and his father, and Temple and his grandfather, we know that between the former pair there had been estrangement which lasted for years, and, indeed, never came to an end till the father's death ended it; and that young Temple is to be suspected of lukewarmness in affection, to say the least of it. William Franklin's disagreement with his father and his natural authority with Temple Franklin, who naturally let a live father weigh more with him than a dead grandfather—these things, and an unwillingness to make more manifest than could not be helped their ancestor's vulgarity in point of birth, and the course of his early life, seem to make the supposition of British gold unnecessary to account for the fact that it was not till 1817 that we had an authorized edition, and that when we did get it, it had been tampered with and made vastly more genteel than the author left it. "To William Franklin, Governor of New Jersey," the edition of 1817 begins. "Dear Son," without any title, was what the doctor wrote. "I was not a little surprised," the autograph reads in another place, "and Keimer stared like a pig poisoned." Keimer does nothing so ill-bred in the family edition—"Keimer stared with astonishment." Twelve hundred alterations the editor saw fit to make, all of them in the interest of polish and gentility, so that we may say that Mr. Bigelow has given us the "Autobiography" for the first time. It should be said to the credit of Temple Franklin, who, we dare say, was much tempted to do it, that he altered none of the facts of the story. He was culpably negligent and indifferent, however; his conduct as editor is very well reconcilable with the supposition that his grandfather had inspired him with little affection, and is hardly reconcilable with any other supposition. His twelve hundred alterations he must have made in the proof; the manuscript we should say that he had never carefully read, or, at any rate, that he had pretty thoroughly forgotten it. When, at last, he came to the point of printing, he begged M. Le Veillard—a French friend for whom Franklin had had made a copy, which Le Veillard kept with reverential care—to exchange copies with him—his reason being that the printer into whose hands he had put the original itself found Franklin's handwriting hard to make out—and M. Le Veillard's copy he made the basis of the authorized, Franklin family edition, although the least examination would have shown him that the original which he treated so lightly contained eight highly interesting pages, which Le Veillard's wanted.

Luckily, Mr. Bigelow, when in France as American minister, became aware of the existence of the Le Veillard manuscript, and succeeded in purchasing it. He has published it with a pleasant introduction; and, as we have said, has given us the "Autobiography" complete in English for the first time. The edition of 1817 was, as we have seen, defective in two ways—by senseless "improvements" in the text and by omissions—and the other editions in English followed that one, or else followed a translation of an early French edition which brought the memoirs down no farther than to 1730.

So much for this new edition, in which, for the first time, we get all that Franklin wrote, and all as he wrote it. Of the memoirs themselves—which are Franklin himself—it is late in the day to be saying anything. It is not only late, but nothing, perhaps, would be harder. To criticise it thoroughly, is to go to the bottom of things—to answer jesting Pilate and to find the summum bonum. From the beginning of the world till now, mankind divides into two classes, of which you may say that one are natural-born lovers and believers, and the other are natural-born haters and despisers of this "Autobiography." Is religion the policing of society, or is it more? Is the ideal the only real, or is it a more or less hateful delusion? What is God? The men "diligent in business"—of clear heads due to good digestions consequent on sagacious feeding—who finally "stand before princes" according to the text, are these the children of whom Wisdom is justified, or are they servants, not heirs? In short, is this world the be-all and the end-all and is "the beautifull regularity of Philadelphia" the be-all and the end-all of this world, or is the teacher who makes it so to be reviled as a hog of Epicurus's sty? It is as men answer these questions that they extol or abase Poor Richard. In fact, there are disciples who incline toward acceptation of the general doctrines of which our Philadelphia philosopher has fairly enough been made the representative, who yet yield him only a qualified fealty, and have helped as much as some of his natural enemies to keep his fame down. It is not given to the mass of mankind, only to one here and there, they say, to be "earthly" without fulfilling the whole of the scripture which reads "earthly, sensual, devilish." The earthiness of Mr. Parton's "greatest of Americans," unaccompanied by his weight of brain, is the mud and mire in which the race has been stalled since Adam, and which it is the labor of prophets, priests, poets, the poor metaphysician, and other non-producers, to lighten and brighten; and it would bother all the saints—of Positivism, we were going to say—of M. Comte's old age to "inform the clay" of more than a few of us if they had no more than a spark from Saint Franklin's easily accessible heavens.

Still, there is need of no quarrel between the disciples and the scoffers. Or, in the golden age, there will be no need. And Franklin will then get his due of praise as the most common-sensible of men in a world not ripe yet for pure common sense, and which, when it is ripe for that, as that is now known to us, will be ripe for something better. For "common sense" is in the nature of a means to an end, and how to attain that end perhaps Marcus Aurelius and others will teach us better than our good-natured, strong-bodied, strong-headed Philadelphia philosophe. But even now there is no great need of quarrel. It ought to be quite possible, we suppose, for Mr. Bronson Alcott, of Concord, to agree with Mr. Bigelow when he frames a wish for "the rising generation of Americans" that they may "study the lessons of humility, economy, industry, toleration, charity, and patriotism which are made so captivating in this 'Autobiography.'" The transcendentalist, when he sees the world sinking into base prosperity, and feeding fat under the shrines of the housekeeping gods, may comfort himself with the remarks of his own Saadi concerning the relation between the manure and the roses. "The intelligent are aware," says Saadi, "that the zeal of devotion is made warmer by good fare, and the sincerity of piety rendered more serene in a nicety of vesture: for he that is poor is well-nigh being an infidel;" and it will be a sad day for loathed materialism when we all have walked with Poor Richard far enough to have got ahead of the world.

ARKISM.*

Mr. Lesley delivered his course of lectures on "Man's Origin"—we omit the following two words of the title-page, which the author also ought to have omitted—in the winter of 1865–6. Two years passed before they were committed to print. In the meanwhile, new discoveries in archæology had been made, which demanded numerous changes in the text, additions and omissions, and, in fact, the sacrifice of "the simplicity of the original arrangement." "Portions of the book," therefore, now "take on the aspect of detailed discussion, suitable only to a scientific memoir, while other portions retain their original character of bird's-eye view." Nothing, we further learn from the preface, "beyond a general sketch of the present bearings of science" upon the theme of the lectures was contemplated. "Nothing is closely reasoned out. Much is left to the original instinct, and more to the literary education of the reader."

This preliminary account of the nature and object of his labors is, however, hardly justified by the book itself, which has in reality the tone and air of a treatise de omni scibili. There is hardly any subject in the whole field of knowledge on which it does not touch, and not lightly or doubtingly, but with emphasis and confidence. Hardly any of the great problems of science or history are passed over or left in shadow. In fact, we do not think we are doing Mr. Lesley injustice when we say that he leaves little or nothing to either the reader's "original instinct," whatever that may be, or to his literary education. He presents him with a clean-cut theory on nearly every vexed question, whether in geology, palæontology, archæology, philology, zoölogy, mental and moral philosophy, or, finally, on "Arkism," "the most ancient symbolism of the priesthood," and he unquestionably brings to the work the results of great and varied reading; but we feel bound to say that, although Mr. Lesley's eminence in certain fields of science is well established, he seems in the present undertaking to have put away from him the larger portion of his scientific spirit. We might almost fill a volume with illustrations of what we consider over-confident presentation of doubtful matters, and incorrect presentation of matters which are not at all doubtful, but which Mr. Lesley does not seem to have given himself the trouble to master. In fact, the lectures might pass under the form of rambles among the sciences, by a man of culture and imagination, for the entertainment of a popular audience of limited education in winter evenings, but they are not what a scientific man of Mr. Lesley's standing ought to offer to the world as his sober and revised utterances on a theme so tremendous as "man's origin and destiny."

* "Man's Origin and Destiny, sketched from the Platform of the Sciences in a Course of Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute, in Boston, in the Winter of 1865-6. By J. P. Lesley, Member of the National Academy of the United States, Secretary of the American Philosophical Society." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

We cannot, of course, pretend to follow him through all his devious wanderings, or criticise all his assertions and generalizations, particularly as he claims for a large portion of his performance simply the character of a "bird's-eye view." But we will test him on one subject in which he descends into "detailed discussion." The point toward which everything converges in his disquisitions — which he unfolds, develops, and elaborates, following the traces of "the Hebrew Scriptures, of the Talmuds, of the Cabbalists, of the Freemasons, of Jacob Bryant, Harcourt, Davis, and Faber"—is "the system of Arkite symbolism; the religious representation of the ark of Noah, the water on which it floated, the mountain on which it rested, and the man whom it preserved." He is no believer in the deluge—"a phenomenon which we well know to be physically impossible"—but he finds the belief in it spread all over the world; he finds "the worship of the mountain, ship, and flood" embodied in the architectures, Pantheons, and creeds, the names, languages, and literatures, the fables, sagas, and mysteries, the institutions, games, and customs of all continents, countries, and ages. Arkism, he believes, is a key to numberless riddles of ethnology and philology and archæology, and he looks down with contempt upon the cultivators of those sciences who reject or ignore it. "I do not at all agree," he says, "with the common explanations of the Hindu mythology, as published by Muir, Max Müller, and other Sanscrit scholars. Their theories seem to me to have no system. I think it is because they have no basis. They have not yet the key-note." He almost pities such lexicographers as Gesenius and the "philologists of Professor Whitney's school," who "forget all about the priests," and ignore that element in language which he calls "the bardic element, because it consists of words invented by bards (poet-historians and poet-priests of old times), an element produced by the cultivation of the civilized intellect; an element of religious, moral, and social terminology, which now forms the chief and almost the sole bond of communion between the various languages of the earth." The soul of that element is Arkism. It is well, then, to see some specimens of Mr. Lesley's Arkite expositions, particularly after this cool disposal of Max Müller, Professor Whitney, and other simple-minded philologists.

One of the most ancient sagas of the cyclic poets is the story of Pelops. Tantalus, his father, had two children, Pelops and Niobe, and was in the habit of giving entertainments to the gods, who enjoyed his hospitality. But he blabbed their secrets, and finally cooked the boy, Pelops, and served him as a bouilli. The immortals found it out after eating Pelops' shoulder off, and sent Tantalus to hell, where he stands up to his lips in water, but unable to quench his raging thirst, and with a stone hanging over his head constantly threatening to crush him. Pelops, on the other hand, had an ivory shoulder put in by Mercury, and was taken charge of by Neptune, who finally restored him to his father's throne, and his descendants reigned at Argos. Niobe, the sister, had her children killed by Diana, was turned into a stone, and now sits in monumental misery on the top of a mountain in Phrygia. This story, Mr. Lesley asserts, is the counterpart to the Biblical legend of Noah and Mount Ararat, and this is how he proves it:

"Tantal-us represents the TOR, or mountain, submerged to its very lips. The stone above his head is the ark about to touch the mountain-top. Tantalus is in Tartarus; is, in fact, the same as Tartarus, the place of Torture, the cavern in the mountain, the home of mysteries and horrors and woes, the hölle, hole, or hell of the Germanic nations. Niobe, the daughter of the mountain, is again the ark, turned to stone; her name, Niôb, is the Egyptian word Θεβ, the ark of Osiris, and the Hebrew word Theba, Noah's ark. The Greek TAURUS, a mountain, is the Arabic TEL or TOL, a mountain. But the Shemitic nations wrote all their words backward, from right to left, and so this word TOL becomes LOT, whose wife (her name is nowhere given) was also turned, like Niobe, to stone. Pelops, Niobe's brother, was the Noah of the story. First, his father offered him up to the gods, as the Brahma of the Hebrews offered up his son Ikswaca (Isaac). Neptune, or the rising deluge, carried him up in the golden car (the ark) to the top of Olympus, until his father was destroyed, that is, until the Ararat was sunk to his very lips in the hell of waters. Then he was restored. His descendants reigned in Argos; they were priests of Arkism. He himself became the divinity of the TOR, the city of Troy," and so on, ad infinitum et ad nauseam.

Here we see Tan-tal-us represents the mountain of the ark, because "tel and tol" is "the Arabic for mountain." But tel, and not tol, is the Arabic for mountain, and our author puts in "tol" of his own mere motion, merely to bring about a greater resemblance to tor, which, he says, is the Phœnician word for "mountain," a supposition which he probably bases on the name "Tyre" (Hebrew Tzor), compared with the Chaldee tur, mountain. Tantalus thus represents the mountain, because tel is the Arabic word for mountain. But "Tantalus is in Tartarus; is, in fact, the same as Tartarus." And what is "Tartarus"? Why, "the place of tor-ture," to be sure. Now, non-Arkite philologists have always supposed that *tor*ture came from the Latin *tor*queo, to twist or wrench, but the error may give them a faint idea how much they have to learn.

What part does Niobe play in this interpretation? Our readers will be surprised to learn that she also is "the ark," sharing that honor with the stone which overhangs Tantalus's head. Her name, too, we learn from Mr. Lesley, is simply the Hebrew word teba—meaning ark in general, and not Noah's only—we suppose because there is the sound b in both. Mr. Lesley's discovery that the name Lot is derived from the Arabic tel, a mountain, "because Shemitic nations wrote all their words backward," is something on which we cannot bind ourselves to offer any observations, as it opens up a field to philological enquirers such as few of them have certainly ever dreamt of. We have always known that Eastern nations wrote from right to left, but the assertion that the Shemitic people "wrote their words backward" is the greatest contribution made to this field of science since the discovery of Sanscrit. Nay, psychologists may examine the phenomenon with no small profit.

Pelops was the Noah of the story, his father serving him up to the gods as a ragout, just as Abraham—a descendant of Noah—offered up his son. Olympus, we read in another passage, was "the Ararat of Europe." It "was called OLUMpos," corresponding with the "Latin word for formerly or in ancient times . . . OLIM," "with the word ALP," and with "the English word ARM, . . . precisely as the Hebrew dor, an arm, corresponded to the Phœnician tor, and the Arabic tel, a mountain." It is true the word for arm in Hebrew is not dor, but zeroa or ezroa; but the corresponding Chaldee word has a d instead of the z, which may suffice in Arkite philology. That Pelops' descendants reigned in Argos suffices to declare them priests of Arkism—though the Greek word for ark is κιβωτος. That "the Tor" was the city of Troy is proved to us by the name of Hec-tor, "the Lord of the Tor"—though we find tor also in names of enemies of Troy, like Nestor and Mentor. Peloponnesus is designated "Pelops' ship, or Pelops' isle," νησος meaning isle—though not ship.

In this way, so much more ingenious and fanciful than ingenuous, Mr. Lesley proceeds throughout his work, etymologizing, mythologizing, and ethnologizing in a most wondrous strain, and piling up conclusions which the overwhelmed critic must decline to examine. Tor, with Ark and Teb, two words for Noah's vessel, and a few related syllables, are made to explain thousands of things. The Dorians, we thus learn, "were worshippers of the TOR;" "the Doric column is channelled like a mountain with valleys. The Doric channels are the radius descending to the water." The Roman capital was not so named because it was the caput or capital of the city, but because it represented the cap of the tol, "the ship upon the mountain-top;" it being so easy to "identify cap with ship." Druids were men "of the TOR-TREE, i. e., the oak," which was called by the Greeks "the mountain, δρυς, TORUS." An altar is "the mountain," "al-tor"—al being the Arabic definite article. The "shaft of the Toric [Doric] column, στυλη" (sic); the "table, . . . . the altar of love (al TOR), the tabor of home life;" the "S-tool on which the mother sets her feet;" "Stol . . . the universal Sclavonic word for table"—are all derived by our book from tor and tel, so that the s is a prefix or denominative sign, and not a radical element of the word, Mr. Lesley wisely omitting to compare such words as Gr. στοα, pillar; ἱ-στη-μι, στη-σω, to set; Heb. shith, to erect, to set, shath, pillar; Lat. sta-re, to stand, sed-ere, to sit, sta-tuo, to set, to erect, sisto, statum, to set; Ger. steh-en, to stand, sitz-en, to sit, setz-en, to set, stell-en, to set; Slav. sta-c, sta-ty, to stand, sied-zic, sidy-ety, to sit, stav-ic, stav-ity, to set, stan, stand, stul, stool, chair; our stand, sit, set, seat, etc., in all of which ST is the radical element. "ORACulum is an Arkite thing," and thus not derived from orare, as periculum from periri, or curriculum from currere. E-rigere—unlike e-ripere, e-rumpere, di-rigere, etc.—we are told to consider as Arkite, because "the Latins said ERiGere, as we still say EReCt."

The Greek word for dove, περιστερα, was both Arkite and Toric, for it signified, says our book, "the βαρις of the Tor, the ship of the rock." So is, we are told, the German Tur-tel-taube (our turtle-dove), which is so fortunate as to embrace in its syllables the tor, tel, and teb of the Phœnicians, Arabs, and Hebrews, an honor which cannot be claimed by the turtle-shell. The s-til-ted s-tor-k, we learn further, is "the bird of the mystic TOR." "You may see it drawn . . . . sitting on a black pyramid" or "BAR-BAR of old Egypt," for "πυρμιδ is directly convertible into βαρβαρ," and "bar-bar-ous"—in Arkite philology—means "pyramidal." Arkite philology also discovers in a Greek Centaur, "half man, half horse," a priest of the mountain; in the name of the Swiss, Tell, "a purely Arkite look;" and another Arkism in the name of Diogenes, the "Goddess (sic)-born," who "dogmatized in a tub," which is an Arkite thing.

We are also taught to "recognize in Vishnu the Fish-Noah." (So we might recognize Noah's ark in New-Ark—NU-ARK—and New-York—NEWy-ORK—and the ark of man (Chal. Anash) in Ark-ans-as).

We have mentioned above several intentional inaccuracies. There are others. To make the Hebrew barzel, iron, convertible into Sil-ber, silver, it is (at one place) spelled bersil (p. 171). Sheshai is rendered SSI to make it resemble Susim (p. 148)—which in correct Hebrew is Zuzim. That "Mim is the Hebrew name for the waters of the sea" (p. 278), is required by the context, but is doubly incorrect; mayim is water in general. "Jehovah" is changed into "Ihoua," to bring about a resemblance to "the Great Hou" (p. 305). In referring to Numbers (xiii. 22), the words "by them" are added to confirm a theory (p. 144). Our Canaan, for the Hebrew Kenaan, is spelled Cainan for the sake of Cain (p. 358). A "Hebrew name of the jackal, TAB," is mentioned in connection with other tabs (p. 321), which, if not an invention, is a singular formed from a mistaken plural, tab-im for tan-im, jackals, the Hebrew non-final n resembling the b in bad prints. Oren, to confirm its correspondence with urna, etc., is designated the "tree of which idols were made," though the verse quoted from Isaiah has several names of trees (p. 339). A part of these misrepresentations, however, may possibly be ascribed to the author's scanty knowledge of Hebrew, and Hebrew matters in general, which he treats with exceeding superficiality, whether speaking of Abraham, who is a myth, a Brahma, and yet has a date (p. 283); or of the Mosaic monotheism; or of the "Psalms of David," the age of which he seems entirely to misapprehend; or of Solomon, who appears in various shapes; or of Zoroastrianism in connection with Judaism. But we have no excuse for misstatements like the following: "The poets before Homer and Hesiod were known as cyclic poets" (p. 215); "the earliest of them was called Arctinus." There are others of the same kind, but we have no room for further specifications.

We have only to express once more, in conclusion, our great regret that such a performance should have come from the pen of a scientific man of Mr. Lesley's standing. If it were simply a composition produced by a "belles-lettres scholar," as a jeu d'esprit, it might pass; but to have "Man's Origin and Destiny" treated in this way by a Member of the National Academy of the United States and Secretary of the American Philosophical Society, is really too bad.

Words from the Poets. Selected by C. M. Vaughan. (London: Macmillan & Co. New York: Pott & Amery. 1868.)—The principle of selection acted on in the compilation of this volume was to select not the consummate flowers of poetry for trained lovers of it, but to take pleasing pieces, "healthy in tone and just in sentiment, elevating in thought, beautiful in expression," capable of interesting the children of English parochial schools and the class of people represented by such pupils. It is very well adapted to that end. Mr. Vaughan has trusted with a wise confidence in the generally elevating effect of beautiful things, and has no desire to make poetry preach direct sermons. And he has not been careful to select such pieces as a National School girl might have written, such as are rather below her capacity to appreciate than above it.

It is a book prepared for the English market, so it contains nothing distinctively American, and a little it does contain that is distinctively English. The honor of the first page is accorded to "Rule Britannia." But it is true to say that, on the whole, the book is as much worth liking and will do as much good here as anywhere else where the English language is spoken. And even the American who takes a narrower view may properly introduce it among his patriotic young; Longfellow disputes with Wordsworth the place of most prominence; Mrs. Sigourney appears as well as Mrs. Hemans; Percival, Frances Osgood, Sprague, and Goodrich are to be found along with Rogers, Cowper, Hood, and the rest. Briefly, it is a pretty collection; if all our school children knew it by heart they would be the better, and it is worth their fathers' and mothers' liking.

The Book of Evergreens: A Practical Treatise on the Coniferæ or Cone-bearing Plants. By Josiah Hoopes, of the Phila. Academy of Natural Sciences. (New York: O. Judd & Co.)—A convenient manual of information about coniferous trees, mainly compiled from works of a larger, more purely scientific, and more costly character. The classification adopted is simple, and will be satisfactory to nurserymen. Those who hope for instruction in regard to the character of the recently introduced evergreens, when mature, with reference to their use in landscape composition, will be generally disappointed. The author might easily have obtained much better information than he has done about many, and, by doing so, would have much increased the value of his book to a large class of readers. Observations in regard to the color, form, and habit of young plants of coniferous trees are likely to be very deceptive when applied to old ones. For example, young trees of Pinus Sabiniana sometimes present "a compact mass of deep green verdure gracefully extending to the ground," and if the full-grown trees could be expected to be of this description, Mr. Hoopes might be justified in saying that no other evergreen is more desirable. But the fact is far otherwise. Long before the tree reaches its full size, its foliage becomes excessively thin and dull and feeble in color, so that for landscape purposes it is the most worthless of the pines.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. |
|---|---|
| Benedict (E. C.), A Run through Europe | (A. S. Barnes & Co.) |
| Braddon (Miss M. E.), Dead-Sea Fruit | (Harper & Bros.) $0 50 |
| Bulwer Lytton (Sir E.), A Strange Story, and The Haunted and the Haunters | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50 |
| Johnson (Rev. S.), The Worship of Jesus | (Wm. V. Spencer) 0 50 |
| Macé (J.), History of a Mouthful of Bread | (Harper & Bros.) 1 75 |
| The Servants of the Stomach | (Harper & Bros.) 1 75 |
| Mallary (Mrs. M. J.), Horace Wilde: a Tale | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) 1 50 |
| Scott (Sir W.), Bride of Lammermoor, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) 0 25 |
| Complete Works, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) 1 50 |
| Simpson (R.), Introduction to the Philosophy of Shakespeare's Sonnets | (Trübner & Co.) |

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. Cloth, price $1 50.

CATSKILL MOUNTAINS,

And the Region around; their Scenery, Legends, and History. By Rev. CHARLES ROCKWELL. Cloth, price $2.

The above books mailed free on receipt of price.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,

678 Broadway, New York.

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

Booksellers and Bookbuyers, Librarians and Teachers, Lawyers and Doctors,

ARE REQUESTED TO SEND FOR THE

PUBLISHERS' TRADE LIST DIRECTORY, NOW READY.

It embraces all the WORKS, old and new, published by over two hundred houses, classified and arranged so their specialty can be determined, and correspondence with the houses named will give the enquirer all the information desired. All the best theological and religious books, literary, scientific, law, and medical works, can be found in its pages. Fiction and belles-lettres, from Dime Novels to the higher order of light literature, are represented. It is indispensable for

BOOKSELLERS,
LIBRARIANS, and
BOOKBUYERS,

in making up orders or desiring to learn the prices of books. Price, $5 cloth, or $3 in paper.

HOWARD CHALLEN, Publisher,

PHILADELPHIA.

REMOVAL.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1868.

ALLEN EBBS,

IMPORTER OF

FINE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Has removed from 183 Broadway to

75 CHAMBERS STREET,

One door west of Broadway.

A. E. has lately received from London a most elegant collection of fine Books.

WHITTIER'S BAREFOOT BOY.

L. PRANG & CO. have now ready, the fourth edition of Eastman Johnson's poetical illustration of Whittier's famous poem of "THE BAREFOOT BOY;" one of the most charming genre pictures ever painted in this country. The first three editions of this chromo were sold in advance of publication.

THE POET, John G. Whittier, says of our chromo: "Your admirable chromo of 'The Barefoot Boy' . . . is a CHARMING illustration of my little poem, and in EVERY WAY SATISFACTORY as a work of art."

THE PAINTER, Eastman Johnson, writes of our chromo: "It strikes me as being one of the best chromo-lithographs I have ever seen."

Sold at all Art Stores, or sent by express, free of charge, to any address in the U. S. East of the Mississippi, on receipt of price.

Size 9¾ x 13. Price Five Dollars.

L. PRANG & CO., Art Publishers, Boston.

DISSECTION AND REVIEW OF THE Dalcho Circular of 1802, an interesting paper to Freemasons generally, in American Freemason for July. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 50 cents, by J. F. BRENNAN, Secretary A. M. P. A., 114 Main Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ORIGIN OF KNIGHT TEMPLARISM in America, a valuable paper, in American Freemason for July. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 50c., by J. F. BRENNAN, Secretary A. M. P. A., 114 Main Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

LADIES' FREEMASONRY IN FRANCE, an exciting story, in American Freemason for July. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 50 cents, by J. F. BRENNAN, Secretary A. M. P. A., 114 Main Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

DID STEPHEN MORIN'S MASONRY have twenty-five degrees? Examined and answered in the negative in American Freemason for July. Mailed to any address on receipt of price, 50 cents, by J. F. BRENNAN, Secretary A. M. P. A., 114 Main Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

BISHOP ON CRIMINAL LAW.—NEW EDITION.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON,

PUBLISH THIS WEEK:

COMMENTARIES ON THE CRIMINAL LAW. By JOEL PRENTISS BISHOP, Esquire. Fourth edition, revised. 2 vols. 8vo, law sheep, $15.

In this edition all new and important cases have been cited. References have been made to various cases and points which were intended originally for the work on Criminal Procedure, published since the last edition of this book, but which it seemed best to insert here. The two works are thus made to cover the whole field of Criminal Law and Practice. In other respects this treatise has been revised in every section, cases previously omitted have been adduced, and the statement of the doctrine has been recast whenever the text could be made plainer or strength could be added to the notes. Nearly a thousand new cases have been cited, and the variations in the language are too many to be estimated in numbers. The principal object of the latter has been to present the idea with greater distinctness, and in a form more nicely exact.

The work is submitted to the profession with great confidence as a substantial improvement on the preceding edition, and as a real help to students and practitioners.

JUST PUBLISHED:

STORY ON PARTNERSHIP. New Edition.

COMMENTARIES ON THE LAW OF PARTNERSHIP, as a Branch of Commercial and Maritime Jurisprudence, with Occasional Illustrations from the Civil and Foreign Law. By JOSEPH STORY, LL.D. Sixth edition. Edited by JOHN C. GRAY, JR., of the Boston Bar. 8vo, $7 50.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW. Vol. II., No. 4. Subscription $5 per annum; single numbers, $1 25.

"'A LIBRARY IN ITSELF."

COMPLETION OF CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

NOW READY,

The Tenth and Concluding Volume

OF

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA,

A DICTIONARY OF

UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE.

ILLUSTRATED WITH

MAPS AND NUMEROUS WOOD ENGRAVINGS.

IN TEN VOLUMES ROYAL OCTAVO.

Price per vol., cloth, $4 50; sheep, $5; half turkey, $5 50.

The Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that they have just issued the concluding Part of CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA, and that the work is now complete in TEN ROYAL OCTAVO VOLUMES, of over 800 pages each, illustrated with about 4,000 engravings, and accompanied by

AN ATLAS OF NEARLY FORTY MAPS; the whole, it is believed, forming the most complete work of reference extant.

The design of this work, as explained in the Notice prefixed to the first volume, is that of a DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE—not a mere collection of elaborate treatises in alphabetical order, but a work to be readily consulted as a DICTIONARY on every subject on which people generally require some distinct information. Commenced in 1859, the work is now brought to a close in 1868, and the Editors confidently point to the Ten Volumes of which it is composed as forming the most COMPREHENSIVE—as it certainly is the CHEAPEST—ENCYCLOPÆDIA ever issued in the English language.

 Copies of the work will be sent to any address in the United States, free of charge, on receipt of the price by the Publishers.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT

451 Broome Street, N. Y.

NEW BOOKS.

I.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER. By HENRY ALFORD, D.D., Dean of Canterbury. Being an Abridgment of "The Year of Prayer," by the same author. 32mo, cloth, neat, price 50 cents.

II.

WIND-WAFTED SEED. Edited by NORMAN MACLEOD, D.D., and THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

III.

THE CHRIST OF HISTORY. An Argument grounded in the Facts of His Life on Earth. By JOHN YOUNG, LL.D. Fifth edition, revised, with an Appendix, containing a brief criticism of M. Renan's "Vie de Jésus." Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

IV.

STUDIES OF CHARACTER FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D., Editor of "The Sunday Magazine." Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

 Any of the above works will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome St., New York.

THE NATION'S POOR.

The New York Branch of the Association for Educating the Blacks of the South has reached the end of its Sixth Annual School term with an exhausted treasury. It has not the means of bringing home the devoted band of women who, for the past nine months, have given up all the comforts of their own quiet Northern homes to work for the education of the nation's wards—a work carried on in the face of many privations, and in some places in opposition to the active enmity of the so-called "better class." During the past season, as in the previous ones, the society has educated many thousands of children and some hundreds of adults, and the Trustees confidently believe that, of the money entrusted to their care, not a dollar has been wasted. But the receipts of the past three months have not equalled the promises at the time of the opening of the schools last fall, and the Trustees are now compelled to ask all who feel an interest in this great work and in its continuance, to contribute without delay such amount as they may be willing to give, sending it either to FRANCIS GEO. SHAW, President, 30 Vesey Street; or EDW. F. DAVISON, Treasurer, 128 Pearl Street.

NEW YORK, July 1, 1868.

THE MASS. INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY offers a thorough and practical general education, founded upon the Mathematical, Physical, and Natural Sciences, English and other Modern Languages, and Mental and Political Science; also, a full course of Studies and Practical Exercises for students preparing for the professions of the Civil, Mechanical, and Mining Engineer, Chemist, Metallurgist, and Architect.

The course extends through four years, the studies of the first and second being common to all, those of the third and fourth selected to suit the profession in view.

Minimum age of admission, sixteen. Entrance examinations are held July 13 and September 28. For fees and other particulars address "Prof. WILLIAM P. ATKINSON, Secr'y of Faculty Mass. Inst. of Technology, Boston." WILLIAM B. ROGERS, President.

SHEFFIELD SCIENTIFIC SCHOOL OF YALE COLLEGE.

This department of Yale College, under the direction of President Woolsey, and Professors Dana, Norton, Lyman, Silliman, Whitney, Brush, Gilman, Johnson, Brewer, Rockwell, Eaton, Marsh, and Verrill, furnishes regular and special courses of instruction in Chemistry and Metallurgy, Civil, Mining, and Mechanical Engineering, Agriculture, Natural History, etc. For circulars address Prof. D. C. Gilman, Sec., New Haven, Conn.

TO LITERARY MEN.—A gentleman whose sympathies are with the Republican cause, competent to discuss current national topics, and qualified to assist in the editorial management of a daily newspaper in Philadelphia, may hear of an engagement by addressing with real name E. W., Post-office box 2679, Philadelphia, Pa.

AMENIA SEMINARY,

AMENIA, N. Y.,

REFITTED. Fall Term begins SEPTEMBER 8.

S. T. FROST, A.M.,

Principal and Proprietor.

The Nation.

This Journal commences its Seventh Volume with the first issue of July, 1868. It has a well-established character as a political, social, and literary force, a medium for the best talent of the country, and a representative of national principles; while its absolute independence has, the Publishers believe, won it the respect and confidence of men of all parties. Its increased circulation among Clergymen of every denomination is proof of its value for the class of public teachers; and for the sake of its still wider diffusion among them the Publishers offer to send the paper free, and postage prepaid, for one month, to any clergyman wishing to make a trial of it with a view to subscribing.

The Publishers are constantly assured by Advertisers of the profitable returns from their advertisements in the Nation, the circulation of which is considerably larger than that of any similar weekly published in this country. Book publishers in every part of the Union, principals of schools, makers and exhibitors of works of art, will find it peculiarly to their advantage to advertise in the Nation. Full particulars of terms, etc., given by circular.

CONTENTS OF No. 157:

The Week.
"What is the Presidential Contest to be About?"
The Republican Party and the Caucus System.
The Labor Crisis.
Prandial Literature.
English Letter.
Letter from Crete.
Literary Notes.
The Spanish Gypsy.
Medical Instruction for Daughters.
New Jersey and the Rebellion.
Books of the Week.
The Fine Arts of Japan.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT

3 Park Place,

New York City.

 Persons wishing to dispose of the first seven numbers of Vol. I. can do so at the office of the Nation.

The Nation.

VOL. VII —NO. 159. THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 41
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Work of the Convention ..... 44
Our National Poverty ..... 45
Recent Warnings to the Corrupt ..... 46
Mr. Fessenden and the Bostonians .... 47
A Look at the Convention ..... 48
NOTES:
Literary ..... 49
Moral Medication ..... 50
George Sand's Mademoiselle Merquem .. 52
Pomeroy's Constitutional Law ..... 53
Daisy.—The Poetical Works of Sir Walter Scott.—Pictorial History of the Civil War in the United States ..... 55
Harper's Phrase-Book.—Russian and English Phrase-Book.—Aldeane.—Books of the Week ..... 56
FINE ARTS:
The Fine Arts of Japan ..... 56

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

CONGRESS has been hard at work during the week, and has disposed of a large number of private and public bills. Mr. Sherman's Funding Bill was passed in the Senate on Tuesday, with some modifications. Mr. Butler's bill to tax the interest on the bonds has been quietly killed, and will have to take some new form before it will again be heard of. The Electoral College Bill, amended, was passed in the Senate by a vote of 28 to 5, and in the House by 112 to 21. Mr. Johnson will of course veto it, and it will, no doubt, be at once passed. As before, when it appeared as a joint resolution, the bill had Mr. Trumbull's opposition. Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana being already present in Congress in the persons of their representatives, and having otherwise complied with the conditions laid down in the bill, it seems strange that there should have been any thought of including them in a bill whose justification is that some bill is necessary for the prevention of doubt and confusion next March. Every argument for the passage of such a measure is an argument against making it wider than is necessary, and we are unable to see why, if Florida is put in, Tennessee should be left out. The Freedmen's Bureau goes out of existence—except as regards its function of educating the children—on the first of January next, in all the States which are by that time fully restored. Mr. Garfield, of the Military Committee, has had the pleasure, as Mr. Schenck had the other week, of seeing his work taken out of his hands and altered by Mr. Butler. We are unable to say that Mr. Butler's alterations were not improvements. He still further reduced the number of major-generals and brigadiers, already made small by Mr. Garfield's bill—made quite as small, Mr. Garfield would probably say, as the exigencies of the service permit. However, Mr. Butler, with the help of the Democrats, got his amendment through. The army is shrunk by the new bill to something like 25,000 men. Mr. Reverdy Johnson on Thursday bade farewell to his fellow-senators, and being unable to read his remarks prepared for the occasion, they were read for him by Senator Vickers. The proceedings of the Democratic Convention were discussed in both House and Senate as soon as the names of the nominees were known. The tall talk of General Blair's letter gave occasion to draw once more the old line, and the discussion turned on treason and loyalty. Evidently the Republican Senators and Representatives are very well satisfied that they are to fight Seymour, and will not feel so much anxiety to adjourn and take the stump as they might have felt if the Democrats had taken Chase or Hancock or Hendricks. On Tuesday the House voted to pay for Alaska.

---

The party generally throughout the country is of the same mind, so far as we can judge from the newspapers, whether Democratic or Republican. The World is "trembling with courage," and boldly assumes the election of its candidate; speaking of him as President Seymour, making remarks about his cabinet, and even awarding the succession to Mr. Pendleton. Its abuse of Grant is another indication of its confidence in the result. But the Democratic press generally is not enthusiastic at all. On the other hand, the Republicans congratulate each other on the now perfectly assured success of Grant and Colfax—although, as the Tribune showed the other day, a change of about thirty-six thousand in the popular vote of 1864 would have made McClellan President, though he carried but three States in the electoral college. We shall, however, we have no doubt, see work enough done in the course of the next three months. While the convention was in session, and ever since, the weather in this region has been of such almost unexampled severity of heat that we see not many signs as yet of the liveliness that was expected to mark the Republican camp as soon as the Democrats had put their man up. It is too hot for anything more than the quietest of quiet satisfaction that Seymour is the nominee.

---

The only person who can really be said to have suffered seriously at the hands of the Convention is Chief-Justice Chase. In spite of all his efforts, and in spite too of the amazing readiness he displayed during the last few days to swallow Democratic propositions, no matter how bristly or how sinuous, he did not obtain any higher recognition than four votes. Had he got the nomination he would have incurred dislike and contempt in about equal proportions. As it is, although he is just as bad as if he had succeeded, we fancy the contempt largely preponderates in the popular feeling about him. He has the satisfaction of knowing, too, that he has destroyed popular confidence in his decisions, and that no weight whatever will hereafter attach to any judgment of his on any one of the great constitutional questions arising out of the rebellion and reconstruction which will doubtless come before his Court. It was quite evident, two years ago, when he was haranguing negroes, and going to Ohio to vote for "the great party," etc., that some such fate as this would come upon him eventually, but we hardly thought it would come so soon. We notice a good deal of fuss amongst some of our contemporaries now about his "dragging his silk gown in the mire." If they had made this fuss a year ago, instead of encouraging him in his folly, they might have saved him; and he, had he listened to the teachings of human experience, and the great traditions of the judicial bench, instead of editorial bosh, might have furnished coming generations with an example, instead of a warning.

---

In spite of the Chief-Justice's moral downfall, the conviction appears to grow steadily amongst the Democrats, that it would have been better to take him just as he is than do what they have done, and there are still rumors of the formation of a third party, of course with the Chief-Justice at its head. Whether these rumors will ripen into facts is, however, more than doubtful. A second nomination now would be tantamount to defeat, and it would be a confession of imbecility which Democratic politicians are hardly likely to make. A notable feature of the campaign thus far is the absence of "enthusiasm." Grant seems carefully to avoid the whole of the theatrical apparatus commonly used to excite it, and it shows both his honesty and good sense. Enthusiasm, however useful when great dangers are to be faced, and great sacrifices to be borne, ought to play as small a part as possible in the ordinary political work of an intelligent, educated people. It is mostly demagogues who profit by it, as it generally enables them to fix people's attention on things indifferent, and draw it away from things important, as when, for instance, a voter is so wrought up by a candidate's face, or figure, or oratory, or gait, or costume, or celebrated sayings, that he forgets all about his character and capacity. It is high time for the Republican party, at least, to leave it to the Democrats, and even amongst the Democrats, we have no doubt, it will be before many years confined to the latest products of the New York naturalization mill.

---

To the Sun is largely due whatever approach Chief-Justice Chase made recently to getting the Democratic nomination. We do not say it suggested to him, or to anybody else, the idea of his becoming the Democratic candidate; but it certainly familiarized his mind and that of the public with it, and made it seem feasible. The subsequent miscarriage of the scheme we cannot help ascribing to the Chief-Justice's own meddling. Had he kept quiet, and written no letters and had no interviews, and left the matter in the hands of the Sun, we do not say he would have got the nomination, but he would have avoided a good deal of the humiliation under which he now labors. The Sun is now engaged in trying to get a suitable office for Mr. Greeley, and has pressed him hard for the governorship. We sincerely hope it may be able to provide him with something satisfactory. Its want of success hitherto with him and the Chief-Justice will not discourage it, we know, for it acts from far higher motives than mere desire of success. The difficulty it has to contend with in Mr. Greeley's case is peculiar. In public, few members of conventions have the courage to deny his fitness for any office in the country, and we verily believe that if he were proposed for the Chief-Justiceship of the Supreme Court or the command of the fleet, there would be clergymen and country politicians found to maintain openly that he was equally well fitted to hear appeals in admiralty or to be an admiral himself—such are the terrors inspired by his editorial cowskin. But the minute the voting by ballot begins, the cowardly fellows repudiate him under the veil of secrecy. The business of the Sun will be, therefore, to secure vivâ voce voting on his claims, and, as soon as it does this, our word for it, its efforts will be crowned by his nomination.

---

We think it is high time that the persons, whoever they may be, who are working to get the pensions of the soldiers and sailors repudiated, and have their widows and orphans forgotten, should be exposed. As every political convention, of all parties, which has met since 1864, has solemnly declared its determination to have these pensions paid, and the widows and orphans held in remembrance, it is, of course, impossible to doubt that secret efforts are being made by the evil-disposed to make the soldiers and sailors the victims of a cruel and outrageous breach of faith. We are glad, of course, to find that they meet with no encouragement from politicians; but we do think the politicians ought to reveal their names to the public, so that popular indignation may be brought to bear on them. Men who are capable of baseness of this kind are capable of anything, and will probably before long attack the pensions of the War of 1812, and to prevent their doing further mischief, they should be put under the surveillance of the public eye.

---

We begin to get our regular allowance of that pleasant literature which is in season during Presidential campaigns, and this fall's crop is likely to be a luxuriant one. The Times has just made the usual request to the other papers not to be indecent and scurrilous, and the World has made the remark that "it is easy to see what kind of a campaign the Radicals intend making it, namely, a campaign of defamation." After this it is in order to begin at once making enquiries into the hereditary diseases of the candidates, the number of indictments which were at one time out against the father of either of them, the thefts each committed in boyhood, and other matters of the same sort. We learn that General Blair was always the tyrant that we now know him to be. It appears (and the man whose shirt Blair sunk was in the late Democratic Convention) that when Montgomery Blair and Frank were small boys they were bathing with some others in a certain canal, and that Frank Blair, supported by Montgomery, "lit on" a very small boy, took away his shirt, threw it into the water, and sank it. But it turned out, we are further informed, very much as it will with him in the coming campaign; that is to say, he made a mistake; it was his own shirt he sunk. It is a good stroke in this narration to mention that the boy was in the Convention—it boldly challenges the two Blairs to deny it if they dare do so in the very presence of the witness of their cruelty. Mr. Seymour, we learn, besides writing letters to Clement C. Clay, and negotiating with the Confederate Government, is insane, or rather there is insanity in his family. It breaks out into mania in the males of the house about the fourth of March, when they are fifty-eight years of age. Still, the Blairs and the Southerners are not going to wait, and though Blair would have the succession if Seymour was crazy, as well as if he were killed, there is going to be an assassination some time soon after the inauguration. As for Grant, he is known to be a frightful drunkard—Mr. Phillips being an original authority for the truth of the story, and Mrs. Cady Stanton and the World keeping it all going. This naturally brings out an affirmation from an editor in the West, to the effect that Grant's complexion is beautifully fresh and clear, and contradicts effectively "the rebel lie." Colfax, we are told, once brutally informed a "boy in blue" who called on him (destitute of visiting-cards, he was) that he, Colfax, "had no time for soldiers"—which, it is thought by the Democratic papers, will cause that next November "the soldiers will have no time for him." We also learn from the World that a "prominent Union officer," who knows Grant well, has staked his reputation, "while driving with a friend a few days since," that "Grant would proclaim himself a dictator" within twelve months after his inauguration. What we like about this story is its air of close accuracy; the very circumstances under which the "prominent officer" tells the story—in a buggy, taking an airing—being set down in black and white.

---

General Hancock having attended to the affair of the nomination might probably go back to Texas and try to bring about as good a state of things as he found when he went there. Under Sheridan and Pease the average number of murders committed monthly was, so far as known, nine. This not counting assaults with intent to kill, rapes, and so on, which, added to the murders, made a horrible condition of society—a condition of things so profoundly horrible that, although there was profanity, there was less profanity, we dare say, than at first sight seems in Sheridan's remark, that, if he owned both hell and Texas, he would rent Texas and live in the other place. Since he went away, and the Hancock and Buchanan policy has had full swing, he would have about six times harder work to live in that State. The murders have risen from nine a month to fifty-four. The population, it must be remembered, is not seven hundred thousand. It is as if here in New York City we were to assassinate about seven hundred men, women, and children each year. To help towards the finishing of the picture, it may be said that out of nine hundred murders, one has been avenged by the law. A freedman was the guilty person, and he was hanged. Sometimes they acquit on such grounds as that the prisoner lost his arm in the rebel service. We say nothing of the political aspect of this slaughtering. The facts are set forth in a report on "Lawlessness and Crime," prepared under the direction of our Democratic Constitutional Convention, and possibly there may be exaggeration. But what right has General Buchanan to allow fifty murders to be committed monthly in a part of a Christian country which he has, to a very great extent, under his control, and for the good order of which the people of the United States, represented by him, are, in a peculiar sense, responsible to themselves and the civilized world?

---

Mr. Julian, of Indiana, has written a letter to the papers, defending the Yo Semite Valley Bill, now before the Senate, and which he reported from the House Committee on Public Lands, on the ground that the action of Congress in presenting the valley to the State could not affect the claims of the two settlers who had duly appropriated two quarter sections under the pre-emption laws, and therefore had a valid title to them against everybody. He says that when the grant was made to the State the claims of these settlers were not known; had they been known, the act of Congress would have excepted them; and he insists upon it that the settlers must be left where they are, and cannot even be bought out without a gross breach of faith and without spreading a sense of insecurity among our pioneers. It is not easy to see, however, why it should be a greater hardship for a pioneer to be bought out for the public benefit than for men in thickly-settled portions of the country.

The latter are called on every year for the surrender of property for public use, and make no complaints, or, if they did, would be laughed at. Moreover, although all Mr. Julian says in praise of the taste, culture, and character of the squatters may be strictly true, they will, like other people, have heirs and assigns who may not possess their virtues.

---

The flunkey nature seems to remain the same in all climates and under every variety of social and political institutions. A striking example, too, of the way in which it hungers after meanness and malignity, and despises justice and decency, whether the object of its adoration be the crown, the royal family, or "the masses," or "the working-man," or "the party," has just been afforded in Australia, where society in Sydney banded together to ostracize a leading member of the bar, because he, in the exercise of a sacred duty, defended O'Farrell, who made the attempt on Prince Alfred's life. O'Farrell, to the Sydney people, was, of course, "the greatest criminal of the age." So in hunting him down they bade adieu, just as some of their brother flunkeys did here a short time ago, both to decorum and common sense. The Bishop of Sydney, as we recently mentioned, gravely informed his clergy that there were fathers in the community who were absolutely so ashamed of having begotten their children in a country so disgraced that they could not look their offspring in the face. This, as a specimen of raging, frantic folly was bad enough, and it was appropriately followed up by the social crusade against O'Farrell's counsel. The prince, however, gave his base admirers a lesson in justice and good manners by insisting that the counsel should be present at every entertainment given in his (the prince's) honor, and also receiving him very warmly on board his own ship. It is not pleasant to see princes teaching civilization to young democratic societies, but it is well they should receive the lesson, from whatever source it may come.

---

The news from the European continent is meagre and unimportant, and is mostly made up of newspaper rumors. The real makers of news are off at the watering-places or in the mountains seeking repose and health, and the correspondents are thrown back on their wits for wars and alliances and threats and intrigues and coolnesses. The only thing of real moment that has been lately reported is General von Moltke's speech on the naval loan in the German Parliament. Bismark and he want the Confederation to have a good fleet as well as a good army, so that when the next struggle comes Germany will be able to present as bold a front on sea as on land; but the Parliament haggled over the vote for a while, though it at last gave in. General Moltke said, in substance, that there was no chance of peace either through general disarmament or general armament. The first of these expedients, even if practicable, must be temporary; the second, as we see, operates nearly as often in producing as in preventing war. What is wanted, therefore, is an armed nation—such as Germany will be when united—in the centre of Europe, by the very constitution of its society wedded to peace and devoted to peaceful arts, but strong enough in a military sense to forbid war among its neighbors. The remark has produced a good deal of sensation everywhere, but no weightier thought from a weightier man has been uttered for a good while. Universal peace will come when there are enough free and industrial and educated peoples, like the United States and Germany, in the world to prohibit the game of war between kings, and make the love of soldiering for soldiering's sake discreditable.

---

There has been a most extraordinary debate in the Italian Parliament, arising out of the murder of Signor Cappa, the Royal Procurator, or public prosecutor, in broad daylight, at his own door in Ravenna. It came out in the debate that this was not an isolated case, but one of a long series of organized crimes, of which the public has, until now, heard nothing. A common councillor was stabbed in the same way recently, but it made no sensation, and nobody was brought to justice. The municipality were so thoroughly cowed that they were afraid to send a deputation to Signor Cappa's funeral, or even to utter a word of regret at their meetings. In the Province of Ravenna, containing a population of 209,000, there have been 64 murders in nine months, and convictions are almost unknown. The police are generally afraid to make arrests, and the witnesses refuse to depose, and the juries acquit. Generally, the malefactors withdraw from the public gaze for a brief period, but this is the only token of respect for the law they ever offer. In Ravenna, cases have occurred in which some of them have drawn bills of exchange on people who owed them nothing, but who, nevertheless, accepted the drafts without hesitation. In fact, the whole province is, and has been long, under the dominion of a large band of assassins, before whom police courts and all officials are powerless. Signor Cappa was sent down by the Government to restore order, and he entered on his task with undaunted courage, arrested 320 of the worst characters, and was preparing to bring them to trial when he was assassinated. The origin of this state of things is said to date back to the days of Papal rule, when the courts and police were so worthless that secret organizations, or vigilance committees, were formed by the citizens to execute justice. These, as might have been expected, soon degenerated into mere instruments of private hatred, and produced a breed of cut-throats who soon drove the decent men out of them, and converted them into bands of brigands. One of the most awful facts in the history of the Church is the moral condition of the provinces over which the priests have been allowed to exercise temporal rule, or even largely to influence the government. There is hardly a doubt that the ideas of law and justice and the moral sense are fainter amongst them than they have been at any time within the historic period.

---

The Pope has at last opened his spiritual batteries on the Austrian reformers, as it has been for some time expected he would, by the delivery of an allocution which is, it must be confessed, in spite of the familiarity of the world with his opinions and his style, very amusing reading. He says the Austrian Government has passed "an odious law, establishing free liberty for all opinions, liberty of the press, of all faith, and no matter what confession or doctrine; it grants to the members of every confession the right of establishing public schools and colleges, and members of every confession are allowed to be admitted on the same footing with the sanction of the state." Another "abominable law," he says, forces Catholics to allow heretics to be buried in their cemeteries, if the heretics have none of their own; another still, which he stigmatizes in the same way, "suppresses all the influence of the Church over education, decreeing that the whole superior supervision of education, literature, and science, and also the inspection of the schools, appertain to the state, which finally decrees that religious teaching in the public schools must be placed in the hands of the members of each separate confession; that any religious society may open private or special schools for the use of its own youth," and so on. In fact his Holiness denounces as atrocious wickedness the establishment of the same relations between church and state regarding marriage and education which we have here, and threatens everybody concerned in bringing them about with the heaviest ecclesiastical censures. Apropos of the ideas entertained by the Catholic clergy regarding their duty in the matter of education, whenever they can secure the power of exercising it, a late utterance of the Bishop of Dordogne, in France, is interesting and instructive. He affirms that "to the Church, and the Church only, Christ gave the right and imposed the duty of teaching mankind."

"It is not that the laity are prohibited from receiving education, especially when science and literature are its object. We put forth no such claim. The Church accepts, encourages, and blesses devotion of every kind; but that which is true, and what we must loudly proclaim, is that every person engaged in teaching is bound in conscience to accept the superintendence and control of the Church. This right of the Church is imperative."

In fact, we need have no hesitation in affirming that the only limits which the Catholic clergy even here impose on themselves touching education is what is imposed by State authority, and that if circumstances should enable them to secure legislation placing the entire control of the schools or school funds of this State in their hands, they would think it a duty to seize the power thus offered them, and to treat the claims or protestations of those opposed to such legislation as of absolutely no consequence. Moreover, they avoid attracting public attention to their pretensions in this matter by resolutely refusing to discuss them publicly, and push their claims simply by quietly influencing Catholic voters and political managers, and, through them, getting all they can, while waiting for all they think they are entitled to.

THE WORK OF THE CONVENTION.

WHAT is perhaps the most remarkable about the Democratic Convention is that it joins issue with the Republicans on only one point, and that is the proper mode of paying the national debt. Considering the number and variety of the questions which have divided the parties since 1852, the number of things in the Republican policy which the Democrats have opposed since the outbreak of the war; considering, too, the number of outrageous violations of the Constitution, and of all sound principles of government, of which they accuse the Republicans through their press and through their orators, one was naturally led to expect a platform bristling with propositions which Republicans would be compelled to traverse, and on which the people would be enabled to pass at the Presidential election.

For instance, we might reasonably have looked for an affirmation of the right of secession from a party which vehemently denied to the General Government the right to prevent secession by force of arms; and for a demand for compensation for the freeing of the slaves from a party which denied the validity of the Emancipation Proclamation; and for a declaration in favor of free trade from a party which has been a free trade party from its formation, and has treated the high tariffs of the last six years as monsters of absurdity; for a declaration in favor of hard money from a party which has always been the implacable foe of paper issues, and which denied the constitutionality of the issue of the legal tenders; and for a promise to undo the reconstruction work of Congress from a party which has maintained, and does still persistently maintain, the illegality and oppressiveness of every step in it; and, finally, for a declaration in favor of "a white man's government" from a party which has always treated the mental and moral inferiority of the negro race as a fundamental political fact which there is no getting rid of, and on which all political arrangements, in a country in which both races were found, must be based. It must be admitted by anybody who is familiar with the history of the last six years, that there never was a party in a free country which suffered less from lack of controversy. In fact, we do not recall a single case in which a party has been divided from its opponents by so many questions of the highest interest, and questions, too, which go down to the foundations of moral as well as of political science. If the Democracy only believes one-tenth part of what it says, no party has ever taken the field with even one-tenth as much responsibility.

In the platform as it lies before us, however, we find none of these things. The right of slaveholding and that of secession are given up on the ground that they have been "settled by the war, or by the voluntary action of the Southern States," as if a war wrongfully begun and wrongfully conducted could settle any question of constitutional or moral right, and as if the Southern States since the war—if Democratic accounts of their condition be true—have done anything voluntarily. It demands the restoration of the States to their rights in the Union under the Constitution, but deprives the demand of all value either to friend or foe by omitting to state what those rights are. It demands an amnesty for all political offences, but this can offend no one, as nobody has been punished for political offences, and nobody is likely to be. It demands the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau and the reduction of the army, but the Freedmen's Bureau is already in process of abolition and provision has been made for reducing the army. The seventh article denounces "abuses in administration," and demands the "expulsion of corrupt men from office," one of those exceedingly amusing demands which appear regularly now in the platforms of all parties, and which, as no defender of abuses or of corrupt men ever shows himself eo nomine in the flesh in the political arena, must be aimed at some ghostly organization visible only to spiritualists. The doctrine of indefeasible allegiance also, against which the eighth article is aimed, now finds no earthly supporters; the right of the States to regulate the suffrage has been formally conceded by the Republican party; and if there be anybody who proposes to have the public "forget our soldiers and sailors," or refuse to "execute the guaranties given in their favor," he has thus far managed to conceal himself from an indignant community.

Of the abuse of the Republican party, of which the latter portion of the platform is composed, it must be said that, whether justifiable or unjustifiable, it offers no issues to an adversary. Neither policy nor principle can ever be wrapped up in vituperation, and the applicability of epithets is not a point which can ever be submitted to the people. This particular branch of the controversy between the two parties has to be worked out in the newspapers and on the stump, and to them we may safely hand it over in the full assurance that the Democrats will by next November have got as good as they will have given.

There therefore remains only one point on which the Democratic party offers to do battle. Out of the hosts of principles which it has upheld at one time or another during its long and checkered career; out of that vast collection of grievances which it has accumulated since 1860, and in describing which it borrows the language of the oppressed in the worst of past ages, it produces nothing worthy of being embodied in a positive proposition and fought for at the election. It has no reform to call for; it does not offer to carry any reform out, either in the administration of the Government or in the machinery of the administration. It goes into the canvass simply to maintain the doctrine that, wherever in a national promise to pay money the word "coin" is not mentioned, the debt shall be paid in "lawful money of the United States"—that is, in another promise to pay issued by the same debtor—and that the representations made in explanation of the original instrument by the officers of the Government, and the understanding of those who lent the money, and which has remained undisturbed for four years, shall count for nothing. Such a "battle-cry" as this coming from any political party would be singular enough; there was only one thing needed to make it by far the most singular battle-cry of history, and that was, that the party raising it should be a party which has always maintained that paper money issued by Government is not and cannot be "lawful money," and that, therefore, the currency in which it calls for the payment of Government debts is not simply inferior in value to coin, but has no value whatever; and this one thing the battle-cry in question has. The Democratic party, after many changes and reverses, at last takes the field in support of a compound swindle, made up partly of fraudulent bankruptcy and partly of uttering counterfeit money.

We know very well what satisfaction this extraordinary performance has given, and is giving, to the Republicans. The platform, combined with the character of the candidates who have been selected to stand upon it, seems to render Democratic success hopeless, unless, indeed, all principle and all honor have deserted the American people. The triumph, at the close of the war, of a party which put forth no claim to public confidence except its willingness in the richest country in the world to cheat the public creditor (we again repeat that all talk of "the letter of the law," in a discussion between a government and its creditors as to the rights of the latter, simply adds impudence to knavery), would indicate a degree of moral debasement which would certainly puzzle both preachers and philosophers, and would greatly increase the doubts and misgivings with which so many thoughtful and intelligent men are looking into the moral future of the world. We have, we confess, no doubt whatever about the result of the election; but we shall not be satisfied with simple victory. Nobody who has watched the proceedings of the Convention, has seen the influences which controlled it, and knows anything of the men who managed it, or of the ideas of government which were dominant in it, and who believes that, once equality is established in a State, honesty must form the main element in its progress, will be content unless it is shown not only that a majority, but that an immense majority, of the people repudiate the party and its doctrines. The course things have taken in the last three months goes strongly to confirm the suggestion we have several times made, that the basis of one party, at least in this country, would be rather ignorance and rascality than attachment to distinct and well-marked political ideas. At the Convention which has just adjourned no particular doctrine or principle which thoughtful men of any school of politics have produced or defended seemed to have any attraction or any authority. About all the great questions of government, the settled as well as the disputed, there was every indication either of ignorance or indifference. The thing which commanded most applause and secured heartiest concurrence was a small cheat from which nobody in the room could expect to make over a few dollars, and for which no defence or apology can be discovered in the work of any statesman or moralist of any age or country, and yet it called forth the "wildest enthusiasm." The following that these men can command in the United States should not only be a minority; it is the duty of all good men to see that it is a small minority.

OUR NATIONAL POVERTY.

"THE Nation has made the painful discovery that 'the people of the United States are, and have been for several years past, steadily decreasing in wealth.' The data for this calculation are as follows: (1) Milk and all its products are an absolute necessity; (2) Every effort will be made, therefore, whatever else may be sacrificed, to keep up the number of milch cows; (3) Milch cows have decreased 5 per cent. since 1860; (4) No consolation can be found in the increased number of sheep, though these have nearly doubled since 1860. Ergo, our people are fast growing poorer. Now, as the whole number of people has increased since 1860 at least 15 per cent., their average poverty in milch cows must be much greater than the Nation indicates. But is it not barely possible that we have increased our wealth in other articles more than we have lost in milch cows? And is it not also possible that a cow or two may have been omitted in 1867, since the returns of the Agricultural Bureau are by no means perfect? Again—has the Nation taken account of all the milk in all the cocoa-nuts of this great country? Until these questions are answered, we shall take the evidence of our five senses, and believe that the country is no poorer than in 1860."

The foregoing paragraph from the Springfield Republican is a fair epitome of the thousand-and-one comments upon a recent article of ours which we find scattered through our exchanges. The humor is the Republican's own, but its argument is nearly the same as that of all of our commentators. The "evidence of our five senses" is justly more trusted by most people than the conclusions of their logic; the abundance of cocoa-nuts is unquestionably more than an offset for the loss of milch cows; our surplus paper money is undoubtedly better proof of our wealth than a mere assertion that our stock of gold is steadily declining; and the nation's irregular and artificial activity under heavy taxes and protective duties furnishes the most striking evidence of our general prosperity, just as nothing so well proves the giant's strength as his ability to stagger on under the weight of burdens that would crush an ordinary man. Undoubtedly we are strong to carry weight, undoubtedly we have money in abundance, undoubtedly the land "flows with milk," but the weight we carry is exhausting us, the money that so abounds is paper money, and the milk that overflows the land comes mostly from the cocoa-nut.

It seems a truism, that all the individuals of a nation are wholly engaged in producing and distributing, by the aid of their whole labor and their whole property, all the things which all the individuals of that nation need to satisfy all their wants. It is a statement the general truth of which every one admits, though particular exceptions can be taken to it. One exception is, that a part of every nation—its army, its navy, its wealthy class—do not labor either to produce or to distribute. But this objection is more apparent than real, for the labor of the soldiers and sailors in protecting alike the producer and his product is held by the producer himself to be as essential to production as his own labor; while the wealthy, by contributing their property, aid production as effectually as if they contributed their labor. A more serious exception to our truism is, that not all the things which a nation needs are produced by its own labor, but that a part of them are produced by and obtained from other nations. But the force of this objection is derived from a false and exaggerated estimate of the importance of the so-called foreign trade of nations. The concentration of the latter at a few seaports or frontier towns, and its powerful influence over the domestic markets of a nation actively engaged in trade, give it an appearance of magnitude which is eminently deceptive. The total annual imports or exports of the United States, for example, do not amount in value to four hundred millions of dollars, whereas our total annual domestic product amounts in value to at least ten thousand millions, or more than twenty-five times as much. Besides, whatever any nation imports from abroad has really to be paid for by the export of something produced at home, so that to all intents and purposes the foreign article is just as much obtained by domestic labor as the domestic article. Hence we may safely leave out of sight both the so-called non-producing classes and all foreign trade, and adhere to our first assertion, that all the individuals of a nation are wholly engaged in producing and distributing, by the aid of their whole labor and their whole property, all the things which all the individuals of that nation need to satisfy their wants.

What do the wants of a nation consist of? The wants of a whole nation are only a multiplication of the wants of each individual household. Each household, as each individual, requires mainly food, shelter, clothing, warmth, light, and entertainment. These all individuals require in greater or smaller amounts and in varying proportions. The amounts and proportions in which different households require them depend upon the wealth, social position, education, and taste of its members, and vary accordingly. But there are always thousands of households possessing the same wealth, occupying the same social position, influenced by the same education and the same tastes, forming in one word a certain class in the community. All the households forming such a class will have, as nearly as possible, the same wants. Of course, everywhere there will be individual exceptions even among a class, but in all classes the average household will be in an overwhelming majority, and among such average households the wants will be so clearly measured and so much alike that in ordinary times the grocery bills, the butcher's and baker's bills, the house-rent, the dry-goods bills of each one of a thousand families in the same station of life, and in receipt of the same income, will at the end of the year be nearly the same in amount as those of the other nine hundred and ninety-nine.

Few people have any conception of the extent to which this assertion is true; but every one can, by enquiry among his friends and acquaintances, easily verify for himself its correctness, and can see how, in each of the different classes of society, expenses run in certain proportions which scarcely ever vary. Of an income of one thousand dollars in this city, for example, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, five hundred dollars are probably spent on food, two hundred and fifty dollars on rent, one hundred on dry-goods and clothing, and so on. And not only does the proportion, whatever it may be, hold good for any one class in society, but it is, with the exception of the very wealthy and the very poor, nearly the same in all classes of society. In fact, it is not unreasonable to assert that, in the average American household, one-half of the income is spent for food, one-fourth for rent, and one-fourth for all other wants combined. The figures of the United States census bear out the assertion in a very striking manner. We have seen that it requires all the labor and all the capital of all the people to produce all that is required for the wants of all. If, therefore, the wants of all bear certain proportions, it is necessary that the capital and labor employed in satisfying these wants should bear the same proportions. Of the labor it is difficult to get a correct estimate, but of the capital employed the last census (imperfect as it is) shows us, that as nearly as possible one-half consisted of farms, live stock upon farms, and farming implements, mainly employed in the production of food, while nearly one-fourth consisted of other real estate, city and town dwellings, with their household furniture, etc., the income from which constitutes the item of house-rent.

The conclusion to be drawn from all these statements is this: our wealth, national as well as individual, consists of that which will satisfy our wants. One-half of all our wants is summed up in the word—food. To show that our supply of food is diminished is to show that the most important half of our wealth, the means of supplying the most important half of our wants, is diminished. It is easy to laugh at our homely illustration, selected because it is a subject of simple numbers which everybody can understand, but it is not so easy to meet or deny the fact that food and house-rent have risen to exorbitant prices, that they absorb more than their former proportion of our yearly income, and that, although we spend more upon them, we get them in smaller quantities and of poorer quality. In food and house-rent we are worse off, poorer, than we were six years ago; we are richer in railroads, in iron-mines and foundries, in coal-mines and cotton-spindles, in lamb's-wool and paper money. But it is a poor consolation to a hungry man to know that iron is abundant and cheap, or that he can burn five tons of coal next winter instead of four; cocoa-nut milk will scarcely suit the baby nor go well with coffee and tea; nor is an extra cheap flannel shirt a compensation for being crowded into two narrow rooms in a tenement-house.

The fact is, the war, protection, and paper money have artificially disturbed the course of our national activity, and changed our national productions from those which are most essential to our existence to those which were, for the time being, most profitable to the individual producer. The demands of the war, aided by the tariff, induced an immense increase in the production of iron, coal, and wool, and prevented a proportionate increase, nay, brought about a proportionate decrease, in the production of food. The fluctuations in price resulting from speculation, based in part upon the uncertainty of the currency, prevented the disturbance from being readily recognized, and the evil has gone on increasing until the unbearable result is working its own remedy. Working-men cannot pay for their food and rent at present rates of wages, but even the present rates of wages are ruinous to employers in many branches of manufacture. Hence strikes for higher or against lower wages are again becoming the order of the day, and will, we fear, from this time forward steadily augment in number and importance. The necessity of employing a larger proportion of income for the purchase of food and the payment of rent leaves less than before for the purchase of all other manufactured articles. A diminished demand for manufactured articles must lead to a diminished production, to the stoppage of mills and the idleness of many laborers, and to a diminished activity in general business. Of the number of men thrown out of employment by such a change, a large proportion always seek the farm, and by their labor add at once to the production of food and help to restore the former equilibrium. But in the meantime what is the value of the idle mill or the closed coal-mine that they have abandoned? If we are poorer in some of the principal articles of food, we are richer, far richer, so our critics claim, in factories and mines. But factories and mines have little or no value unless actively worked, and we have no hesitation in asserting, from simple observation of the laws of trade, that before next March one-fourth of the spindles of New England and one-third of the hammers of Pennsylvania will be idle. This is, of course, mere assertion, and has nothing to do with our argument. Our argument is, and we think it cannot be contradicted, that our most important want is food; that we are poorer in food than we have ever been; that we are richer in factories and mines, but that the wealth of factories and mines cannot offset the poverty in food, even if the factories and mines are worked; that we are poorer in the essential, and richer only in the non-essential—hence that we are certainly on the whole poorer.

Nothing has so much contributed to national and individual extravagance as the constant shouts of gladness at our immense prosperity, our unimpaired resources, raised by the press of the whole country. It is high time that this delusion be abandoned with all its mischievous consequences. The nation is at the present time far from prosperous. For months past we have had no official publication of the internal revenue receipts. Is it because they are so light that they dare not be shown? Already the notes of warning come from Washington, telling us to prepare for an increase of debt in July amounting to eighteen or twenty millions. The Ways and Means Committee are seeking from Congress the authority—demanded, it is said, by Mr. McCulloch—to issue a fresh loan of twenty-five millions, in the shape of three per cent. certificates, which are legal tender between the banks, a measure of the most positive and downright inflation. These are not signs of prosperity. Why, then, seek to delude ourselves? We are neither rich nor prosperous. Let us cease our bragging and resume our labor. We have been wasteful, and are poor; let us economize, and repair our substance.

RECENT WARNINGS TO THE CORRUPT.

We ventured to predict two months ago that the Democratic Convention would not be found lagging behind the Republican Convention, in the matter of corruption, and that it would give us a denunciation of this particular form of evil which would be satisfactory to every right-minded man. We were not mistaken. The platform calls loudly for "the reform of abuses in the administration, the expulsion of corrupt men from office." Now this, as any one may see who considers the subject for a moment, covers the whole case. If abuses in the administration were reformed, and corrupt men expelled from office, we should have a government as nearly perfect as the material conditions of our society would permit. The two great parties into which the political world is divided being, therefore, both of opinion that corrupt men ought to be driven out of the public service, those persons will, if they have any delicacy of feeling left, at once withdraw from it. Even if they have no delicacy of feeling, they must acknowledge that even on the low ground of expediency it may be the very best thing they can do; because both the great parties having agreed as to their unfitness, they surely will shortly be all dismissed with disgrace, and perhaps with a public exposure of their iniquities. It would seem, in fact, that with regard to this great question the country is in the happy situation of having nothing to fear from the defeat of either party. Anybody whose sole political concern is corruption may vote for either the Democratic or Republican ticket as he pleases, with the full assurance that he will witness in any case the realization of his wishes.

Nevertheless, we confess that, perhaps owing to natural sourness of disposition, we are ourselves not quite satisfied. In other words, we do not believe the denunciations of corruption uttered by either party are worth the paper on which they are written. We believe the corrupt men in office read these denunciations with the same grim amusement with which most intelligent men out of office read them. They know perfectly well they mean nothing, and are not intended to produce any better effect than the soothing of obstreperous reformers. We do not mean to say that we think the Republican and Democratic parties stand on the same level in this matter. In fact, the moral difference which, as we have several times endeavored to show, exists between the composition of the two parties, apart altogether from their political differences, does lead us to hope for reform sooner or later from the Republicans, and prevents us from looking for anything of the kind at any time from the Democrats. There is in the ranks of the Republican party a vast body of persons to whom the condition of the public service, and the growing power of money in both politics and law, are matters of serious concern. Persons whom these things trouble—in other words, whose moral sense is nice, and whose political and social ideal is high—almost invariably vote the Republican ticket, often as much out of sheer abhorrence of Democratic morality as out of admiration of Republican policy. We do not, in fact, expect now or at any other time the smallest attempt at purification from the Democrats. That party, as long as it exists, will be made up in the main of coarser, more brutal, ignorant elements in the population, and pandering to their passions and prejudices, and ostentatious indifference to moral considerations, will always supply the leaders with the principal means of keeping their followers together.

We do think, however, that as long as the Republican party confines its efforts towards reform to declamation in its platform against corruption in general, it will be useless to ask people to place more confidence in its reforming zeal than in that of the Democrats. Nothing is easier than to denounce corruption. Editors, preachers, and moralists of all sexes and ages are doing this incessantly, and doing it twice as effectively as political conventions can do it. The work of political organizations is not the utterance of fine moral sentiments; their work is the contrivance and execution of practical measures of reform—in other words, the embodiment of fine moral sentiments in legislation. We do not need to have either the Chicago or the New York Convention tell us that corruption is a bad thing, or that all the corrupt men ought to resign. This we have found out for ourselves. What we want the Conventions to say is, that the men they put in power must, without unreasonable delay, enact this or that measure, making such and such reforms, prohibiting such and such abuses. The Conventions know perfectly well that resolutions denouncing corruption might be passed in every Republican meeting for the next ten years; and although the Republicans were all that time the party in power, there would not be one cent the less stolen from the Government, or one cheat or imbecile the less in office. Until, therefore, the party say authoritatively, that certain definite reforms ought to be made, the sensible portion of the public will take the liberty of laughing when it simply confines itself to putting it on record that corruption is a bad thing. Writing "noble letters," as P. T. Barnum did during his canvass in Connecticut, and putting noble sentiments in platforms, as all parties do, are very well as far as they go, but they are no substitute for noble living, or for earnest, careful reformatory legislation.

It is not denied that Mr. Jenckes's Civil Service Bill would dry up one fruitful source of corruption—the most fruitful of all. It would not put an end to corruption, because it would not change human nature or suddenly raise the general standard of morality. But we have not met with a single denial in the newspapers or from orators that it would put an end to an enormous amount of dishonesty, that it would drive a large body of depraved and worthless men not only out of office but out of politics altogether, and that it would gradually lead to as near an approach to purity in the administration as the actual moral condition of the country will permit. We have, however, yet to hear the first formal words in its favor from any Republican organization. As soon as we see Republican leaders openly advocating it, as they advocate the Reconstruction acts or the honorable payment of the public debt, we shall believe in the sincerity of their desire for reform, but not till then. The party at large, we are sure, would welcome it. The American people has no interest in seeing its Government offices used as dens of thieves. The number of men who are interested in the present state of things is not more than a few thousands, all told; but they are unfortunately the persons who do most of the hack work of the canvass; and the party leaders, however honest they may be themselves, are afraid to talk of anything which will seem likely to deprive them of the means of rewarding their services.

We would warn the public, too, against the belief that by putting a pure man in the Presidential chair we can secure purity in the administration. Undoubtedly, General Grant will reform many abuses that Mr. Johnson now connives at or participates in. But under the present system, no matter how good he may be, the President is almost powerless. The distribution of the offices is only nominally in his hands. By far the greater portion of it is in reality in the hands of the Senators, Representatives, or local politicians and editors, whose recommendations he dare not disregard, and who are usually about as much influenced by consideration for the public welfare in pushing their protégés as by the motions of the heavenly bodies. Moreover, these persons, even when honest in giving their recommendations, have to give them to such a bad class and are so easily deceived, that some of the greatest knaves in the public service have actually often owed their places to very pure and patriotic men.

MR. FESSENDEN AND THE BOSTONIANS.

The Boston Commonwealth does not often descend to anything so low and troublesome as argumentation, but occasionally when it fancies it sees "a crisis," it summons a "reasoner" to deal out high and low justice on those who incur its righteous indignation. It last week employed him to judge and condemn the persons in Boston who recently invited Mr. Fessenden to dinner, as a mark of their sympathy with him under the persecution brought on him by his course in the impeachment. The first point made is that Mr. Fessenden was not entitled to a dinner because he is not a great man, or associated with any great cause, like Burke or Peel or Cobden or Sumner; the second is that the inviters are mostly members of the Boston Union League Club, a dainty sybaritic organization which did no good work in the war, and did not invite such men as Mr. William Claflin to join it, and blackballed such men as Mr. Frank W. Bird. The third point is that the invitation was signed not by the same men, but by men of the same social or official position as signed protests against the Personal Liberty Bill. The fourth is that a man who is opposed to "the masses" on a great question does not deserve a dinner, and ought not to get one, and the writer reminds Hill, Lowell, and Norton, of Cambridge, that it was Fairfax, Cromwell, and Vane, and not Strafford or Falkland or Charles I., to whom Milton "wrote sonnets," and whom he "enshrined in his immortal verse." The fifth is that the Republican party can well afford to do without Fessenden, and that "the path of Truth through all ages is strewn with deserters," on which proposition we shall only remark that so is the path of Humbug and Folly, and that, in fact, it is mainly by desertions from these two goddesses that the work of progress is carried on. What is Truth, and where is Truth, are questions hard to answer even for "moral reformers." What is Folly, is a question which Providence graciously enables men to answer every day by means of their own experience.

Upon the force and applicability of the foregoing arguments we have nothing to say. They are those of a man who has passed his life shooting at a hay-stack, and who thinks the bull's-eye on a target a contemptible object. What concerns us in the article is his views about the nature of the impeachment trial, which do merit attention, as we know they are widely diffused amongst good people, and cannot, therefore, be too often overhauled. He says the impeachment is not a judicial proceeding: 1st, Because the penalty does not touch either life, liberty, or property; 2dly, Because "the Democratic partisans were all a unit against it;" 3dly, Because "the Chief-Justice talked freely" about it, and "the press affirmed or denied guilt while the trial was pending." We protest solemnly that, though the space at our command will not permit us to quote literally, we have faithfully reproduced the argument. If any one doubts us, and many perhaps will do so, we refer him to the Commonwealth of July 11.

We would observe on this that the nature of a trial does not depend on the nature of the penalty. To constitute a trial or judicial proceeding, it is enough that there be an enquiry under oath into a dispute either about law or fact, and that the consequence be to the disputants either loss or gain. If the enquiry be into the guilt or innocence of an individual, it matters not whether the penalty be the loss of life or property or liberty or reputation or office. If it be the deprivation of anything which a man values, it is still a penalty; and a person who undertakes under a solemn oath to enquire whether a particular individual merits this penalty or not, and to be guided in so doing "by the law and the evidence," is engaged in a judicial enquiry. The attempt in which the Commonwealth and other journals have been engaged, to persuade the public that an enquiry conducted under these conditions is not a judicial proceeding; that the senator's oath on the late trial, the oaths and examination and cross-examination of witnesses, are not marks of a judicial trial simply because the penalty is a peculiar one, is—the truth must be told—utter downright folly or an attempt to destroy one of the bases of human society. If the penalty had been simply reprimand, the investigation would have had just the same character, though its importance and interest to the community would have been much less, as if the penalty had been one of decapitation and quartering.

In the second place, the misconduct of the press or of the Chief-Justice, or the—if you will—excusable weakness of the press and the inexcusable indiscretion of the Chief-Justice, and the partisanship of the Democrats, no more affect the nature of the proceeding before the Senate than the brutality of Jeffreys affected the nature of the proceedings at the Bloody Assizes, or the applause of the white Jamaican mob the nature of the proceedings against Gordon. No doubt these things had much to do in plunging the Commonwealth and similar periodicals into the fog in which they evidently still find themselves, but they were a matter of no concern to good and wise men in the Senate. The duty of the senator was still "to do impartial justice according to the law and the evidence," let the newspapers, the Democrats, or the Chief-Justice do what they might.

The Commonwealth asks triumphantly whether "Alexander H. Bullock and others ever before offered a public dinner to a dissenting judge or a recalcitrant juror," and, anticipating the answer, says: "Out of their own mouths comes the evidence that the impeachment proceeding was not a judicial trial." Being of a humane disposition, we shall not make any comment on this beyond what is implied in the submission of the following points, as the real points in the case, for the consideration of the Commonwealth, and we hope if it discusses them it will not do so without much reflection. Let us add that we do not want in reply any vituperation or name-calling or vitriol-throwing, or any of the other pleasing tricks by which it usually gets rid of antagonists; nor do we want to hear anything about its "emotions" or "aspirations" or "instincts," noble though they be; nor about "eternal justice" or "the eternal verities." We want plain argument, supported by recognized authorities or by the laws of the human mind. The points are these:

1. If the proceedings at Johnson's trial were not a judicial proceeding, what was the meaning and object of the senators' oath, of the oath and examination of witnesses, and of the legal portion of the Managers' argument?

2. Inasmuch as there was no article on which some senator of the party did not question Mr. Johnson's guilt, how do we know that a senator who doubted it, on all of them, was a dishonest man?

3. Supposing the trial to have been a judicial trial, have you ever heard of "a dissenting judge or recalcitrant juror" having been abused and threatened as Mr. Fessenden has been?

4. Considering how he has been abused and threatened, is it anything wonderful that those who believe him to have acted conscientiously should seek to dignify and reward conscientious acting by testifying in a public manner their respect for a man who, mistaken though he may be, has been persecuted for having (as they think) so acted? Is not some such testimonial required from them by the highest interests of society, no matter what comes of Andrew Johnson; and is not an invitation to dinner as simple, as suitable, and as easy a way of offering him this testimonial as any other? Would an invitation to a clam-bake or fish-fry be any better?

5. Is there anything more revolting in political history than the present attempt of the "moral wing" of the Republican party to elevate party obligations above all others, even those of a solemn oath, on the ground that the objects of the party are good; and is there any more repulsive reading outside the pages of Escobar and Father Bauny than the windy sermons in which these detestable doctrines are preached?

A LOOK AT THE CONVENTION.

PERHAPS the spectacle of men in large bodies is never very impressive; unless, indeed, when, as in an army or a mob, or some such gathering, they give the spectator the idea of force. Take any single human being of an entire steamboat-load, consider him face to face, and he is a more awe-inspiring object than the whole "excursion" to which he belongs. Or climb up into Trinity steeple, and after gazing on the ant-hill of mankind below, turn to the contemplation of the person who has ascended with you, and whom you have at arm's length, a near body and soul. He paradoxically dwarfs the race. The reason of this readily suggests itself; we mention the fact only to excuse ourselves for saying that we were not very much impressed by the sight of the late assemblage of the Democracy in the new Tammany Hall.

Most of our readers have seen similar assemblages in similar places. A large hall draped with the stars and stripes, and further adorned, in this case, with representations of the shields of the States, which recalled the paintings that adorn new omnibuses; a platform at one end, filled with elderly men of what is called a gentlemanly exterior; galleries at the other end crammed with a mass of humanity vigorously plying fans; a mass of humanity in the benches between, sitting in long rows; men, not of gentlemanly exterior, handing ice-water; a stentorian-voiced secretary making himself heard above the noise of the talk ("The State of Missourah —casts her eleven electoral votes—as follows"); a feeble-voiced chairman endeavoring to make himself heard, and pretty regularly compelled to fall back on the mallet before he can do it ("The Convention will come to order. The gentleman is informed that disputes in the delegation must be settled within the delegation, and cannot be brought before the Convention"); a continual going to and fro of very important gentlemen who have to whisper a word or two close into the ears of other gentlemen ("That 's John A. Green coming this way, with his hand up to his mouth; now he 's talking with that bald-headed man"); bursts of "enthusiasm," often far wilder than one suspects till they reappear in the next day's papers; occasional speeches by gentlemen who make what seems, to distant hearers, an inarticulate noise, whose oratory is mainly of the visible kind, and consists in shaking the head, sometimes violently, sometimes weightily and slowly, sometimes at the Permanent Chairman, sometimes at the fist which is at the end of the outstretched arm ("That 's McCook that 's up now"); energetic remarks from one's neighbors expressive of delight or disgust—("There 's a gain of three for Hendricks") ("Seymour, Seymour; the child is born"); enquiries and answers; a pervading heat, and the concomitant rustling of fans, and, in this instance, display of shirt-sleeves in the galleries.

These are the principal things that went to make up the scene in Tammany, as they go, most of them, to make up the scene whenever we get together to nominate our candidates for the Presidency. As we say, it is never a very impressive scene. It came nearest to being so in the case of this last Convention when some well-informed persons wheeled out a cannon in the vicinity of the hall, and the solemn booming of the gun accompanied the votes "for Horatio Seymour." But then this was only relatively and momentarily impressive. Absolutely and leisurely considered, it was not very imposing. The cannon began long before the nomination was made, while yet it would have been possible for the friends of Hendricks or those of Hancock to defeat the nominee. And the cannon and a full brass band set the galleries shouting in what was really wild enthusiasm, and too obviously—too obviously for the interests of reverential respect for their deliberations—affected the votes of delegates. Yet it was easy to be affected by the vast mass of disappointment that there must have been in the assembly when the nomination fell where it did—which, indeed, there would necessarily have been wherever the nomination might have fallen. The list of the rejected was very long. One heart we know that must have been made sad by the failure of Asa Packer. The owner of it, who looked the incarnation of the Resolutions of '98, conversed eagerly with his neighbors on the prospects of "Pennsylvania's favorite son." As the roll of the States was called and Pennsylvania's name came, he regularly made an endeavor to start applause for Packer. "Pennsylvania adheres to Packer," he would say after each of many ballotings. "Yes, sir, they told me this morning that would be their course. And if she adheres to him he will be the man. This nomination is controlled by Pennsylvania. Let her stick to Packer and he will very soon receive the vote of the entire South. Why will he? Yes, but they do know him. When Mr. Davis's nephews and nieces were destitute at the close of the war Mr. Packer relieved them; he took them into his own house and sent them to school, and provided for them in every way. The South knows that, and they are only waiting to testify their appreciation of it, and you'll see before long. Their votes for Hancock are merely complimentary; they will go solid for Packer when the moment arrives. And we can whip with him. He could carry Pennsylvania sure; he is worth fifteen millions of dollars, and he would spend two of it in order to carry the State. You 'll see that he will be the man." Then there was the pungent grief of Mr. Pendleton's friends; and the more controlled sorrow of the Chase men, who, indeed, felt no personal affection for their candidate, but who did very much "want a man to win with," and who "had been whipped often enough;" and there were the Hendricks men who had been not unreasonably hopeful till the last minute, and who had the satisfaction of witnessing their defeat and of perceiving, when it was too late, just how it might have been made victory. Indiana, it was said, voted against Pendleton too soon, and ought to have left it for the Seymour men to kill him; as it was, it was upon their skirts that his blood seemed to be found, and the vengeance of the Pendleton men was the success of the New Yorkers and their concealed candidate. The talk that a Western candidate now would make a Western candidate four years from now impossible, was not, we imagine, felt to be very weighty; there being no certainty that the West will let the East have any more Presidents in any case.

However, to the casual observer, little or nothing of these disappointed hopes or ambitions was visible. There were far more New Yorkers present than people of any other State, and there can be no doubt of the popularity of Mr. Seymour with the mass of the State Democracy. Then he had wisely been made the President of the Convention, where his elaborately dignified manners and gubernatorial look no doubt made a good impression on every Democrat in the room. The declination of the nomination, too, was done with every appearance of feeling, and, at a distance, exhibitions of feeling are sure to give the impression of sincerity in the utterance which accompanies them. The speaker's voice trembled; he was emphatic in declaring that honor compelled him to refuse the candidacy; he abruptly left the chair when the tide seemed to be setting in favor of his friends. Then, for another thing, when the final ballot was entered upon, there was no good reason (outside of the Ohio, New York, and, possibly, some other delegations; certainly, in the galleries and lobbies there was no good reason for supposing) that the Convention might not sit for several more days. It took everybody by surprise, and a majority of the sweltering spectators it greatly relieved, when it suddenly appeared that a candidate was to be given immediately. Then, again, it must probably be conducive to enthusiasm—as that quality is found in crowds—when men can vote in a person's honor in his very presence. Add the voice of the cannon coming in at short intervals, and the music of the band playing "Rally Round the Flag," and there is no difficulty in accounting for enough of hurrahing and hat-swinging and standing on benches to make the Democratic onlooker believe heartily what the speakers said when they swung the guidons and declared that Iowa or Delaware, or whatever State it might be, desired to change its vote and cast so many ballots for Horatio Seymour, and "This is a nomination, sir, with which we shall march to victory at the polls, and with which upon our banners we will hurl from power the vandals who now disgrace our country."

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. HURD & HOUGHTON announce these works:—"The Tragedian: An Essay on the Histrionic Genius of Junius Brutus Booth," by Thomas R. Gould; "Sketches Abroad with Pen and Pencil," by F. O. C. Darley; "The Holidays: Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide; A Book descriptive of Sports and Observances," by N. B. W., with illustrations by Darley; a four-volume Student's Edition of Macaulay's "History," and five books for youthful readers, namely—"Stories of the Prairies," being selections from the works of J. F. Cooper; "The Ainslee Stories," by Helen C. Weeks; "Little Lou's Sayings and Doings;" "Tales for Little Convalescents," by Mrs. S. H. Bradford; and a "Robinson Crusoe," illustrated by Mr. Nast.——We have not previously mentioned as in preparation by Messrs. Roberts Brothers, "A Book about Boys," by A. R. Hope, and "Little Women: A Girl's Book," by Miss L. M. Alcott.——Mr. J. S. Redfield returns to the publishing business, and begins by announcing a reprint, in the form of a duodecimo, of the articles on "Woman in her Various Aspects," which have been appearing in the Saturday Review. Perhaps he will be able to learn in the course of his negotiations whether the report is true that Mrs. Edwards, the novelist, is the author of the articles in question.

—A week or two since we spoke of an excellent work, "The Annals of Rural Bengal" (New York: Leypoldt & Holt), by Mr. W. W. Hunter, who, leaving the beaten track of British historians of India, busying himself neither with the debates in Parliament, nor the diplomacy of high officials, nor the episodical fighting which makes a good half of Indian history, as usually written, turns aside to an agricultural district, which he knows thoroughly, and shows us, from its obscure annals, how the mass of the people were affected in their lives and fortunes by the policy of their rulers. Philologically, also, we must not forget to say, his work is of value. We see advertised in the English journals a forthcoming book bearing on the same subject, and which promises to be of more general interest. It is the work of a Bengalee, educated in the English way. Baboo Bholonauth Chunder is the name of the author, and the title of his book is "Travels of a Hindoo" (London: Trübner & Co.) The English and American public—the Western reading public in general—may in this work for the first time look at the Hindoos with Hindoo eyes. They are, perhaps, the eyes of a sceptical Hindoo, but not the worse on that account.

—The attention of our readers on the Pacific coast may very well be called to an important publication which offers to "enable a person who understands English to communicate effectively with natives who understand nothing but Chinese." It is an "Anglo-Chinese Dictionary," by the Rev. W. Lobscheid. It has been in progress since 1864, and has had the labor of a large staff. Two of the four parts which the complete work will comprise are already published; the third and fourth will both be issued before the year closes. All the new terms which the Chinese have recently had to make for the new things with which their changed foreign relations have been bringing them acquainted, the dictionary gives, it is said, in extenso, and each word is fully explained.

—Of all the magazines that have flourished and decayed at Harvard among the undergraduates none, we believe, has been so successful as the Advocate, a bi-weekly journal established three years ago, and none, so far as we know, and we believe we have looked at all of them, ever so well deserved success. As a rule the college periodical of old times fell sick and died because sooner or later it was seized upon by that class of writers who abound in colleges and wherever else young writers abound, who do badly what older writers in the magazines of the world outside the college yard are doing better or well. There was little truth, we fear, in the theory that the faculty's notorious hatred of genius and love of the cruelest tyranny caused the Harvard Magazine and its predecessors to perish as they did. The Advocate is not without its rather too ambitious essayists and the poets are as of old; but on the whole the impression one gets from it is that of the light-heartedness, vivacity, and fun proper to youth. Some of the chaff is as natural and pleasant in print as it is in the talk of the young men among themselves, and in point of excellence as literary workmanship is very far superior to the old sort of thing—the reviews of Professor W. E. Aytoun, and the musings in the fire-light at the close of the junior year, and the essays on William the Conqueror, which once were in vogue. Then the air of genuineness and reality which the Advocate wears is increased by the fulness of its college news and its healthy show of advertisements, features of the new periodical which the old ones generally wanted. In the number before us the editors propose something of a change in the character of the paper. Hereafter they are going to give in each issue a column of news about graduates, and to make this full and trustworthy in its intelligence they will put themselves, so far as may be possible, into regular communication with the Class Secretaries. They intend, too, to publish, gratis, all notices of class meetings, etc., etc., which it is now the practice of the secretaries to print in the papers of various cities. Thus the Advocate may become, for certain purposes, a convenient organ of the graduates; and there is no need, and we hope no danger, that in doing so it shall any less than formerly please the graduate by the lively picture it gives him of the state of feeling and the tone of opinion among his successors in the old scenes. What money they can make from their subscription list the editors will give to the fund for purchasing books for the much suffering college library—"a worthy cause." In its typographical appearance the Advocate is one of the most satisfactory journals printed in the United States.

—The Christian Examiner for July very appropriately speaks a few words—which would have been better for more dates and greater fulness generally—in commemoration of the late Doctor Noyes. That able and honest scholar was always a chief support and ornament of the Examiner. The most striking event in the life of the magazine—perhaps in the life of Doctor Noyes as well—was the appearance in the Examiner for July, 1834, of an article in which it was maintained that "the supposed prediction of Jesus as a personal Messiah came from the misinterpretation of a few scattered passages, and had no ground in a right understanding of the record." For publishing this article Dr. Noyes, the author, was threatened by the Attorney-General of Massachusetts with a prosecution for blasphemy. George Rapall Noyes, deceased at Cambridge on the 3d of June, was born at Newburyport, Mass., in 1798. At the age of twenty-four he had passed through Harvard College and the Divinity School of the University, and was licensed to preach. He was not, however, ordained as a pastor until he was nearly thirty, when he was invited to become the minister of a church in Brookfield (1827-1834). He was afterwards (1834-1840) settled in Petersham. It was in 1827 that he published his "Amended Version of the Book of Job," a work distinguished by a bold application to the Scriptures of a method of handling which sacrificed dogmas and literary graces alike to an accurate rendering of the text. Everything was abandoned without hesitation which seemed to the critic and expounder unwarranted by the words before him. In this same spirit—which, be it said, was never at war with modesty and scrupulous endeavors after accuracy—Doctor Noyes afterwards translated all the second half of the Bible, and he left behind him the completed translation, soon to be published, of the New Testament. From 1840 till his death Doctor Noyes filled the Hebrew chair in the Divinity School at Cambridge, and his death is to be lamented not only as the loss of an able scholar and critical writer, but as the loss of a valuable instructor, whose usefulness increased with advancing years, which mellowed while they ripened his mind.

—How much the whole community is interested in the inviolability of the telegraph, plainly appeared from the severity with which almost every journal in the country animadverted upon the recent seizure of telegrams under the authority of Congress. At the time, we expressed the opinion that the seizure was a high-handed measure, but that in certain cases such seizures are justifiable, and we expressed or implied the opinion that the public anger was almost or quite as much due to Mr. Butler's being allowed to overhaul private correspondence and publish it at his own sweet will, as to any settled belief on the part of the people that in no case should Congress examine letters and messages; though, of course, making such examinations will always be a peculiarly odious exertion of power, and none but a blind or stupid partisan will ever consent, except under pressure of necessity, to irritate the people by indulging it. Of the law in the matter there is no doubt. "In no case," says the Western Union Telegraph Company

"no matter how skilful the plea made by the company, has it ever been able to evade the demand of any court for the production of despatches;" and the production of despatches is a matter of almost daily occurrence. Even where courts have required the production of messages sent by persons not parties to the special suit in hand, the company has in vain resisted the requirement. The company says further—and it is worth remembering—that the Congressional committee did not demand and did not receive the general files of its Washington office; certain despatches specifically described, so far as specific description was possible, were asked for and were furnished, and were furnished only upon written requisition. In conclusion, we may say that the Journal of the Telegraph is our authority for the statement that the telegraph companies "everywhere sustain" a bill now before Congress which the legal fraternity will, we should say, everywhere oppose as soon as they get information of it, but which, we imagine, the general public, past and future plaintiffs, as well as past and possible defendants, will look on with favor. The closing section provides: "That every message or despatch delivered for transmission to any such telegraph company shall be held and deemed a confidential communication made to such company by the person or persons so delivering the same; and it shall not be lawful for any such company, either in pursuance of any order, subpœna, writ, or process, or otherwise, to deliver, produce, exhibit, or allow inspection of any such message or despatch, or of any part of the same, or of any copy thereof, or to communicate or disclose the contents or meaning thereof, or of any part thereof, to any courts, judicial tribunals, officers, or persons, or any of them, other than the persons by whom the same shall have been delivered, or to whom the same shall have been originally addressed, or his or their agents, etc.: Provided, however, that in case of suit or other proceeding against any such telegraph company, its officers, agents, or employees, or any of them, for damages for any fault, delay, or failure in the transmission or delivery of any telegraph message, it shall be lawful for such telegraph company, its agents or employees, to produce any message or communication which may be material or necessary to his or their defence."

—Mr. Samuel Lover died in Dublin on the 8th of the month, at the age of seventy-one years. He was best known in this country as the author of "Handy Andy," a book not so well worth attention as some of his shorter stories and some of his pretty little songs. It marks very well, however, its author's true place as an Irish novelist, or rather as a writer of Irish novels—a place between that of Gerald Griffin and William Carleton, with their wonderful vividness and truthfulness of delineation, and that occupied by Charles Lever in his essentially false, vulgar, and trivial earlier books, such, for example, as "Charles O'Malley." In his later books Lever is a very different personage, and is not to be spoken of without a certain degree of respect. Mr. Lover was something of a painter, something of an actor, something of an improvisatore, an entertaining lecturer, something of a poet in both of the two ways that modern Irish poets are apt to tread in —the rollicking and the soft-sentimental; and, as everybody knows who has read "The White Horse of the Peppers" and "Barney O'Reirdon the Navigator," something of a story-teller and more of a humorist of a certain conventional sort. The "Irish Harps," and other collections of comic and pathetic songs, will take him honorably to posterity as the gay-hearted and kind-hearted man who wrote "Rory O'More" and "Molly Bawn" and "The Angel's Whisper," and for more than a generation yet the boys in all English-speaking parts of the world will properly rejoice in him as a writer for the boyish, as the author of the happy-go-lucky, light-hearted, rather vulgarizing "Handy Andy." For grown men, except for grown men considered as tenor singers, he can hardly be called a writer. He died generally respected and regretted; and with his departure the age of Byron and Moore and Scott seems to take another receding step away from our days.

—M. Ernest Renan's discussion of the condition of the higher education, in his "Questions Contemporaines," has called forth an interesting article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, which offers a somewhat novel, but we have no doubt well founded, defence for what may be called the Government's monopoly of the colleges and high schools, instead of leaving them to be established by private enterprise. The writer says that private enterprise is so feeble in France that no high school or college would ever be founded or conducted by laymen, if the Government declined the task. The result of its withdrawal from all interference would simply be that the higher education, and in fact all education, would pass into the hands of the priests. M. Jourdain's recent report on education in France shows that even with regard to primary and secondary schools, where the field was opened to private enterprise, the priests rapidly got the better of the laymen. In 1856 there were 16,736 private schools, of which 12,888 were in the hands of laymen and only 3,848 founded by religious societies. In 1865 the proportion was changed, and there are now only 9,847 lay schools, while there are 6,502 clerical schools. M. Renan makes a fierce and well-merited attack on the too prevalent doctrine that it is the common schools that are the important thing in national education, and that the universities are of comparatively little consequence. "It is the university," he says, "which makes the common school"—meaning, no doubt, that it is the university which gives the teacher his standard and society its tone. "It has been said," he adds, "that it was the district schoolmaster who conquered at Sadowa. No; what conquered at Sadowa was German science and German virtue; it was philosophy, Protestantism, and Luther, Kant, Fichte, Hegel. The instruction of the people is the effect of the high culture of certain classes. Countries which, like the United States, have created a good system of popular education, without a high order of university education, will long expiate their error by their intellectual mediocrity, the coarseness of their tendencies, and their want of general intelligence." The United States, of course, is not open to the charge of having deliberately neglected university education, or deliberately contenting itself with common schools. It has done the best thing and the only thing with regard to both which a new country could do. Whether or not the result be as shocking as M. Renan fancies, this much is certain, that side by side with a prodigious development and improvement of university education we also witness among us a growing reverence for "the graduates of the common schools," as all that men need desire to be, against which it is the duty of everybody who is interested in the national progress to strive, for national force depends no less on the degree of the national culture than on its diffusion.

MORAL MEDICATION.*

This is a somewhat diffuse, but a very sturdy and honest and, with certain limitations, a very sensible book. The sleep of which the author principally treats is the artificial or "magnetic" sleep, the so-called hypnotic state of Braid; and the purpose of the treatise is to show the essential identity of this and some other abnormal conditions, such as fascination, hallucination, and the like, with ordinary slumber, and to advocate the application of it to the treatment of various forms of disease. The theoretical fabric of the author seems to us in many places insecure (to speak mildly), but a part of his generalizations may be accepted provisionally as giving a very convenient and simple form of expression for the course of the phenomena. The "attention" is to him the great working agent which presides over all the changes, bodily or mental, conscious or unconscious, which we undergo. When it diffuses itself equably through all our several senses, we are awake and with our wits about us; when it flows more particularly towards one form of sensibility, at the expense of the rest in a slight degree, we are more or less "absorbed" and "abstracted." When it withdraws itself entirely from the reach of sensibility, and retires into unconscious caverns, where its existence, if recognized at all, can only be recognized afterwards by its effects, we are sound asleep; when from this latent condition it emerges, but only into a very limited and one-sided connection with the world of sensibility, we are dreaming, somnabulic, delirious, cataleptic, etc., etc.

We think this extended use of the word "attention" to be by no means inappropriate. The phenomena of somnambulism, mania, etc., are connected with those of what is commonly called attention by such a number of gradual steps, all characterized by a diminution of mental activity in some directions, running parallel to its exaltation in others, a narrowing of its channel proportional to its deepening, that it seems quite justifiable to grasp all the terms of this series of facts of mental concentration under the name by which the most familiar term is known to us. The hypothesis that the nervous system is a sort of receptacle of definite size and shape, in which the attentive mind, like a small quantity of some fluid, distributes itself in very various manners at different times, is, of course, a crude mechanical image; but it is serviceable, and it seems doubtful if, for a long time to come, we shall be enabled to attain a conception really much more precise of the relation between matter and consciousness. The assumption of "non-functional nervous currents," that is, the transmission of nerve-force generated in one part of the system to be expended in another without the intervening organs being excited, is hardly a bit more definite.

Our author seems to think that the sum of the mind's operations, conscious and unconscious, should at all times be a constant quantity, and that the investigator is bound in every case to establish the equation. This entirely gratuitous assumption leads him to some curious theories. Thus, in ordinary heavy, and for aught we know dreamless slumber, he accounts for the disappearance of that part of the mind which at other times animates the senses, muscles, etc., by saying that it has become "fixed" upon the "idea of repose." Sleep, in other words, is an active function set up by a state of extreme concentration of the attention. One of the characteristics of all these concentrated states of the attention is the inertia of the mind in them, its passivity or want of "initiative," and the author consequently thinks that the only reason why we ever wake at all from our slumbers is that we make a resolve to do so before dropping asleep, and that a part of the attention remains fixed on this resolve, measures the time more or less exactly, and finally recalls the rest from the place where it stands monotonously "pointing." We are very unwilling to accept such an account of the facts, not so much for the reason that we have no consciousness of the "idea of repose," or of the resolve to awake, as because what we now know of the circulation in the sleeping brain leads us to infer that its functions as a whole are depressed, and that while the senses are steeped in deadness, it is by no means necessary to suppose that the mass of attention which they have lost is necessarily engaged elsewhere in glaring fixedly upon an "idea," or anything else. Most of the facts of somnambulism seem quite consistent with a diminution in the total amount of energy in the brain. The oblivion in which somnambulists are almost invariably plunged after waking, shows that the material changes on which their sleeping ideas depended were very faint, otherwise they would have left recoverable traces. The vividness of their perception at the moment may be explained by their being the sole channel through which whatever small amount of free attention the nervous system could furnish was poured. But the total amount of this may be much less than in the waking state.

* "A. A. Liébault. Du Somneil et des Etats analogues, considérés surtout au point de vue de l'Action du Moral sur le Physique." 8vo. Paris: Masson. 1866.

In these dark places we must often advance without even a physical analogy to guide us. And little as we are able to conceive of the actual process, it seems now established as an indubitable fact that one state natural to the mind is that of inertia, a condition in which it is the passive slave of a limited group of impressions. The peculiarity of the state seems to consist rather in the limitation of the impressions than in the fatality with which they tow the mind after them wherever they chance to go. For the mind naturally accepts every impression as a reality. Professor Bain speaks obscurely of a mental law of inertia, "analogous to the first law of motion," which gives rise to our belief in the uniformity of nature, and makes us think that what has been will be. Dr. Liébault insists on our original and native "necessity of belief," and probably neither the ordinary dreamer nor the somnambulist who is at the mercy of every suggestion of his magnetizer, exhibits in that any very exceptional property. The remarkable feature in his condition is that so many points of his sensibility are paralyzed and incapable of vibration. The enormous network by which our ideas and impressions are associated when awake, seems to have all its meshes severed but a few along whose narrow path the attention proceeds, and dwells immovably when the path ends. The fine degree to which this specialization is carried in artificial somnambulism is very remarkable. The somnambule is "en rapport" with the "magnetizer," as every one knows, but not with other persons present. Dr. Liébault says this is a simple consequence of the fact that the idea of the magnetizer has been continuously carried over from the waking to the sleeping attention of the patient. One by one, as the mental narrowing proceeded, other objects of sense dropped out, but the idea of the operator being uninterrupted, the sensible impressions in immediate connection with that idea are animated by it, and do not share in the general closure. "The somnambule sleeps less for the magnetizer, of whom he has a vague idea, than for the other spectators, of whom he has no idea at all." But not only does the sleeper hear his operator alone, he only hears him when directly spoken to. "When the operator talks to other people or makes a noise in the room, the subject is impassible." Even this is analogous to what happens in our waking hours. "We have heard a man in a public-house," says the author, "make a speech against the character of another beside whom he was sitting, but without knowing it; while the individual thus attacked, absorbed in playing cards, did not notice that he was spoken of, and yet, at the same time, answered very well another person who saluted him by name." A mother in ordinary sleep will wake at a very slight noise made by her infant, while she will sleep through much louder disturbances which have another cause. By suggestions made through the sense which is open, other channels for the attention may be opened, and the patient led through all sorts of experiences in turn by the operator. Even in ordinary sleep, something of this sort is not infrequent. The tactile sensibility being the last to expire in this condition, it is often possible, by placing the fingers for a couple of minutes on the forehead or other part of the skin of a sleeper, to lead out the attention, as it were, through the fingers to the voice, and thence to various subjects which one may suggest.

The famous seeing, hearing, smelling, etc., by the pit of the stomach in certain cataleptics, which has played such a part in the history of somnambulism, is attributed by the author to nothing more than this specialization of sensibility. He has made the same experiments, and, to succeed, it was only necessary "to suggest these two principal ideas: . . . . . first, the fixed idea of only replying to questions made at the pit of the stomach; and, second, that of neglecting words not addressed to the same place." It was the ear that heard, but only under these suggested conditions. The helpless passivity of the mind is illustrated by many cases given by the author. Here is one: "We told a somnambulist that she should see one of her neighbors dressed like a nun. As we had kept her eyes closed during the time we were describing the details of the costume, we were surprised at her perceiving afterwards a nun in wooden shoes and a colored apron; we had forgotten to give her the notion of the shoes of the order, and to abstract that of the apron." Another somnambulist was reading. A screen being interposed between the book and his face, he, of course, ceased to read, but had no consciousness of the screen. His visual attention was only determined to the book, and remained simply vacant when that was cut off from him. The extraordinary intensity with which the attention thus narrowed down receives the reports of the sense to which it may be confined, is established beyond a doubt, and is probably the cause of most of the apparent miracles which somnambulists perform. Two deaf-mutes, treated by the author, became aware of sounds previously unknown to them. A somnambulist distinguished infallibly by his tongue, among six glasses of water poured from the same decanter, one which had been warmed by some one's finger-tips being held over it for two minutes. In the same way the memory may be momentarily exalted.

But now there come phenomena of a still more obscure kind—those in which an idea is received by the mind consciously, but executed outside of the consciousness. Perhaps the most familiar example of this occurs when people go to bed with the resolve to awake at a certain hour, and do so. The measurement of the time here is often much more accurate than any the subject could perform while awake. Other cases are commonly referred to the action of the "imagination" on the body; thus, a sick person thinks her physician intends to purge her, receives a dose of opium, and is purged, etc. "Numerous experiments made on sleepers have corroborated the principle that all thought relative to the sedation or excitement of the vegetative functions is interpreted exactly in the economy. Magnetizers have diminished, by suggestion, the pulse of somnambulists. We have succeeded by suggestion, in somnambulists, in slowly producing the congestion of a very limited part of the cutaneous surface; and we have in like manner determined hæmorrhages of mucous membranes for a time fixed in advance. We have made them small or abundant as we pleased, and we have caused them to continue or to cease." "We have affirmed to several somnambulists that they should be purged, either immediately or a long time after awaking; we defined the number of diarrheic evacuations, and without their retaining any idea of our intervention, these effects, the development of the fixed ideas imposed, were realized, point by point. . . . In order thoroughly to convince ourselves of the reality of the acts suggested and accomplished, we ordered during sleep that subjects should sing after awaking who had never had the habit of doing so; we induced them to make, several hours and even several days later, inconvenient visits, which had no particular motive, or even actions reputed crazy. At the moment indicated, the idea of executing the acts imposed arose in the mind, and while accomplishing them the agents believed firmly that they were acting from their own initiative." "Again, if one present an imaginary idea to the attention of a somnambule, whether it be the idea of an object of vision or of touch, and if he be assured that he shall keep it fixedly for days and even weeks after awaking, the hallucination which results will last out the designated time. We have made thus toothaches and the pains of stigmatization tenaciously persist in persons to whom suffering of this sort was previously unknown."

Dr. Liébault claims that such powers as these in the mind should be enlisted in the service of therapeutics. As the mind calls forth disease in hypochondriacs and hysterics, so it should be employed to banish it. And the state of artificial sleep which enables us to mass the attention fixedly upon one point, or to withdraw it from another upon which it has morbidly accumulated, is the easily manipulated instrument which we may use for the purpose. Of course, all subjects are not equally amenable to the treatment, nor all disorders in subjects that are. The author's claims are not extravagant. He does not profess, like so many of his predecessors, that this is a panacea. But what he says is that, in most somnambules, the power of thought is superior to that of drugs; and, as a large proportion of us all are somnambules, that the mental method of treatment should be more systematically applied by physicians than it has been. Our author complains that the profession has only recognized hitherto in the means of moral medication "an unaccountable and intractable force, designated by the name of imagination. . . . 'Prenez ce remède tant qu'il guérit,' said Bouvard. These words are profound. . . . There should no more be an aristocracy of remedies than of physicians, and as soon as we can purge a patient with opium, or with nothing at all, let us do so." As a contribution to moral medicine of more value than the records of animal magnetism, the author gives an account of his own practice. It is not very extensive (he appears to be a country physician, and only to have tried the power of sleep in a limited number of his cases), but failures as well as successes are candidly reported, and the total result should certainly encourage other practitioners to follow in his traces. The most satisfactory item is that of "anemia." Out of 39 patients only 7 failed to be impressible. Of the remaining 32, who were amenable to moral means, he tabulates the results thus:

| Anemias treated. | No. | Radical cure. | Very probable cure. | Temporary cure or relief. | Failure. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1. By affirmation while awake, . . . . . | 5 | 3 | 2 | — | — |
| 2. By affirmation during charm, . . . . | 18 | 7 | 2 | 9 | — |
| 3. By affirmation during somnambulism, | 9 | 6 | — | 2 | 1 |

Of the other disorders treated, most seem to have had a more or less nervous element. The largest contingent of success was in relieving pain and discomfort in a great variety of cases. There are some other very remarkable cases of relief (e. g., phthisis pulm.), but the number of cases is too small to draw conclusions. Of course, the principle in suggestion is to divert the attention, to displace it from morbid symptoms, and to concentrate it upon functions which are torpid. To practitioners who are desirous of trying their success, we cordially recommend the perusal of this book. They will find in it a great many sagacious practical hints, besides many observations promising to be of scientific importance, which we have had no space to note. It seems high time that a realm of phenomena which have played a prominent part in human history from time immemorial should be rescued from the hands of uncritical enthusiasm and charlatanry, and conquered for science; and this will never be done unless educated medical men, who are daily forced up to the very threshold, shake off the discreditable shyness which has hitherto characterized them, and walk boldly in to take possession.

GEORGE SAND'S MADEMOISELLE MERQUEM.*

MADAME SAND'S last novel—the last in a very long list, the reader will remember—is decidedly not one of the best of her works; but as it has enjoyed the rare fortune of being translated in this country, a few critical remarks may not fall amiss. The time was when Madame Sand's novels were translated as fast as they appeared, and circulated, half surreptitiously, as works delightful and intoxicating, but scandalous, dangerous, and seditious. To read George Sand in America was to be a socialist, a transcendentalist, and an abolitionist. You may obtain from the biography of Margaret Fuller an impression of the sort of influence which she exercised in certain circles, and of the estimation in which she was held; of the large credit attached to her philosophical and didactic pretensions, which seem to us somewhat vain; and of the apparent indifference bestowed upon her vast imaginative and descriptive powers. One of Miss Fuller's first acts on reaching Paris, we learn from her life, was to call upon Madame Sand, effecting thereby, as it seems to you in reading the life, a very curious and anomalous conjunction. It may be added, however, that although George Sand figures in Miss Fuller's memoirs, the brilliant American is not mentioned in those of her illustrious sister. For ourselves, the first occasion on which Madame Sand became to us something more than a name was on the perusal of a chapter in Thackeray's "Paris Sketch Book," in which the author, in a moralizing mood, pulls to pieces one of her novels. The work in question was "Spiridion," from which, unfortunately for his intent, he translates a passage of some length. We cherished the passage in our memory—and indeed the writer admits its great beauty—but we retained a very vague impression of the drift of Mr. Thackeray's sermon. The impression was vivid enough, however, when subsequently we came to read "Spiridion" (which we must premise to be a tale of a purely religious cast, without incidents and without love, without the mention, indeed, throughout of a woman's name), forcibly to suggest the reflection that it was a piece of signal impertinence in the author of the "Sketch Book," holding, as he obviously did, the lightest and most superficial religious opinions, to measure his flimsy convictions against the serious and passionate ideas propounded in Madame Sand's work. We can perfectly well understand that Thackeray should not have liked "Spiridion"—to ourselves it is not an agreeable book—but there can be no better instance of that superficial and materialistic quality of mind which constantly chafes the serious reader of his novels, than his gross failure to appreciate the relative dignity of Madame Sand's religious attitude and of his own artificial posture. But these are things of the past, and possibly best, forgotten. The last of Madame Sand's novels translated in America was one of her prettiest tales, "Teverino," which, we believe, had but little success. Since "Teverino" the author has produced a vast number of romances, and exhibited a greater fecundity, we think, considering the quality of her work, than any writer of our day. With all her precipitation, not one of her tales (we believe we have read them all) can be said to have forfeited the claim to literary excellence. This is certainly more than can be said for the productions of her confrères, Messrs. Dumas and Eugene Sue.

Your foremost impression, we fancy, on reading the work before us, "Mademoiselle Merquem," is of the extraordinary facility in composition begotten by the author's incessant practice. Never has a genius obtained a more complete and immediate mastery of its faculties. In the pages before us they seem to move not, as in common minds, at its express behest and injunction, but in harmony with its very instincts, and simultaneously with the act of inspiration. This perfect unity of the writer's intellectual character, the constant equilibrium of the powers reigning within its precinct, the confidence with which the imagination appeals to the faculty of utterance, and the radiant splendor which the latter reflects so gratefully from the imagination—these things, more than any great excellence of form in particular works, constitute the author's real claim to admiration and gratitude. These things it is which bestow an incomparable distinction on this actual "Mademoiselle Merquem" far more than any felicity of selection in the way of events and characters. The narrative gushes along copious and translucent as a deep and crystalline stream, rolling pebbles and boulders and reflecting all the convex vault of nature. Madame Sand's style, as a style, strikes us as so far superior to that of other novelists, that while the impression of it is fresh in your memory, you must make up your mind to accept her competitors wholly on the ground of their merits of substance, and remit for the time the obligation of writing properly. The great difference between the author of "Consuelo" and "Mademoiselle Merquem," and the authors (let us say) of "The Newcomes" and of "David Copperfield," is, that whereas the latter writers express in a satisfactory manner certain facts, certain ideas of a peculiar and limited order, Madame Sand expresses with equal facility and equal grace ideas and facts the most various and the most general. The things which we can imagine Thackeray and Dickens attempting to say will be found on reflection, if we are not mistaken, to be but so many variations of a small number of stock ideas and images. Thackeray will say nothing that cannot be said humorously, colloquially, and lightly—in the light sentimental manner, at best. Dickens will say nothing that cannot be said specifically—applied to a particular person or thing. But the movement of Madame Sand's thoughts seems to us as free as the air of heaven. They progress with equal ease to the right hand and to the left, and she considers and contemplates all things with a superior and impartial mind. You do not feel that she looks at the world in any degree as a specialist. She handles men and women, the rich and the poor, the peasant and the noble, the passionate and the joyous, with equal sympathy and power. This characteristic gives to her descriptions of natural scenery and of personal character a breadth and profundity which we miss in corresponding passages in other novelists. We shall perhaps be excused for attempting to illustrate the sense of our words; and we choose for the purpose a short description of mountain scenery in "Teverino," premising that it is one of a dozen in the same work, and that it appears to be flung upon the paper absolutely without effort and without the consciousness of doing a fine thing:

"Our travellers had reached the summit of a long and painful ascent, and on emerging from the bed of rock in which they had been confined they saw an immense valley stretched out beneath them at a giddy depth. From the plateau on which they stood gigantic rocks, crowned with snow, still lifted themselves towards heaven. Nature was bare, grotesque, frightfully romantic; but before them the road, descending with a rapid inclination, plunged in a thousand picturesque contortions toward the gradual slopes of a region fertile, smiling, and richly colored. What could have been more beautiful than such a spectacle at sunset, when through the angular framework of the Alpine scenery you discovered the splendor of the fruitful soil, the blooming sides of the intermediate hills, all glowing with the western fires, the gulfs of greenness unrolled into space, the enkindled streams and lakes scattered like burning-glasses through the mighty picture, and, further still, the belts of blue, mingling but unconfounded, the violet horizon, and the sky sublime with light and transparency."

* "Mademoiselle Merquem: A Novel. By Madame George Sand." New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. 1868.

There are in modern novels descriptions more elaborate than this, more précieuses, as the French say, but none, we imagine, more free, comprehensive, and sincere. The mind producing it seems not to have isolated and contracted itself in the regions of perception, but to expand with longing and desire.

Madame Sand's literary career has been, as the reader knows, a very long and eventful one. It is marked by a vast number of moral and intellectual stages or stations, and now, towards its close, it assumes a form in which the sagacity and serenity of age are very finely blended with the freshness and lightness of an immortal imagination. "Mademoiselle Merquem" bears the stamp of an intellect weary of the contemplation of disorder, and of an inventive faculty for which, not to move and act—not to frolic through space like another Ariel—is simply to die. Herein resides both the strength and the weakness of Madame Sand's imagination. It is indefatigable, inexhaustible; but it is restless, nervous, and capricious; it is, in short, the imagination of a woman. The romance before us is conceived and executed with a heartiness, a good faith, a spontaneity, which assuredly justify our use of the word "immortal." Madame Sand will die, but not her imagination. "Teverino," from which we have quoted, bears the date of 1845. Now there is no story which, as a composition, more truly than "Teverino" lives and breathes, unless it be "Mademoiselle Merquem."

The author's faculties seem not merely to have preserved themselves, but to have undergone a positive rejuvenescence. Nevertheless, we confess that we prefer her earlier works. Her later novels are almost too limpid, too fluent, too liquid. The creative spirit is well-nigh too impersonal, too impartial, too ethereal. A couple of years ago Madame Sand published a tale, "Le Dernier Amour," which, in spite of a very disagreeable subject, seemed to us as we read it the last word of narrative art. The progression of the story was as noiseless, as unrelenting, as the luminous growth of the moon. Nevertheless, as we say, we have a vague preference for the earlier tales, in which an occasional crudity or a fitful turgidity of diction appeared to remind us that we were dealing with literary and not with vital phenomena. Madame Sand's masterpieces, however, are scattered throughout her career, and in many cases stand cheek to cheek with some of her most trivial works. "Simon" appeared in the same year with "Mauprat," and "Les Beaux Messieurs de Bois-Doré" about the same time as that marvellous romance of "La Daniella." But taking it as a whole, and judging it in a liberal fashion, what a splendid array does this career exhibit! What a multitude of figures, what an infinite gallery of pictures! What a world of entertainment and edification! From our own point of view there has been none in modern years to compare with it, and to find a greater magician we must turn to the few supreme names in literature. Madame Sand is said to have celebrated but a single passion—the passion of love. This is in a great measure true; but in depicting it she has incidentally portrayed so many others that she may be said to have pretty thoroughly explored the human soul. The writer who has amply illustrated the passion of love has, by implication, thrown a great deal of light on the rest of our nature. In the same way, the writer who has signally failed to achieve an adequate conception of this vast object, must be said to remain an incomplete and partial witness. This is the case with Balzac, in so many respects Madame Sand's superior, and who is never to be considered as slighted by any praise bestowed upon his comrade. Balzac's merits form a very long story, and he is not to be dealt with in a parenthesis. An intelligent reader of both authors will, at times, be harassed with the feeling that it behooves him to choose between them and take up his stand with the one against the other. But, in fact, they are not mutually inimical, and the wise reader, we think, will take refuge in the reflection that choosing is an idle business, inasmuch as we possess them both. Balzac, we may say, if the distinction is not too technical, is a novelist, and George Sand a romancer. There is no reason why they should not subsist in harmony. A large portion of the works of both will eventually be swept into oblivion, but several of the best productions of each will, we imagine, survive for the delight of mankind. Let us softly add the expression of our belief that for Balzac, booked as he is for immortality or thereabouts, this is a very happy circumstance. You may read "Consuelo" and "Mauprat," and not be ashamed to raise your eyes from the book to the awful face of Nature. But when you have been reading "Le Père Goriot" or "Un Ménage de Garçon," you emphatically need to graduate your return to life. Who at such a moment better than George Sand can beguile the remorseful journey, and with "Consuelo" and "Mauprat," or even with "L'Homme de Neige" and "Mademoiselle Merquem," reconcile you to your mortal lot?

POMEROY'S CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.*

In Professor Pomeroy's new work we have, what has been long a desideratum, a medium-sized volume combining a judicial exposition of the text of the written Constitution with a statesmanlike investigation of the source from which it derives its authority, as the primary act of public law.

It is remarkable that all the older writers have substantially ignored the underlying enquiry upon which the relative authority of the Constitution, as necessarily referable to some one or other political source, depends. They have directed much of their effort to a defence of the political value or expediency of the frame of government prescribed by the Constitution. But this was a task which had fallen upon a previous generation, and which had been so ably performed for it by the authors of the "Federalist," that their successors the commentators, in attempting to do the same thing for their own contemporaries, have been obliged to repeat their language. Nearly the whole of the "Federalist" may be found cited by Story. But all this vindication of the existing fundamental law is now obsolete. The Constitution stands a matter of fact, and its authority dispenses with the need of recommendation. The question is to understand it as matter of fact in two aspects—to know, first, From whom it proceeds, or, Why it continues to be law; and, secondly, What it requires.

There is a difference of opinion as to the relative importance and, indeed, propriety of these enquiries. The legal effect of the written instrument is obviously the subject of constitutional law, as it is ordinarily spoken of, and is the subject of professional explanation. Constitutional law, thus regarded, is constantly growing and developing itself, through the related operations of the judiciary and State and Federal legislation. We must, therefore, expect that new summaries from time to time will be needed. Many of the questions treated by the earlier writers at the greatest length, and as being most open to discussion, have become settled by judicial usage, and the events of the last ten years have brought out new classes of questions which are yet more or less subjects of controversy and which require renewed professional study. Mr. Pomeroy has the faculty of expressing legal ideas with clearness. He has been industrious and judicious in the classification and analysis of the authorities on particular questions, and the extent of the examination which they respectively receive is proportioned to their practical importance in view of the exigencies of the present time. His work deserves, too, to be commendably distinguished from a mere running commentary on the text of the Constitution. In general plan and development it corresponds with the character of the subject matter, as being the public law of a nation. Without caring to justify or defend the Constitution, as containing provisions more expedient than others which might be devised, the author gives much attention to what might be termed the legitimacy of the Constitution; or, in other words, to what is the only other question of fact, besides that of its legal effect, which can arise—that is, From whom does it proceed, or by whose will does it continue to operate as law?

Some may be disposed to ignore this enquiry as dangerous to the authority now accorded to the instrument; and to persuade themselves and others habitually to regard it as an inevitable and self-ordained something, which has supreme political force ex necessitate, inconsistent with the recognition of anything higher in order of time or in relation of cause and effect than itself. Mr. Pomeroy begins with this enquiry as a fundamental one in the public law. In the view commonly received as to the origin and authority of the present Constitution, it is ascribed to voluntary compact between the political organizations of the people which succeeded to the original colonies; each of these is supposed to have constituted a State, in the general and large sense of the word—that is to say, a separate and independent nationality. On this statement of its historical genesis it has been held, by one class of jurists, that a new political body, with national rights, powers, and sovereignty, was formed by the compact. By another class it has been held that no such result followed, or was contemplated; but that these rights and powers were only delegated to a government agreed upon, while the individuality and capacity of the compacting parties continued after, as before, the agreement. The first class affirmed the indissoluble nature of the union of the States as the result of grant and contract. The other affirmed its constant dependence on the will of the parties to the compact of government, that is, the several States, as being always individually sovereign in their essence. Some writers and jurists, though few, it may be, as compared with those legal and political authorities who have supported the two views above stated, have maintained that there is no place for any such question as to the dependence of the national unity upon the character of the Constitution; that, as matter of historical fact, the existence of a nation, or of a unitary political people, is independent of the existence of the States, and that when the States came into existence they became such only in being organic parts of a whole; the acquisition of independent power was by the people as a nation. No state ever was, severally, in possession of sovereignty or independence. The government, under the articles of confederation, was, in fact, a temporary usurpation by the State governments, as against the political people, of powers, for national purposes, which had never been confided to these governments. This theory is that which Mr. Pomeroy accepts.

* "An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States. Especially designed for students, general and professional. By John Norton Pomeroy, LL.D." New York: Hurd & Houghton. 1868.

It follows, naturally, from this theory of the national Constitution, that Mr. Pomeroy inclines to the support of the powers of the general Government, when the question is of their extent as compared with those of the States, and asserts the interpretation of the written Constitution to be the prerogative of this Government and not of the States. Also, as between the departments of this Government, he holds that the Supreme Court is the final interpreter, its decisions being "binding not only upon the parties to suits litigated before it, but upon the several States and upon the executive and Congress," a doctrine which hitherto has been maintained by "general assent, and which can be established by considerations drawn from the Constitution and from the nature of our Government, which seem to be absolutely irresistible." The principle that each department of the Government was the sole judge of the extent and character of its powers under the Constitution, an independent interpreter of that instrument, had been entertained by Presidents Jefferson and Jackson. But the author points out as dangerous a modern school of theorists, "representing ideas new in this country, who would raise Congress to a position equal in power to that of the British Parliament, would reduce the executive to the political level of the British crown, and entirely destroy the judiciary as a coordinate department of the Government." In a chapter on the three coordinate departments the author very earnestly expresses his conviction of danger that, in the inevitable struggle between them, the popular branch, or the legislative, will obtain and hold the ascendency:

"The Constitution is well so far as it goes; the design was good; the checks and balances were carefully and skilfully arranged; but no mere organic law can place a lasting barrier to the advance of a popular legislature. Step by step their powers are exceeded; the nation acquiesces; the precedent becomes established; and a system of construction is finally elaborated which takes the place of the written Constitution as a practical guide to the Government in its official duties. Unless the people always give life and force to the complicated machine established by the Constitution, keeping their servants and agents within the bounds assigned, the process described is sure. We may regret it, but we cannot prevent it. The next step would inevitably follow, which would be the consolidation of the national legislature into one body. Should this result be accomplished, the liberties of the people would be gone, only to be regained by another revolution. Nothing could withstand a legislature consisting of one house, practically wielding all governmental power, restrained by no checks of organization or function. No tyranny could equal its tyranny."

As compared with earlier works, more attention has in this been given to the question of impeachment and to the President's powers and duties. It is worthy of notice that so impartial a writer should, before the recent impeachment, have given the opinion that, though the President may not, as a general rule, judge independently of the validity of statutes passed, there may be two exceptions, which we pointed out in the Nation of March 5.

It is almost universal to refer, as Mr. Pomeroy does, the security of individual liberty to the States rather than to the national powers. We desire particularly, however, to notice that, in another place, Mr. Pomeroy pointed out as a misfortune or a mistake the fact, or at least undisputed judicial doctrine, that we have never during our national existence had a national Bill of Rights, and that the first eight articles of the amendments are a limitation in favor of private rights only against the powers held by the national Government. We believe there is a very prevalent misconception on this point. Indeed, we have seen the contrary of this statement positively asserted in a work on the Constitution published within the year past. The thirteenth amendment, read in the light of history, will probably be accepted as a prohibition of chattel slavery by State law, though it is not impossible that, hereafter, we may hear it urged that this amendment too can be a prohibition only against national, and not against State powers. But unless the fourteenth amendment is adopted, life, liberty, and property are dependent, to any extent short of absolute "slavery," which, except as chattel condition, is a vague term, upon the unlimited will of the States, without appeal to the national authority. Who can say how much virtue there will be in the legislative power given to Congress in the thirteenth amendment? The first section of the proposed fourteenth amendment is in these words: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." When we recall the nature of those police laws which once were enforced in every State of the Union in which slavery existed, we may conceive of the possible bearing of such provisions. Mr. Pomeroy justly considers "this amendment far more important than any which has been adopted since the organization of the Government, except alone the one abolishing the institution of slavery."

It would, indeed, be almost a revolution; it would give to the liberty of the individual inhabitant the will of the nation as its basis, instead of the will of a State. Yet we believe there is a very common prejudice that the State, as the smaller and weaker political power, is a safer trustee than the more powerful nation; as if the individual might hope more successfully to resist an encroachment on his liberty on the part of the State than he could the same on the part of the nation. This feeling is ascribable to the common notion that liberty, as against power, is something not positive but negative; that it subsists by antagonism to power and exemption from law. The fact is, that the smaller the community upon which the liberties of the individual depend, the more uncertain is his freedom. This is evident to reason, and proved by the whole history of feudalism. It is not out of place to remember that when the American colonies acknowledged the crown of Great Britain, the inhabitants, if of European descent, were guaranteed in the possession of individual rights against all governmental authority by the Magna Charta of the English barons, resting on the will of the British nation. During the Revolutionary and ante-constitutional period these rights were allowed, unconsciously it would almost seem, to slip from the broad base of national power, to which they naturally belonged, to the protection of the first guarantee offered them in the form of charter—the State constitutions. In all probability a bill of rights, clearly in regard to both national and state power, would have been prominent in the national Constitution if the status of the negro and Indian races had not, from the earliest period, been left to the independent action of the colonial authorities. Negro slavery fell to the share of State law, and thereby the liberty of the free-born white man fell into dependence on State power, and State rights gathered strength in secret to claim sovereignty against the nation. The day is past now that a national bill of rights, limited to a law of personal extent, should be framed. It must now be law of universal extent; law common to all, jus commune, as the common law of England, in England.

One other very important defect in the national Constitution Mr. Pomeroy has also noticed. Admitting that it should be left to the people of each State to determine what persons shall be electors in organizing the State government—

"It is certainly an anomaly that the general Government of the United States should have no control over the choice of its own delegates in Congress. It must be conceded that this is a defect in our organic law which needs amendment; it was an unnecessary and unfortunate concession to the theory of State sovereignty and independence. One code of rules should certainly prevail throughout the country to regulate the choice of representatives, and this should be the work of Congress or of the people in its sovereign capacity. The more national branch of Congress, that which comes directly from the people, should be entirely under the management of the one body politic which is represented in the general Government."

The author's political theory of the origin of the Constitution must, of course, exclude any claim of right in the States severally to withdraw from the Union; inasmuch as it was not founded upon any compact to which they were the consenting parties. The authority of the national Government to resist by military coercion the attempt to divide the Union is affirmed, with all its legal consequences. We are disappointed, however, by finding that Mr. Pomeroy has passed over the question of the effect of attempted secession and armed rebellion upon the political existence of the States. His idea of constitutional law is certainly broad enough to include this enquiry, though thoroughly political in its nature, and not contemplated by the written Constitution. The existence of acts of Congress for the temporary government of certain States, the so-called reconstruction legislation, must have its place in constitutional history, and constitutional law must either accept or reject it.

We cannot, however, wonder that the author should hesitate in approaching these questions, where the light of judicial decision grows dim and uncertain, and where the enquirer must rely on the soundness of his own first principles and the correctness of his own deductive process. If space allowed, we should be tempted to enquire whether, even admitting his historical basis for the national Constitution, there is not in his conception of "The People," the ultimate possessor of sovereignty, an error which would make any satisfactory conclusion on these points impossible. "The people themselves, the entire mass of persons who compose the political society, are the true nation, the final permanent depositary of all power." That this is true in a very general sense, in all countries, irrespectively of their particular form of government, we can admit. But yet we doubt whether it is of any particular value in the public law, or sufficiently precise to distinguish the ultimate power-holders in this republic in the existing crisis in its fortunes.

DAISY.*

Daisy Randolph, like her predecessors, Ellen Montgomery, Elfleda Ringgan, and the rest of them, is a too good little girl, who makes a triumphal passage from infancy to maidenhood, discomfiting sinners, fascinating and confounding the ungodly with the sight of so much saintliness in so small a space, and not only earning a title to the goods of the next world, but gaining a more than tolerably fair share of those distributed in this. Most people who read novels know what and how well Miss Warner writes. According to Mr. Matthew Arnold, her "Wide, Wide World" is sure of a place in the "Palatine Library of the future," when the world shall have fallen into the hands of the Philistines; and in the Church of the same period—not Mr. Norton's, by the way, but that treated of in a recent Galaxy—her heroines are likely enough to be canonized as saints. Meantime, let us confess that we regard her as a corrupter of ingenuous youth; and the fact that she is so unconsciously—that she apparently cherishes no deep-laid schemes against modesty and meekness, and that greatest of Christian virtues which "vaunteth not itself and is not puffed up," but is, on the contrary, only too confident that she herself is a "guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness," only makes the matter more disheartening. It is not impossible to fancy people who write novels of the "Guy Livingstone" stamp as being freed by advancing years and the calamities of life from their carnal bondage, and mourning in sackcloth and ashes over their former misdeeds. But a case like Miss Warner's is hopeless. The Word is made flesh for her in a sense quite other than the theological one. Her books show how the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, may persuade itself that it is possible to overcome that enmity and yet retain all its pleasing carnality. They are sermons preached, as the clergymen say, from the latter clause of the text which promises that under certain contingencies "all these things shall be added unto you." The text is a good one, and the theme it suggests is often enough handled by novelists; but our quarrel with Miss Warner is that she debases and materializes the "kingdom of God and his righteousness" by her interpretation of "these things." The moral of the book is, Be good girls, do up your penance and mortification with the proper flourish of trumpets, and you shall speedily be translated to spheres where silver and china, real lace and heavy silks will be the imperative duties of your position. Look, for instance, at the book under consideration, in which, to be sure, the author set herself an absurdly impossible task. Daisy has not the advantage of being the passive subject of biographic praises; she tells her own story, and what a story it is! It is the confessions of a fair saint after saintship has begun; after the inward foes have been trampled on, and the sole duty of life is to let the celestial light shine on other people. She has to tell how good she is, how modest, how pure, how conscientious—above all, how innocently unsophisticated. To do her justice, she never attempts to shirk her duty; beside her, the young woman who enquired which cow gave the buttermilk was a prodigy of worldly wisdom. Even she would hardly have chronicled the little conversation which ensued between Daisy and her partner at a West Point "hop," on her remarking that there were plenty of ladies present, nor detailed with such pleasing unconsciousness its effect upon him:

"'Plenty,' he said. 'What then?'

"'Only,' I said, 'so many people came and asked me to dance in the few minutes I stood by Mrs. Sandford; and one of them looked quite disappointed that he could not have me.'

"I was met by a look of the keenest enquiry, followed instantly and superseded by another flash of expression. I could not comprehend it at the time. The eyes which had startled me by their steely gleam, softened wonderfully with what looked like nothing so much as reverence," etc.

We don't mean to imply that there are not girls who could make such remarks quite innocently, but then we question their ability to interpret so readily and favorably the glances of the male eye, and totally deny their inclination to write autobiographies to glorify a life-time full of similar experiences. Daisy, however, has no scruples on that head. With a sweet pathos she recounts her sorrow at finding her father not quite up to her standard of goodness, her trials and prayers over the multiplication table, the yearnings of her spirit over her seven hundred slaves, and the good effects on them of the prayer-meeting which she established in her kitchen, presiding herself at the mature age of eleven years, and, as she says, impressing them with the keenest sense of her immeasurable superiority to them. Later, at school, she makes the sacrifice of wearing worsted plaid instead of a merino, and a grey dreadnaught instead of a velvet cloak, thereby bringing down upon herself great scorn from her companions, but much approbation from above. Providence interferes, however, in the person of a mother less conscientious in the matter of spending money than her heroic daughter, and supplies her with India muslins, real lace, Parisian dresses "which she dared not fail to use and wear," and, as a consequence, with the instant adulation of the before contemptuous school-girls. And then her lover! Miss Warner loves a lover, and though her favorite hero is apt to be a Methodist clergyman, she does not disdain, when such a paragon as Daisy is in question, to reward her with one of a more generally acceptable description. The clerical lover is a trifle repugnant to the lay fancy, which finds the purposes of the ideal better served by the celibate orders. Christian Thorold is a West Point cadet who, after such an effusive love scene as one always gets from this writer, goes off to Washington at the first call for troops without any title to his first name beyond the fact of having received it from his sponsors in baptism. To be sure he promises to "earn his name," but Daisy's narrative stops there, and the reader is quite certain that when the war is over he will be as ardent as ever and need conversion enough to give an excuse for another novel.

Considered as a literary work simply, there would be no excuse for devoting so much space to this book. It does not, however, pretend to be a novel merely—it is a religious novel, it aspires to be a teacher. We have no especial fault to find with Miss Warner as a writer. One can get through her books without being seriously displeased by anything but their bad morality. It is bad morality, we take it, to set up a material standard of excellence and reward it by a material success, to substitute a process of accretion for a process of growth, to preach the duty of giving up "hops" and outward adornments and ignore the absence of modesty and honesty and self-knowledge. Miss Warner does all these things, and that she does them not wilfully but through ignorant misapprehension of the nature of virtue, and does them under the assumed sanction of a sacred name, only makes the duty of calling her attention to the fact more imperative.

* "Daisy. Continued from Melbourne House. By the author of 'Wide, Wide World,' 'Queechy,' etc." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

The Poetical Works of Sir Walter Scott, Bart., containing "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," "Marmion," "The Lady of the Lake," "Don Roderick," "Rokeby," Ballads, Lyrics, and Songs. With a Life of the Author. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—The volume that contains all this is a book of more than six hundred clear-faced, handsome pages, in larger print than one would have supposed possible, on good stout paper, and with a neat paper cover. We are very glad that Messrs. Appleton are able to sell such a book at the low price they have set upon it. In the whole range of English literature it would be very hard, if it would not be impossible, to find an author who so completely as Scott unites in himself all the qualities that go to the making of a thoroughly healthy writer for the average reader. To love him (peream qui ante nos, etc.), is a manly education. What with this volume of the poems, which is sold for half-a-dollar, and the tartan-covered edition of the novels, which is sold at twenty-five cents a volume, the complete works of this delightful author may very well be in the hands of every boy and girl in the country.

Pictorial History of the Civil War in the United States of America.—By Benson J. Lossing. Illustrated. (New York: T. Belknap & Co. 1868.)—Mr. Lossing's second volume extends from the battle of Bull's Run to the capture of Vicksburg and Port Hudson. To the labor of compilation necessary in the preparation of this as of the first volume the author has added that of visiting in person the battle-fields of the South, and the result is a record—for more than this his history does not pretend to be—that will take a very high, if not the first, rank among similar chronicles of the rebellion. All things considered, we incline to give the preference to "Harper's Pictorial History," although in point of fulness, so far as we have compared the two, Lossing's seems to be superior. But this is often because the latter preserves details, such as the names of ships and the commanders of petty forces, which obscure the general effect of the narrative; or, as foot-notes, fill a certain amount of otherwise valuable space. Not seldom, however, as in his account of the capture of Port Royal, he thus saves incidents which are petty only in comparison with great events, and which are both enlivening to the story and an aid to the just comprehension of it. The quarto Harper's—a form determined by the size of Harper's Weekly, from which the plates are borrowed—is afflicted with more and huger useless illustrations than is Mr. Lossing's octavo volume, of which the engravings are often of trivial enough subjects, but never disfigure half or the whole of a page, and consist largely of portraits. In this last respect, however—contrary to what is the case with landscape views, which are nearly as effective on a small as on a large scale—Harper's has an easy supremacy, Mr. Lossing's miniatures suffering by their reduction, and too frequently, besides, doing little but suggest to one who knows the person sought to be represented. The author promises his third volume after a much shorter delay than that which preceded the appearance of the present, owing to the Southern journey already alluded to.

---

Harper's Phrase-Book; or Hand-Book of Travel-Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian on a new and improved method. By W. Pembroke Fetridge. (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1868.)—This is a very neatly executed little work of three hundred pages, which American travellers on the European continent will find very convenient to have in their bag or pocket. The type is so distinct and clear that even he who travels running can read it. The conversations, which consist chiefly of questions "put in such a form that they can be answered by Yes and No," without the addition of the customary answers in detail, embrace a large number of phrases for use in every-day intercourse in and out of the hotel, while a hundred and twenty pages are filled with an ample vocabulary arranged according to matter. Phrases and words are the same in all the four languages. A few conjugations are added, as well as rules for pronunciation of the French, German, and Italian. These rules are, of course, concise, and not much burdened with exceptions. They form, perhaps, that portion of the book which most entitles the author to speak of improvement on similar productions. The omission of detailed answers we believe to be a feature of more questionable utility, especially for schools. The accuracy of some of the "rules," too, may be disputed. Thus, we should not explain the French sound, u, by stating that the nearest to it in English "is oo in moon." Nor should we state that the German g, excepting the final syllable ig, "ought always to have the hard sound like the English g in garden," which it hardly has in genug, and certainly not in weg, etc. In general, however, we must speak with high praise of the correctness of this hand-book; misprints or inaccuracies—like "Das Kamin" for "Der Kamin" (p. 187), or "*a*lbergo" and "*A*rbergo" for "*Al*bergo" (p. 183), in a phrase differently rendered in the different languages)—being exceedingly rare.

---

Russian and English Phrase-Book, specially adapted for the Use of Traders, Travellers, and Teachers. By Agapius Honcharenko. (San Francisco: A. Roman & Co. 1868.)—"Our relations with the coasts of Asiatic Russia," says our author in his brief prefatory remarks, "are but just commenced, and must grow to be more and more important with every year; and for every purpose of amity and commerce a knowledge of the Russian language must be of the greatest advantage to the Americans of the Pacific coast. . . . . To assist in spreading the knowledge of this tongue we have established the first Russian press ever put up in America." A good and useful enterprise, indeed, which we wish may turn out to the advantage of all concerned—Americans and Russians, authors and publishers. The first product of this our "first Russian press"—a little book of 100 pages—has a decidedly good look. The Russian part of the "Phrase Book" is clear, fine, and very correct. The English part, however, ought to have been made considerably more correct. But this is a defect which but little interests the American student of the language, and can very easily be avoided in future productions. What we find necessary to point out here is, that the English equivalents for Russian letters are in many cases faulty. The equivalent for Zhivyete is not the English but the French j, that is, the zh of many of our pronouncing dictionaries; for Khyer, not the English but the German ch, that is, kh; for Tzi, not the English but the Polish c, that is, tz or ts; for Shtcha, not sch, but shtch or shch. The addition of Latin bonus, bona, bonum, declined in both numbers, to the Russian declension table might have considerably aided the author in convincing some, at least, of his contemplated scholars that a language which has dobriy, dobraya, dobroye, dobrave, dobromu, dobrim, dobrom, dobriye, dobrikh, etc., etc., for good, is not necessarily a barbarous one, though it may not be, as Mr. Honcharenko states it, "quite easy."

---

Aldeane. By Laura Preston, author of "In Bonds," etc. (New York.)—Aldeane is a young woman whose history is full of romantic possibilities. She is not beautiful—which is a point Miss Preston should have made more of. She has that wide mouth which has made the fortune of many a heroine, and she is a governess who marries into her employer's family. Moreover, a great mystery surrounds her. Supposed to be the daughter of her mother and the sister of her brother, she turns out to be the niece of the one and the cousin of the other, and sustains to a morose and malignant step-father only that slight degree of kinship which would naturally flow from her being the child of one whom he had vainly loved in his youth. Under these circumstances she goes South to teach, and not being tainted with any pestilent Northern heresies, finds there the warmest and most chivalrous friends. Her employer proves to be not only her father's brother, but another of the unfortunate victims to her mother's charms—which facts, when discovered, strengthen greatly his attachment to Aldeane herself. Also, she is sought in marriage by a discharged and disreputable overseer of venerable years, who is implicated in some deeply mysterious manner in the family secrets. Not only this, but she finds another relative in a magnificently handsome man, called George Raymond, supposed to be a wealthy Northerner, but really a runaway slave, the son of Aldeane's father and a negress, who appears in the story as a somewhat demoralized old cook, but whose youthful beauty is said to have been great. Raymond is employed in making love to one of Aldeane's pupils, in order, by marrying her, to revenge himself for the ill-usage he received when a boy from her mother. He is drowned on the eve of marriage, but as his betrothed dies broken-hearted for his loss, his labors seem to have been not quite in vain. At last Aldeane's father, who has been missing, and supposed to be dead for years, turns up all right, recognizes his daughter, and makes her one of the wealthiest of Southern heiresses, which, as she is a young person capable of reflecting that "though she is poor she is human," and of asking her lover once on a time if he takes her to be "a block of sculptured marble," is a reward not disproportional to her merits.

Miss Preston is a Californian novelist, whose previous writings we have not read.

---

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. | |
|---|---|---|
| Brockett (Dr. L. P.), Men of Our Day | (Zeigler, McCurdy & Co.) | |
| Challen (J.), Island of the Giant Fairies, a Poem, swd | (Howard Challen) | $0 30 |
| Du Huys (C.), The Percheron Horse | (Orange Judd & Co.) | 1 00 |
| Good Stories, Part IV., swd | (Ticknor & Fields) | 0 50 |
| Holmes (Rev. P.), Tertullian against Marcion, trans | (Chas. Scribner & Co.) | |
| Leland (C. G.), Hans Breitmann's Party, swd | (T. B. Peterson & Bros.) | 0 50 |
| Lives of General U. S. Grant and Schuyler Colfax | (T. B. Peterson & Bros.) | 1 00 |
| Moore (Rev. A. Y.), Life of Schuyler Colfax | (T. B. Peterson & Bros.) | 1 50 |
| Scott (Sir W.), Complete Works, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 50 |
| Spen (K.), True of Heart, a Tale | (Virtue & Yorston) | |
| Ruskin (J.), Modern Painters, 5 vols | (John Wiley & Son) | 18 00 |
| Wallis (Rev. R. E.), Writings of Cyprian, Vol. I., trans | (Chas. Scribner & Co.) | |

---

Fine Arts.

THE FINE ARTS OF JAPAN.

II.

THE large prints in color, described in our last, are very popular art indeed; they are low priced, costing only a few cents in Nagasaki, and are produced by thousands for the most every-day decorative uses. Still lower priced are the round fans, now so common in all our cities, made of paper printed with bright-colored pictures, and stretched upon the spread splinters of split bamboo. As cheap and common as anything can be are some of the small books in which the letterpress and the pictures are mingled together on the same page, and printed apparently, like a page of Harper's Magazine, at one impression. There are many differences between the different kinds of this popular art, many peculiarities of the different artists who have produced it, and many points in which it is manifestly inferior to the more carefully executed work of a higher class, especially to the remarkable works which we are taught to ascribe to Oksai, of which more hereafter. But the remarkable thing about all the Japanese pictures is their similarity of style, as if all should be the work of a guild of designers within whose body the traditions of this strange art are preserved. It cannot be said that its methods of representing objects are uniform. On the contrary, those things which the Japanese artists best understand, as flowers and leaves, birds, insects, and reptiles, are drawn without formality, with absolute freedom, and with almost absolute truth. But the fact itself that a flower or a flying bird is given as firmly, with as few lines and with the same general touch in the cut on a cheap fan as in the most elaborate printed picture, is, to artists of European training, proof sufficient of the existence of some permanent and authoritative system of teaching, of a school, in the true sense of the word, in which all the draughtsmen of Japan have learned to draw, and in which all the decorative designers have gained their knowledge of a general system of decoration. To compare this for a moment with our own popular art: the recently published cuts after drawings by Mr. Homer are remarkable for the freedom of drawing they display, for the vigor of gesture and general truth of action of the various figures. If one can imagine a whole race of artists taking after Mr. Homer in these good qualities of his work—for instance, the designers of the illustrations in the Ledger on the one hand, and those of the title-pages of popular music on the other—he can also understand that it would seem evident that some common influence would be discoverable which would sufficiently account for the strong resemblance. And that is precisely the case in Japanese picture-making, in which manifestation of human intelligence there is to be seen a most extraordinarily diffused power over subjects of art generally considered difficult.

If, however, we assume that this general and similar power is the result of a general and similar training, the strange part of it will be not the similarity and wide diffusion of the power, but its character and degree. All oriental fine and decorative art is traditional, proceeding by fixed principles and allowing of invention only within precise limits. Japanese art is confined within very positive limits; thus, we have seen already that it is without shadow and almost without shade, and we shall see hereafter that its limitations in the matter of sentiment are even more marked; but within its pale it can do so much, it is so mobile and active, it contains so much clear expression of a kind of thought which we generally suppose modern and occidental, that it has been a wonder to all European artists and critics. We are generally content to suppose, in a vague sort of way, that to a Chinese artist a bird is a bright colored thing of pretty shape, useful for decorative painting on porcelain, and although this is inaccurate enough, it is not so obviously false as to correct itself. But this could never be supposed of the Japanese work. A large print, representing a branch of Camelia Japonica with flowers and leaves, and a bird perched upon it striking at a moth, will be so free and truthful in drawing and contain so much knowledge and so much vivacity of expression as to be a noticeable work of art among any collection whatsoever of drawings of natural detail. Especially wonderful is their way of representing flying birds; that subject rather repels Western artists, who mainly avoid it and generally fail when they try it; but the Japanese would seem to have, as a people, better eyes than we, for flying birds are as accurately rendered in their pictures as the same birds seated on a branch, and the freedom and rapidity of motion expressed is nearly always most striking and inimitable.

Another premise must be mentioned before we reach the conclusion which seems inevitable: this peculiar art—wholly distinct from the art of China, and, independent of what we consider the commonly accepted laws, beyond all experience—this strange development in the farthest East of a school of drawing founded firmly upon observation of nature—is new; a century and a half will certainly include its whole duration to the present time. It seems that Japan, as it was known to Europeans in the seventeenth century, had not this remarkable art, but a decorative and representative art more nearly resembling that of the Chinese, more mannered, stiffer, more exclusively decorative and symbolical. The few pieces of unquestionably ancient Japanese art that have come under our notice have borne out this statement. The old work was not like the Chinese so as to be mistaken for it, but was akin to it; whereas the modern work is of the peculiarly original and bold character we have tried to describe.

Now, there exists a series of works of the most extraordinary merit, in their way, which are ascribed to an artist of the eighteenth century, a man who died in 1780 or thereabouts, and whose name the French writers give as Oksai, the English as Hoxai. We have no knowledge of him beyond the floating traditions of his name and date, and the ascription to him of the works of art in question. We hear of original paintings by him, of great merit and highly prized in Japan; but the only works which have reached the West are the books of prints after his designs.

These books of prints are not very large or strong; they have an uniform size of six by nine inches, and contain from forty-two to fifty-four pages. The set appears to comprise either twenty-four or twenty-seven volumes, although Mr. W. M. Rossetti has stated, in the Chronicle, that there are thirty-five separate parts. Mr. Rossetti describes in full one book of the series that we have never met with, and we have seen nineteen of them. They seem to be a sort of encyclopædia of illustrations. Whether the idea of making the series was historical, to record the world as the artist saw it, or decorative—to supply subjects and motives to the designers who should come after him—whatever the original intention the result is a perfect microcosm of pictures. We shall select one book for brief description, taking it because the impressions of the cuts are the clearest within reach: for these books are evidently very popular and the blocks hard-used and much worn. Opening at the right hand, or the end of an European book, we find, first, three pages of letterpress and, what is not usual, an ornamented title. Some of the Oksai series have very elaborate and tasteful title-pages. The first picture is on a left hand page, and represents a man clothed in a rich robe walking along a raised terrace or roof, and carrying, raised high in both hands, a black box about sixteen inches long and a little less in height and depth. This may be the author carrying his casket of treasures. The next subject fills the two pages which face one another; a maiden kneels before a superb and stately warrior, and offers him a square tray, upon which a paper lies open, and upon this a branch covered with blossoms. The chieftain, perhaps a daimio, perhaps only a yakonin of power and influence, is armed with two swords, bow and quiver; he has thrown upon the ground his huge umbrella-like hat, and extends his right hand for the offering. In another double picture three women are spinning with a curious upright machine with a windlass, and folding cloth around a revolving drum. In another a field of grain or grass is seen, and a path winding through it; a man sits under a tree upon which his sword and a great wooden hoe are hung, and seems to have bought a book of a young woman who stands before him with three packages, apparently containing books; she is about to go, while the man has laid his book open before him. In all these the erect figures are about six inches high. The pictures are printed in black and two shades of blue, except the first one, which has red in it as well, and a brown and a purple, which may have been produced by printing one color over another.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT
451 Broome Street, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:
A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.
By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY. Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.
Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.
A new Collection of College Songs and Music. Cloth, price $1 50.

CATSKILL MOUNTAINS,
And the Region around; their Scenery, Legends, and History. By Rev. CHARLES ROCKWELL. Cloth, price $2.
The above books mailed free on receipt of price.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, New York.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.—NEW EDITION.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON,

WILL PUBLISH SATURDAY, JULY 18:

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in common use. By JOHN BARTLETT. FIFTH EDITION, revised and greatly enlarged. 16mo, cloth, pp. 790, $3.

"The fourth edition of "Familiar Quotations" was published in 1863. The present edition embodies the results of the later researches of its editors, besides the contributions of various friends, and includes many quotations which have long been waiting a favorable verdict on the all-important question of familiarity. A few changes have been made in the arrangement, and the citations from Shakespeare have been adapted to the principal modern editions. The former edition has been freshly compared with the originals, and such errors removed as the revision has disclosed."—From the author's preface.

"The volume, as now improved, is the best and most complete of its kind ever published. As to its use, we should say it was a necessity to everybody. The questions which it answers are put every day in all companies, and most of them puzzle even those best acquainted with English literature to answer unhesitatingly."—Boston Transcript.

"The work before us is the most perfect book of the kind that has ever been produced, and has reached the position of a standard authority in this field."—Chicago Journal.

"The book is chiefly valuable for reference, but as a mental stimulant it is well worth its cost. It is a collection of striking thoughts and marked expressions, and meets a wide want in a convenient and elegant form."—Springfield Republican.

"A more amusing volume for desultory reading, more interesting for study, or more useful for reference, has rarely been issued."—Cleveland Herald.

"The work is well known to students and authors, and is almost as indispensable as a dictionary or encyclopædia."—Boston Journal.

"A LIBRARY IN ITSELF."

COMPLETION OF CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

NOW READY,

The Tenth and Concluding Volume

OF

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA,

A DICTIONARY OF

UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE.

ILLUSTRATED WITH

MAPS AND NUMEROUS WOOD ENGRAVINGS.

IN TEN VOLUMES ROYAL OCTAVO.

Price per vol., cloth, $4 50; sheep, $5; half turkey, $5 50.

The Publishers have the pleasure of announcing that they have just issued the concluding Part of CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA, and that the work is now complete in TEN ROYAL OCTAVO VOLUMES, of over 800 pages each, illustrated with about 4,000 engravings, and accompanied by

AN ATLAS OF NEARLY FORTY MAPS; the whole, it is believed, forming the most complete work of reference extant.

The design of this work, as explained in the Notice prefixed to the first volume, is that of a DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE FOR THE PEOPLE—not a mere collection of elaborate treatises in alphabetical order, but a work to be readily consulted as a DICTIONARY on every subject on which people generally require some distinct information. Commenced in 1859, the work is now brought to a close in 1868, and the Editors confidently point to the Te Volumes of which it is composed as forming the most COMPREHENSIVE—as it certainly is the CHEAPEST—ENCYCLOPÆDIA ever issued in the English language.

 Copies of the work will be sent to any address in the United States, free of charge, on receipt of the price by the Publishers.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

THE GREAT POEM OF THE DAY.

THE EARTHLY PARADISE.

BY WILLIAM MORRIS.

Received Everywhere with the Greatest Enthusiasm.

A few copies of the First Edition only remain on hand. The Second Edition is nearly ready. Our editions of Mr. Morris's books are published by arrangement with the author.

In one volume, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price $3.

JUST READY.

THE PRODICAL SON.

FOUR DISCOURSES. BY REV. W. MORLEY PUNSHON.

With a Preface by REV. GILBERT HAVEN, Editor of Zion's Herald.

16mo, paper covers, price 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Table-Talk and Opinions of Napoleon the Great.

Being a New Volume of the "Bayard Series."

One volume, 18mo, bound in cloth, price $1 25.

Sold by all Booksellers. Mailed post-paid by the Publishers.

ROBERTS BROS., Boston.

MOORE'S

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF MUSIC,

Elementary, Technical, Historical, Biographical, Vocal, and Instrumental.

In one large octavo volume of more than One Thousand Pages. Bound in cloth. Price, SIX DOLLARS. Sent post-paid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, 277 Washington Street, Boston. CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 711 Broadway, New York.

NEW BOOKS.

I.

THE WEEK OF PRAYER. By HENRY ALFORD, D.D., Dean of Canterbury. Being an Abridgment of "The Year of Prayer," by the same author. 32mo, cloth, neat, price 50 cents.

II.

WIND-WAFTED SEED. Edited by NORMAN MACLEOD, D.D., and THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

III.

THE CHRIST OF HISTORY. An Argument grounded in the Facts of His Life on Earth. By JOHN YOUNG, LL.D. Fifth edition, revised, with an Appendix, containing a brief criticism of M. Renan's "Vie de Jésus." Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

IV.

STUDIES OF CHARACTER FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT. By THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D., Editor of "The Sunday Magazine." Crown 8vo, cloth, $1 75.

 Any of the above works will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price by the publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome St., New York.

REMOVAL.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1868.

ALLEN EBBS,

IMPORTER OF

FINE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Has removed from 183 Broadway to

75 CHAMBERS STREET,

One door west of Broadway.

A. E. has lately received from London a most elegant collection of fine Books.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order,

"The Metropolitan and National Magazine."

A NOTABLE NUMBER!

THE AUGUST NUMBER

OF

PUTNAM'S MAGAZINE,

NOW READY,

Contains several Articles of special and peculiar interest and value, including

THE ROMANCE OF THE GREAT GAINES CASE, showing vividly that Truth is stranger than Fiction.

An able and pungent article on OUR CIVIL SERVICE, showing how the People of the United States are swindled by incompetent and dishonest office-holders.

Sketches and Anecdotes in the noted HOMBURG GAMBLING HOUSE.

A SKETCH IN OILS—not by Rembrandt; but showing some of the lights and shades of Bubble Companies, Advertising Fictions, and other notabilities of New York business-life.

A NIGHT-HUNT IN THE ADIRONDACKS. By JOHN BURROUGHS.

PEKING AND THE CHINESE. Full of novel information of special interest in connection with the Burlingame Embassy.

THE WEDDING AT THE PARKER HOUSE.

PRIVATE BOHEMIAS. By the author of "Emily Chester."

A Chapter of notable AUTOGRAPHS.

BITS. By Miss COOPER.

Etc., etc., etc.

The "NORTHERN MONTHLY" is incorporated in this Magazine.

Price 35 cents; $4 per annum. Liberal terms for Clubs.

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,

661 BROADWAY.

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

ÆTNA

INSURANCE COMPANY

OF HARTFORD.

Incorporated 1819.

Cash Capital, . . . . . $3,000,000

L. J. HENDEE, President.

J. GOODNOW, Secretary.

WM. B. CLARK, Assistant Secretary.

Assets July 1, 1868, . . . . . $5,052,880 19

Liabilities, . . . . . 499,803 55

New York Agency, 62 Wall Street.

JAMES A. ALEXANDER, Agent.

CULBERT & CO.,

24 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

POCKET BOOKS,
TRAVELLING BAGS,
DRESSING CASES,
CARD CASES
RUSSIA LEATHER GOODS.
Writing Desks a Specialty.

THE EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE

Surpasses all others in simplicity, durability beautiful stitch, and easy working. It creates no noise when in operation, and all persons fond of an excellent Sewing Machine should call and examine it. A liberal discount offered to the trade. Salesrooms, 616 BROADWAY, N. Y.; 103 Avenue A, corner of Seventh Street; 685 Sixth Avenue; 233 Grand Street, Williamsburgh.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 160. THURSDAY, JULY 23, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 61
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Political Situation ..... 64
Conversion ..... 65
The Church and the World ..... 66
"Little Digs" ..... 67
England ..... 69
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Bonds Again ..... 70
NOTES:
Literary ..... 70
Aboriginal American Mythology ..... 72
De Trobriand's "Army of the Potomac" ..... 73
The North American Review for July ... 75
Books of the Week ..... 76
FINE ARTS:
The Fine Arts of Japan ..... 76

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

THE close of the session is now very near at hand, and both Houses, with numbers that would be somewhat diminished but for the admission of some of the Southern States, are working hard. No Funding Bill has yet been passed, and, as we write, there is no certainty that any will be passed this summer. The Tax Bill has been signed by the President, but recalled, apparently under the pressure of a powerful lobby, which sees the destruction of the whiskey-ring in the reduction of the tax. On Monday last the veto of the Electoral College Bill was received. There was nothing new in the general position taken, which was that Mr. Johnson has been all right since the summer of 1865 and Congress all wrong. This we do not call especially absurd argumentation; it is merely presenting the practically impossible view of the question as the only view; but in the details there was a good deal of merely childish argument. The bill was passed over Mr. Johnson's objections by the heaviest majority yet given on such an occasion—namely, 45 to 8—the admission of new Senators making the difference, but the passage being certain, of course, in any event. The House, also, on the same day, passed the bill—yeas, 134; nays, 36. Miss Vinnie Ream was let back into the Capitol at the instance of Mr. Stevens. On Thursday last, the Senate passed a joint resolution extending the time for the payment of taxes in the Southern States till January 1, 1869. On the same day, Mr. Conness insisted that the regular business of the day should be laid aside, and the bill Protecting the Rights of American Citizens Abroad should be taken up forthwith. He was in a hurry, apparently, lest the hoary monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland should grant everything that the United States ask or want, before he could mail certain Globes to his constituents. His motion was rejected, and the bill did not come up till a day or two afterward, in due course, when no final action was taken upon it. Probably final action has already been taken on it, for, no doubt, it will never pass the Senate. On Friday, the Senate passed the Alaska Appropriation Bill, first striking out, at the instance of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the House's preamble ordaining that itself should have joint power with the President and the Senate in making treaties which involve appropriations. Mr. Stevens, in the House, avowed himself a repudiator at all costs, at the expense even of supporting Seymour and Blair. On Saturday, the President sent in his proposed Amendments to the Constitution. They were sent to the Judiciary Committee, which seems a superfluous bit of respect.

---

The Fourteenth Constitutional Amendment has been so long before the people that the average reader has very likely forgotten just what it is. It provides: 1. That all persons born or naturalized in the United States are, in virtue of their national citizenship, citizens of the State in which they reside. 2. It forbids the enforcement of any State law that abridges the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States and ordains absolute equality of all citizens before the law. 3. It apportions representation according to population, and when political rights are denied any class in any State it diminishes the number of representatives in accordance with the diminution in the number of electors. (This embodies the conditions of restoration offered the South three years ago, and obstinately rejected.) 4. It provides that the man who, having taken an oath as Senator, Representive, member of any State Legislature, or judicial or executive officer of any State to support the Constitution, afterwards engaged in rebellion, shall not be eligible to any office, State or Federal, unless Congress, by a two-thirds vote, relieves him of his disabilities. To ratify the amendment twenty-three States were requisite. Mr. Seward's proclamation, just issued, provisionally declares it ratified. Arkansas, the two Carolinas, Louisiana, Florida, and Alabama may be States, and may not; he does not know, he says. If they are not, six States are wanting. Further, it is not certain whether or not Ohio and New Jersey legally have the power to withdraw the assent which they once gave. This question is now under advisement by the Judiciary Committee, who seem to be in no haste to report upon it. The Supreme Court will, we suppose, have to settle it finally; for probably there is no hope that New Jersey will, after the fall election, reverse her latest decision, though that Ohio will save the court the trouble of considering the matter is, we imagine, as sure as that her Legislature is to meet. On Tuesday, Congress passed a concurrent resolution declaring the amendment part of the Constitution.

---

We have always felt satisfied that Mr. Johnson's long silence was due to intense absorption in some scheme for the promotion of the national welfare. Such men as he rarely ruminate in vain. Accordingly, he has sent a message to Congress recommending four amendments to the Constitution, for one of which something may be said—the abolition of the election of the President by the Electoral College and the substitution of a direct election by the popular vote. The second provides for the succession of the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy and of the Interior, of the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General, in the order in which they are here named, to the Presidency in case of the death or disability of both the President and Vice-President. He thinks it improper that any member of the legislature or of the judiciary should have, as now, any interest in creating a vacancy in the executive chair. Thirdly, he is not satisfied with the present mode of electing senators. He says "experience" (whose he does not mention) has established the necessity of a change, and he wants to have the senators, too, chosen by the people. We suppose he has reached this conclusion by a comparison of the Senate with the House, and has been struck by the greater wisdom, knowledge, self-restraint, and decorum of the products of the popular choice. Finally, he is not satisfied with the judicial tenure of office for life or during good behavior, so he proposes that the Federal judges be appointed for twelve years only. This sage suggestion, we presume, is the result of the calm contemplation, by a powerful and penetrating mind, of the blessings of an elective judiciary for short terms in those States in which this beneficent institution already flourishes. We do not, of course, know what action Congress will take on these proposals; but we do know that the author of them ought not to be allowed quietly to retire into Tennessee next March if the nation can find means of retaining him in the capital to watch the working of the machinery of government. There is one other amendment which he has not proposed, but which we feel satisfied must have occurred to him, and of which he would heartily approve, and that is an amendment extending the privileges of foreign ambassadors to counterfeiters and "whiskey thieves." He pardons these people so generally when they are convicted by the courts that he must entertain doubts either on high moral grounds, or on grounds of expediency, as to the propriety of trying them at all.

---

We hear several new and imaginative tales of and concerning the various candidates in the political field. To begin with the apparently most abandoned one: Last fall it appears that a certain gentleman, formerly a major-general in the Union army, passed down the Mississippi River on a steamboat which lay for some time at the levee of St. Joseph, and, in reply to one citizen of St. Joseph who avowed his belief that Sherman was much an abler man than Grant, the general above-mentioned said, with a burst of profanity, that "Grant knew more than Sherman and all the balance of them banged into one." That general was F. P. Blair. "Where is he now?" is the question that at once suggests itself, and which he would no doubt find what Mr. Swiveller calls a "staggerer." We learn that Blair went through college at a rate that proved him one of the ablest members of the Blair family—he stayed at Yale rather less than a year. We suggest to some "ready paragraphist" that, by consulting the elderly inhabitants and reliable gentlemen and other citizens of New Haven of a known turn for history, he might unearth a great many acts of turbulence and crime committed by "this man for whom law-abiding patriots are asked to vote." New Haven would be a fertile field. He seems to have felt the inspiration of his old stamping-ground when he was in Connecticut campaigning a while ago. They publish "his bill at the Allyn House in this city"—namely, Hartford: "Two days' board, $10; lemons and whiskey, $65; total, $75." Seymour is, if anything, worse than Blair in the weekly account. When General Wadsworth was nominated for governor in 1864, they informed Seymour of it, we are told. Seymour said: "He will be a strong candidate. Our soldiers run well this year." This offsets the "boy in blue" and silver-waiter story against Colfax, and it is to be feared that Democrats will go on telling that "branded lie" with more industry and ardor than ever.

---

Perhaps, though, one of the neatest things of this general character that has been got up during the week is to be found in Mr. Johnson's veto of the Electoral College Bill. We do not know if it was intended to pay off Seymour for walking off with a certain nomination, but it throws an efficient "half-brick" at him and hits him hard—a wound from a supposed friend, too. The veto argues on the question, What States are to be considered as having been in rebellion within the meaning of the act?—not the Southern States, it says, if to make a State rebellious the treason of all its inhabitants is necessary; but if it be said that the treason of a part only of the inhabitants is enough, why, then, it must be remembered that there was rebellion in the State of New York—which directly suggests a well-known speech made to his friends by a distinguished statesman of Syracuse. Mr. Seymour will be curious to know who composed the message—whether it was the new Attorney-General or the President.

---

Mr. Conness has a bill before the Senate for the protection of the rights of American citizens abroad, which, amongst other things, gives the President the power to arrest and detain any subject of a foreign power found within the jurisdiction of the United States, if he should see reason to be dissatisfied with the treatment experienced by any American citizen at the hands of the foreign power in question. Mr. Sumner made an able and energetic appeal to the Senate against the measure, and especially against this provision of it, showing by various citations the barbarous character of such a remedy, and its hostility to the usages and principles of intercourse between civilized nations. On Mr. Conness, we need hardly say, he produced not a particle of effect, as that gentleman immediately afterwards took the floor on his hind legs, and snorted and whisked his tail in a manner fearful to behold. We ought not, perhaps, to offer Mr. Sumner advice on a matter of parliamentary tactics; but having studied the war-horse nature carefully, we trust he will pardon us if we say that we think he took the wrong method with Mr. Conness. When you tell a war-horse that what he proposes is unprecedented, or is condemned by the publicists or statesmen of civilized nations of the present or bygone ages, you simply attach him to it more firmly than ever. Nothing delights him more than to learn that he has produced something absolutely novel or likely to shock the prejudices of calm, thinking, conservative men. On hearing this, and especially if he hears it from an authority of Mr. Sumner's weight, his tail goes higher than ever, and smoke pours from his nostrils. The way to take him, if you want to dissuade him from the support of any cherished scheme, is to assure him that it is an old and well-known one, and has the sanction of the principal foreign jurists and text-writers. Information of this sort seldom fails to disgust him with any measure, however dear.

---

Thaddeus Stevens said in Congress, when the Government bonds were being first offered to the public:

> "A dollar in a miser's safe, unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could they invest it? In United States loans at six per cent.—redeemable in gold in 20 years—the best and most valuable permanent investment that could be desired."

Thaddeus Stevens said last week, however, the money being all paid in, that sooner than assent to the monstrous doctrine that the bonds were payable in gold, "he would vote for the other side, Frank Blair and all." It thus appears that to him all the great issues arising out of the war, and which now divide the two parties, count for little or nothing compared with the success of a scheme for cheating the national creditors of what is really to the nation a small sum. We called attention months ago to Mr. Stevens's share in getting people to pay over their money on what he now proclaims to have been false pretences, and it is nearly two years since we began to point out, at the cost of much obloquy, the fact that the Stevenses and Butlers, Wades and the like, having openly abandoned all pretence of being guided by sound political principles or by the lessons of human experience, and having taken for their standard of right and wrong, expedient and inexpedient, some kind of slip-slop theory which made universal suffrage a perfect political panacea, had ceased to be fit guides for the Republican party, and would eventually lead it into the ditch. The bulk of the press, however, kept praising them to the skies, as the very embodiments of virtue and knowledge, and, finally, the party came very near ranging itself under their crazy lead in a determined attack on the reputation of some of the most valuable, clear-headed, and deserving members of the Senate; and ridicule of their "brains," their "learning," their "judicial-mindedness," which have, in reality, furnished the party with nearly all its legislative claims to the gratitude and remembrance of posterity, became for some weeks the main occupation of the lower order of party hacks.

---

The want on the part of these leaders of any sound and carefully considered rule of conduct, their apparent readiness to fall in with any cry, however disgraceful or immoral, provided it seems likely to swell the party vote, is now generally acknowledged. They have themselves fully justified all we have ever ventured to say about them. Even the New York Tribune, which supported them in their indecent and absurd assaults on better men, is forced to inform the venerable Thaddeus Stevens that his last great "moral idea" is neither more nor less than "a gigantic crime," and that if he wants to be an accomplice in it he had better walk over at once, as he threatens to do, to the Democrats. Much should be forgiven to the Tribune for its course on this question. In spite of its absorption in the bewildering business of exposing "lies," "falsehoods," "slanders," and "calumnies," and its somewhat clouded notions of jurisprudence, it has seen into the greenback swindle from the beginning with truly admirable perspicacity, and has certainly not left the authors of that scheme in any doubt about its opinion of them. Its comments on Thaddeus Stevens, last Tuesday, were a model of "plain dealing."

The course run by the Funding Bill is curious. The House has left in it nothing of Mr. Sherman's, except what might be called "the seminal funding idea." It still funds, but does nothing else that Mr. Sherman intended it to do. The rate of interest offered, too, is so low—3.65 per cent.—that it is difficult to see what the motive for conversion will be. The least taste in the world of a swindle—it had to have this—has been given to it by a provision taxing coupons in gold where all other property is taxed in currency. Mr. Boutwell proposed in vain a sensible substitute, providing two classes of bonds—one for foreign holders at four per cent., and one for native holders at five. His idea was, of course, to sell one species abroad and one at home; but how is the wily foreigner to be kept from taking the five per cent. bond if he wants it, and what difference does it make who takes either? A four per cent. bond will bring one price in the market, a five per cent. bond another, and natives and foreigners will have their choice. Payments of interest in London or Amsterdam, doubtless, would make a difference to foreign investors, but scarcely one per cent. difference. The bill now goes to a Conference Committee, which can hardly reconcile the two Houses.

---

The most remarkable feature in the campaign, thus far, is the increasing boldness and prominence of the Southern Democratic politicians. They are exhibiting all the indiscretion which spoiled their game in 1865, and have thrown off the reserve which they seem to have imposed on themselves after Mr. Johnson's defeat in his conflict with Congress, and which they managed to keep up during the earlier part of the proceedings of the Convention here. We hear now a good deal of the old talk—of resistance, of "the bayonet," and so forth—and it comes from men, too, such as Wise, and Wade Hampton, and Forrest, whose political career, most of us supposed, was closed when they surrendered. The chances are, however, that they will do enough of this kind of thing to make it not only harmless, but highly useful to the Republican party. The Southern politicians seem to possess the art, in the highest perfection, of ruining their own cause.

---

The President has just nominated a batch of ministers—Mr. John L. Dawson to Russia, Mr. Henry Wm. Watts to Austria, and General Rosecrans to Spain. Of these, the first and last have been laid on the table, but there is thought to be some chance of Mr. Watts's confirmation. There seems to have been some expectation that General Banks would get the Austrian mission, and the Springfield Republican spoke of it recently as likely to prevent a renewal of the controversy of two years ago about his re-election. There is, it seems, trouble about him in his district. The hostility to him increases, and his renomination becomes more and more doubtful. We feel sure the dauntless Mr. Copeland is ready for him, and will give a good account of him when he comes home. We have ourselves only one objection to his going to Austria, and that is, that the House would be left without anybody to guide it on foreign affairs and international law. To the Austrians he could do nothing but good. Baron von Beust is slow and methodical, and needs a little excitement, and the whole empire is behind the age. A boxful of speeches and documents, judiciously distributed by Mr. Banks in court circles, would wake the aristocracy up, and reduce the Archduchess Sophia, who is said to be the evil genius of the dynasty, to confusion and insignificance.

---

The theory that the presumption of international law that nations are equal in the forum of morals should no longer be confined, as heretofore, to the nations of Christendom, but should be extended to all civilized governments, is every day gaining ground amongst publicists and statesmen. A formal acknowledgment of it—if we are not mistaken, the first—has just been made in the treaty concluded between the United States and China; and there is no question of its beneficial influence on Western—or, should we say, Christian?—practice in dealing with communities in an inferior stage of civilization and physically weaker. But the application of the theory will probably be found surrounded at the outset with serious difficulties. One of the first and most obvious consequences of the admission of a state into the family of civilized nations is, of course, the subjection of foreigners residing within its limits to the jurisdiction of its courts. Hitherto the citizens of all Christian states residing in Pagan or Mohammedan ones have been specially exempted from the jurisdiction of the courts of the country, from the belief that owing to its inferior moral condition a stranger would not get justice from its judges. The exemption has caused, as might be expected, countless abuses and failures of justice, and Turkey and Egypt have of late been trying to get rid of it. But the foreign residents in those countries loudly protest against any change, and allege, and we believe with truth, that in nine cases out of ten the trial of causes in which Europeans were concerned before native judges would be a mockery; yet these powers insist, and with reason, and China will doubtless insist, that if we believe what we say in our treaties of their equality, we ought to be willing to submit to the test of pleading before their courts. The fact is that "the unjust judge" is an object of reprobation in all codes and traditions and systems of morality, but it is only in those nations which carefully uphold legal forms and treat rules of procedure with reverence that the just judge is found anywhere out of the sacred books and the apologues and the poetry—a fact of which we beg the Sons of Thunder to take notice whenever they are flattering themselves that they can govern the United States simply through common schools, popular lectures, stump speeches, the Weekly Tribune, and what one of them recently called "the human mind" as distinguished from the "legal mind." Whenever they succeed in establishing their great moral régime, they may rely on it, judges to whose decisions civilized men will trust life or property—judges, indeed, in whose justice any intelligent man will believe—will become as scarce as the dodo, though the character of "the upright judge" will be frequently sketched in sermons and in magazine articles and poems.

---

We made a slip of the pen last week in speaking of the relations of the Catholic clergy to education. The French bishop whom we quoted is the Bishop of Périgueux, and not of Dordogne. It was in a letter to the Préfet of Dordogne that he laid down the law, the préfet being engaged in the wicked work of trying to improve "higher education."

---

The Pope has summoned an œcumenical council to meet in December, 1869, in which all the Church's troubles are to be fully discussed; but judging from the tone of his later allocutions, and the propositions of his encyclical, the gulf which separates the Church from the world is too wide to be bridged except by a compromise, and the Church cannot compromise.

---

There may be said to be no foreign news whatever. In Germany Mr. Bancroft is busy bringing all the states into the treaty recognizing the citizenship of naturalized Americans as complete. Lord Stanley, we are informed by cable, has sent despatches out announcing his readiness to accept the American view of the question, and probably by the end of the year there will not be a naturalized American citizen who will not be able, while on his European tour, to snap his fingers in the face of the mightiest monarch on earth, should he feel so disposed, without incurring other penalties than those to which a native American of similar notions of propriety would in like cases be exposed; so that Mr. Conness will have to get his bill passed quickly, if he means to have a British subject locked up in expiation of Fenian sufferings. The Church trouble grows in England; and in France the Government is the butt of fierce attacks in the Chambers on the financial situation—M. Thiers and M. Jules Favre, as usual, leading the van of the opposition. The law permitting meetings to discuss anything but politics, is being used to some extent, and considerable ingenuity is being shown in the selection of topics of discussion which at least smell strongly of politics.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

Both the great parties of the nation having now framed their platforms and selected their candidates, the political campaign is formally opened; and although the extreme heat of the weather prevents an active canvass for the present, there is no reason to doubt that it will soon commence with great vigor on both sides, nor is there any great difficulty in foretelling the result. The malignant elements of the Democratic party have been too strong for its shrewdest leaders, and have doomed it to another defeat. But the Eastern managers have been too shrewd for the fanatics of the party, and have driven the latter into a corner from which they could not escape otherwise than by a surrender in the nominations of all that they had gained in the platform. On the other hand, the defeated faction manifested unusual wit and sagacity in adopting a way of escape from their dilemma, which gave their favorite candidate all the honors of magnanimity now, and a claim of inestimable value upon the party in the future.

Some of our readers know how this was done, but many do not, and to them a brief account of the inside working of the Convention will be interesting. On the morning of the nomination the New York delegation had agreed to present the name of Chief-Justice Chase as soon as the vote for Mr. Hendricks should fall off. But, contrary to their expectation, the vote for Hendricks did not decline, and he regained all that he had lost the day before. This arose in part from the willingness of many delegates to vote for any one rather than Chase. It soon became evident that Hancock had no chance, and a bargain was struck between his friends and those of Hendricks, to combine on the latter for President and the former for Vice-President. While arrangements were being made to secure a two-thirds vote for this combination, the Pendleton men hastily resolved to do anything which would prevent its success, partly from indignation with the betrayal of Pendleton by the friends of Hendricks, and partly to keep the field clear for Pendleton in 1872, by the nomination of an Eastern man at this time. Obviously, there was only one name with which this could be successfully done, and although it was a bitter pill to nominate the one man who had made Pendleton's nomination impossible, yet common sense pointed out the necessity of such a course, and perhaps comforted the Ohio delegation with the thought that the honor was, after all, a barren one. At any rate, the nomination was resolved upon, and the fact was privately communicated to Governor Seymour by Mr. Vallandigham. Governor Seymour resisted to the utmost, but in vain. He was assured that his remonstrances would be disregarded, as they were. And no one who witnessed the uproar of enthusiasm with which the Convention received the nomination, and the terrific clamor with which it drowned the candidate's objections, could wonder that he lost courage to resist it. We have ourselves no doubt of his sincerity in declining the nomination. He is sagacious enough to know that he cannot be elected, and yet he will be tormented for months by a natural hope that some lucky chance will give him success—a hope which his reason will always condemn, but cannot banish. The canvass will wear upon his mind, therefore, just as much as if he were ultimately elected, yet will end in disappointment and comparative obscurity. It is no kindness to Horatio Seymour to make him a Presidential candidate, and he knows this as well as we do.

Mr. Seymour cannot be elected, for the simple reason that he will get no votes worth mentioning, except from the regular Democratic party; and the next election is notoriously to be decided by the votes of lukewarm Republicans. But if other reasons were necessary for his defeat, they may be found in the fact (highly creditable to him) that he cannot arouse the enthusiasm of the Western Democracy, who are more interested in effecting a covert repudiation of the national debt than in any other issue of the day. He is the chief of that wing of the party which has all along opposed such schemes. He is well known to be in favor of a return to specie payments. He lives in the midst of a community which would be ruined by national repudiation. The savings-banks of this State are alone a guaranty that Horatio Seymour can never consent to a breach of the public faith. His assent to the platform makes no difference. Every repudiator instinctively feels that he can receive no practical aid from the favorite of New York bankers, the intimate friend of Belmont, the relentless opponent of Pendleton.

The nomination of Frank Blair for Vice-President is one of those singular freaks into which the necessities of a party sometimes lead it. A Western soldier was wanted for the place; and almost every prominent soldier at the West is in favor of Grant. The ridiculous names of McClernand and Ewing, the only ones mentioned besides that of Blair, show the straits to which the party was reduced. General Blair's military record is respectable, but his political vagaries have made him one of the most utterly uninfluential men in the country. He brings no popular strength whatever to the support of the ticket, and will repel many votes from it.

But although the Democratic ticket is not one that can be elected without some extraordinary change in public sentiment, it does not follow that the Convention has acted very unwisely in its choice, at least as far as the chief nomination is concerned. It is very doubtful whether any other nominee would have come nearer to an election. The Western radical Democrats were in earnest in their threats of opposition to Judge Chase, if nominated. Mr. Pendleton would have lost nearly everything at the East. Mr. Hendricks would not have aroused enthusiasm anywhere. Governor Seymour will have the unanimous and hearty support of his party in the East; he will almost certainly carry New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut; and it is not impossible that he may carry Pennsylvania, though we think he will not. The party will come out of the contest unbroken and well organized, with a fair prospect for substantial triumphs in the future.

The loss of New York is a serious affair to the Republican party. It is due entirely to a single cause—the rigid Excise Law of 1866, a law just and proper enough in itself, but too much in advance of the public conscience to be sustained in the State. On the single issue of reconstruction, the State could be carried for Grant as easily as Ohio. On the financial issues it would decide overwhelmingly for the Chicago platform.

We wonder if there are any Republicans still obtuse enough not to see that the failure of impeachment has been the salvation of the party. With Mr. Wade dealing forth thunder from the White House, anticipating all Gen. Grant's appointments, and dragging down the ticket by his candidacy for the second office; with Gen. Butler as minister to England, and other equally appropriate selections for the leading offices; with the ardor of the venal politicians dampened by their failure to obtain all the places that they hoped for, and that of honorable and unselfish men chilled by the carnival of office-seeking in the midst of a campaign,—he must be a sanguine man who believes that the Republican party would have done nearly so well in the election as it will now.

The new constitution having been rejected in Mississippi, and none having been yet framed in Texas, those States cannot participate in the Presidential election. It is probable also that Virginia will be excluded, by delay in ratifying the Constitutional Amendment. This would reduce the number of electoral votes to 294, or, if Virginia is restored, 304. These will, in our judgment, be divided as follows:

| Grant. | | Seymour. | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama, | 8 | Arkansas, | 5 |
| Florida, | 3 | California, | 5 |
| Illinois, | 16 | Connecticut, | 6 |
| Indiana, | 13 | Delaware, | 3 |
| Iowa, | 8 | Kentucky, | 11 |
| Kansas, | 3 | Maryland, | 7 |
| Louisiana, | 7 | New Jersey, | 7 |
| Maine, | 7 | New York, | 33 |
| Massachusetts, | 12 | Oregon, | 3 |
| Michigan, | 8 | Georgia, | 9 |
| Minnesota, | 4 | Virginia (if restored), | 10 |
| Missouri, | 11 | | |
| Nebraska, | 3 | | |
| Nevada, | 3 | | |
| New Hampshire, | 5 | | |
| North Carolina, | 9 | | |
| Ohio, | 21 | | |
| Pennsylvania, | 26 | | |
| Rhode Island, | 4 | | |
| South Carolina, | 6 | | |
| Tennessee, | 10 | | |
| Vermont, | 5 | | |
| West Virginia, | 5 | | |
| Wisconsin, | 8 | | |
| | 205 | | 99 |

CONVERSION.

The House has reduced the Senate Funding Bill to a condition in which its authors will not know it. The clause authorizing gold contracts is stricken out, and for the three varieties of bonds, running for different periods and bearing different amounts of interest, a single bond exempt from all taxation, and running forty years, and bearing three dollars and sixty-five cents per cent. interest, has been substituted. The bonds are to be used in redeeming the outstanding interest-bearing debt of the United States; but the conversion is only to be made at "the option of the holders" of the present securities. This last provision, which was inserted in the Senate, and which we are, we confess, somewhat agreeably surprised to see retained in the House, of course deprives Mr. Sherman's funding plan of its only objectionable feature. A conversion such as that which he offered at first as a means, and the only means, of escape from total loss, was of course only a disguised form of robbery. Whether the bill now before the House be passed or not, it is not open to criticism from a moral point of view. The question presented for discussion therefore is, Will the present holders agree to convert on the terms offered them? Under the bill they have their option—in other words, the Government pledges itself that should they refuse no harm shall come to them, or, at least, no harm of which they will have a moral right to complain.

Now, what are the inducements offered to a man now holding a five-twenty bond, which pays him (income-tax off) five dollars and seventy cents per cent. per annum, to accept in its stead a forty-year bond, bearing three dollars and sixty-five cents interest payable on its face, both principal and interest in coin? They are two in number, and two only. One is, the increased length of the term the new bonds will have to run, their exemption from all taxation, Federal as well as other; the second is the removal of the doubt which now, in the minds of many people, hangs over the question, whether a large portion of the five-twenties are, or are not, payable in coin. These advantages would, doubtless, be to many, perhaps most, holders a sufficient inducement to submit to the conversion if the security offered were a little better than that they now hold, or if the interest were not exceedingly low. But here is where the difficulty arises.

If a private debtor comes to his creditor and says: "I have come victorious out of the lawsuit which you were good enough to lend me money to carry on. I have recovered possession of my estate, and now hope in a few years, with care and industry, to be as prosperous as ever. I have, as you know, borrowed a great deal at different times, for different periods, at different rates of interest, so that my affairs are in a very confused and disorderly condition. I want to regulate them and reduce them to uniformity. I offer you, therefore, a long bond for the short one you now hold of me, and offer also to settle that little dispute we have had as to the terms of payment by substituting a clear and distinct expression for the ambiguous one of which you complain. I borrowed from you, as you know, owing to the desperate condition of my affairs at the time, at very high rates of interest, and as matters have turned out you have made a very good bargain. I do not complain, nor do I seek to evade our mutual understanding; but it will improve your security and my position if you will come into the arrangement I propose, and accept, in consideration of my agreement not to pay you off as soon as you expected, a lower rate of interest."

Now, the answer a creditor would make to this would, of course, largely depend on his opinion of the debtor's character. If he had found him invariably loyal, fair, civil, uncomplaining, and wanted only the interest on his money, he would, in nine cases out of ten, accept. If, on the contrary, the debtor, as soon as the lawsuit was over, had begun to dispute about the terms of the contract; to stand on the "letter of the law;" to disavow or deny solemn public declarations repeatedly made; to abuse his creditor personally as a bloated and selfish person; to make it a matter of reproach to him that he had not lent the money from pure affection; to treat his comfortable worldly condition as a circumstance tending to weaken the debtor's obligation to him; and, finally, to talk of his (the debtor's own) unwillingness to pay as a good reason why he should not pay, or should pay less than he promised—in this case, we take it, the creditor would treat the proposal to convert as simply a fresh piece of impudence. He would reply: "My fine fellow, I know perfectly well what you want. Your recent conduct has convinced me you are a scoundrel, and that you mean eventually to repudiate your debt. Your present proposal is simply an ingenious attempt to let me down easy—or, in other words, to rob me by degrees instead of doing it all at once. But I will not assist in the hocus pocus. If you mean to cheat me, you must do it yourself, and do it in the lump."

Now, we are very far from insinuating that the promoters of these funding bills, either in the House or Senate, really mean them to be anything else than what they call them—a fair and reasonable settlement of the public debt upon a firm and permanent basis, and as advantageous to the creditor as to the country. But what we do say is, that the surrounding circumstances are such—the conduct and language of a considerable portion of the Republican party, as well as of the whole Democratic party, has been such during the past year as throws suspicion on the whole plan, and makes its success very doubtful. Conversion at a lower rate of interest is always a delicate process. It requires the highest character on the part of the Government and the utmost confidence on the part of the creditor to make it successful. If the motives of the former are tainted by the slightest appearance of bad faith, the creditor's natural tendency is to hold off. He says to himself, that if he is to be swindled he would rather run the risk with a six per cent. bond in his pocket than with a three-sixty-five bond. And it must be remembered that if any considerable portion of the creditors decline, the process is pro tanto a failure.

Considering how desirable this conversion is, how pleasant and even glorious it would be to diminish the public burdens, simply by the use of the popular confidence in the national honor, it was, of course, in the highest degree necessary that the public creditor should be treated, at least so far as language is concerned, with courtesy and consideration. It was a duty doubly incumbent on the Republican party so to treat him, because its wisest men foresaw clearly, and a man did not need to be very wise to foresee it, that as soon as the war was over, and the social condition of the South at all settled, the enemies of the Government would combine with the opponents of the war to get rid of the debt. We are now witnessing the realization of this anticipation. The Democratic party at the North has actually settled down on repudiation as its sole capital, and though the South has, from motives of policy, not as yet shown itself very prominently in the movement, it is coming rapidly in, growing rapidly bolder in its language, and we venture to predict that the great political object of the two combined will, for some years to come, be not the undoing of reconstruction, but the release of the nation from the pecuniary cost of the war. This was expected by the Republican party, and it was met by it at Chicago in the proper manner; but the declaration then and there made is being rapidly got rid of by the Radical wing of the party, either by putting their own construction on it, or by freely denying its authority, and they are joining the Democrats, as we have seen in the recent divisions in the House, in a determined onslaught on the public creditor. Wade Hampton knows perfectly well that at this moment he could not strike a deadlier blow at his old enemy than by procuring the repudiation of the debt. He can accomplish through this what his arms could never accomplish—the debasement of the North; and finding the Butlers and Cobbs ready to help him, what is more natural than that they should gradually draw nearer to each other? All other issues are dead or dying—Congressional power of reconstruction, negro suffrage, State rights. The "rascally bondholder," the detested fellow who, in 1863-4, brought army after army into the field, covered the South with hostile troops and horses and munitions, when millions of Southern ears were listening for the news of Northern bankruptcy, stands still in the gap. What can be more delightful to the Cavaliers than to despoil him, and what can be more piquant than to have Radical help in doing it?

The fact that desire is felt to lower the interest will not hinder conversion; it is a proper desire. The United States can offer better security now than they could offer in 1862–4, and ought to have the benefit of the improvement of their condition. What is injuring the public credit is the spirit displayed towards the public creditor. The speeches made about him in and out of Congress, by prominent Radicals as well as by Democrats, show not a desire to adjust his claims fairly, but a desire to get at him and damage him as an extortioner, a person with whom faith need not be kept, who may be specially taxed without giving reason for it;—witness the passage of the Cobb resolution under the previous question; witness Butler's repudiation of the notion that there is such a thing as a national conscience; witness the support he receives from the more frantic "moral organs;" witness the readiness of a large portion of the Republicans in the House to stand by him in repudiating the Chicago platform; witness Thaddeus Stevens's open declaration that he would sooner vote for Blair than accept the doctrine that the debt is payable in coin; witness, too, the constant and, we may say, exclusive use of the argument ab inconvenienti—that it is not pleasant to meet our obligations as we are now doing—as a complete answer to all appeals to the force of contracts and the sacredness of the national honor.

Anybody who sees these things may well ask himself, What reason is there to believe that these new settlements will quiet agitation against the public creditor when the old one did not prevent it? If plighted faith did not hinder Cobb from getting sixty-one Republicans to vote for the imposition of a special tax of ten per cent. in addition to the five per cent. income-tax already levied on the interest of the six per cent. bonds, what is there to prevent him getting a majority next year, also, to impose a similar tax on the new three-sixty-five per cent. bonds, or from taxing them out of existence altogether? What guarantee has this new security which the old one did not possess? Is there enough difference between five dollars and seventy cents per cent. and three dollars sixty-five cents per cent. to make it at all likely that "the poor man" who found the one an intolerable burden will regard the other as a sacred obligation? If nobody is bound to keep his promises unless it is convenient to keep them, how do we know that the $130,000,000 now solemnly set apart to meet the interest on the new bonds will not be voted next year an outrageous imposition on the "toiling millions"? If these questions do not suggest themselves to nine out of ten bondholders when they are asked to make this conversion, it will be because they are extraordinarily stupid.

The conversion, in short, will not succeed unless the party in power takes stronger measures than it has yet done to rid itself of all responsibility for the talk of its wilder and more worthless members. If party discipline have any value whatever, it ought to be enforced in cases of this kind. The banner of reason and morality must be upheld by it with a stronger hand than now if the nation is to save its honor as well as its life. The party is surrounded with a great cloud of "bummers," who are preaching everywhere that universal suffrage is its only god; that its supreme reliance is in numbers; that the ballot is its panacea; that misery and injustice will disappear from the earth with the appearance of all adults at the polls; and that they have got it "educated up" to such a pitch that reason, experience, and the forms of law are no longer necessary for the government of men. The sooner some means is discovered of shaking off these irregulars, the better it will be. They are not numerous, and they are not powerful; they are not valuable, and they are utterly irreclaimable. They are always "in the advance," but they make the main body odious by their robbing of hen-roosts and rummaging of garrets, and swaggering amongst the women and the old men. It is high time that the provost-marshal was sent after them, with instructions to drive them over to the enemy.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD.

The Pope has summoned a general council of the Catholic Church to meet in the Basilica of the Vatican on the 8th of December, 1869. Those ecclesiastics who cannot appear in person will be entitled to do so by proxy. The object of the council is declared by the bull to be to assure the integrity of the faith, respect for religion and ecclesiastical laws, improvement of public morals, and the removal of the ills afflicting civil and religious society. These are, however, the objects for which the Church is always working, and to speak of them as the objects of a general council explains nothing. The real objects are, doubtless, the consideration of questions which the bull puts in a subordinate position—the maintenance of the temporal power, of the sacramental character of the marriage ceremony, and of the control of the priests over the education of the young. It is said, but we believe not openly avowed, that the council will be asked to declare the Pope infallible—that is, to clothe him with powers which have from the beginning been reserved to the Church itself, and which would put him in a position towards his fellows such as no mortal in the Western world has ever filled, and would, in an age of declining faith, put the faith of the most faithful to a severer test than it has ever yet undergone.

What the exact position of Catholicism in the world is, whether it is gaining or losing, or how much it is gaining or losing, it is almost impossible to determine. The same thing may be said of all the other Christian sects. Statistics, if they could on such a point be collected even with an approach to accuracy, would reveal nothing, or next to nothing. The strength of a Church is in the ratio of the zeal of its members, and not of their numbers. In fact, numbers were never more deceptive as a test of strength than now, for the number of persons who have no objection to belonging nominally to religious organizations for which they have no real liking or sympathy was never so great as now. The amount of money the Catholic Church or any church spends proves little also. That its treasury should be well filled is one of the natural results of the growth of wealth in every country, and of the increased power of collection created by the concentration of population in great cities, and the facilities for "getting at" people afforded by the railway and the post-office. What these things have done for the art of raising money even from the very poor was strikingly illustrated by the history of the Fenian organization in this country.

But this much is certain, that whatever signs of prosperity the Church may show in the number of its members, or in the number or costliness of its places of worship and charitable institutions, as an organization it is on the eve of some very serious changes in its position, which are probably nowhere so strikingly visible as at Rome, which may be called its nervous centre; and it is to the alarm and anxiety which the prospect of these changes there inspire that we owe the present call for a general assembly. The present crisis is to the ecclesiastical imagination really more alarming than the Reformation. At the Reformation men left the fold in states with a great banging and uproar; and their going, and the defiance and detestation they breathed in going, only strengthened the zeal of those who remained behind. Moreover, wherever the Papacy retained its sway, it retained the temporal arm on its side; the state remained part of the church and the church included the state. The idea that a state, as such, could do without a church never entered anybody's head. For fifteen hundred years, therefore, the church has found herself upheld by political legislation, and her right to rule the consciences of men acknowledged on the statute-book in every country in which the majority of the population has made outward profession of faith in her. The calamity she is threatened with now is a far worse one, to her imagination, than any which has yet overtaken her, viz.: the cutting of the bonds between her and the state—not by recreants or heretics or men who repudiate her claims to divine origin and authority, but by communities which acknowledge her spiritual sway but have grown indifferent about her; which do not either dislike her enough to abandon her, or like her well enough to allow her any longer to meddle in their affairs. With Protestants and infidels, Turks and Jews, she knows how to deal, and has had long experience in dealing; but with Catholics who will not take the trouble to repudiate her, and who yet show unwillingness to pay priests, or to let them control education, or to treat their celebration of marriage as a thing of any value, and who in doing so have the state at their back, and against whom there is consequently no appeal in this world, she does not know how to deal. She has refused steadily in Europe, at least ever since Constantine, to treat with the individual man, apart from the state, where she could possibly avoid it, and has treated political organizations as being merely means furnished by Providence for carrying her teachings into effect. She now finds herself threatened everywhere with complete separation from the state—in other words, with the loss of dignity and of power, and with a forced dependence upon the voluntary contributions of her communicants. This is in reality what the Pope has in his mind when he talks of the prospect of the Church having "to return to the catacombs."

The idea of a free church in a free state, such as the Catholic Church is here, has never, it must be remembered, been tried anywhere but here. It is still a strange or unfamiliar idea to the great majority of Europeans of all creeds; but during the last few years it has been making considerable progress. This progress has been greatly stimulated by the discussion about the temporal power in Italy, about the Protestant establishment in Ireland, and by the great agitation which prevails everywhere on the subject of marriage and popular education. Every one of these questions has brought into strong light various pretensions of the Church, which till now can hardly be said to have been questioned, at least in Continental Europe, but which have been found on discussion to have hardly any strength left in the popular mind. The attempts of the clergy to retain their hold on education have revealed the bitterest hostility to them on the part of the men of the educated classes in nearly every country. Even the peasantry begin to show signs of indifference. The quiet and facility with which the Church has recently been despoiled of its landed property in Italy, the readiness of men of all classes and conditions to buy it, and even to pay high prices for it, is of itself a striking indication of the extent to which the popular faith in the supernatural powers of the Church has been weakened. Even in Austria the public has openly revolted against Papal meddling with temporal affairs, and in fact against all legislative acknowledgment that the opinions or practices of the Church are matters of any concern to the state; and the controversy which has followed has called out expressions of hostility to the clergy which are hardly consistent with the retention of much respect for their teaching. It is not at all likely, in fact, that the connection of church and state will survive the next twenty years in any country in Europe except Spain. Even in France, in which the payment of the clergy of all denominations by the Government puts this connection in its least offensive form, its dissolution begins to be talked of, and not simply by materialists and philosophical politicians, but by ardent friends of religion like Montalembert, in the interest of religion, and from the fear that its prolongation will intensify the bitterness which the participation of the clergy in politics has already created.

Now, this prospect of being left to the tender mercies of the faithful, after fifteen hundred years of governmental fostering, is what is dreaded at Rome, and it is dreaded all the more because there is no use in denying that the prevalent and growing hostility to church establishments is the sign and result of diminished respect for Church teaching, and not of regard for the Church's spiritual influence. Statesmen and politicians, when they are arguing against church temporalities, present their scheme in the manner best calculated to soothe the clergy, and there is doubtless truth in their representations that the complete severance of the bonds between church and state would promote the interests of religion; but it is nevertheless also true that the success they are meeting with in their attacks on church establishments, and on the meddling of the clergy in legislation, is due to diminished regard on the part of the masses for Church consolations and authority. Wherever civil marriage has been established by law, the disposition among the masses to be content with it and to dispense with the ecclesiastical sanction grows apace. The indifference of the men to church ordinances also grows apace, and so does their hostility to clerical interference with education.

What is, perhaps, most extraordinary is that the Church, instead of accommodating itself to these tendencies, fights against them most desperately, and the more untenable it finds its positions becoming under the advance of science and the growth of individual independence, the more desperately it defends them. There is a stage of resistance, however, at which desperation becomes ludicrous, and that the Church has reached it is abundantly proved by the present Pope's allocutions and encyclicals. The audience the old man obviously has in his mind when he composes these things is the European communities of the eleventh century. Nobody reads them now without smiling either internally or externally. The course of the clergy on what is called "the woman question" is also a curious illustration of their inability to deal with the problems of modern life. Putting female suffrage out of sight altogether, there is no denying the growth amongst women of all countries of profound discontent with the position in which mediæval jurisprudence and sociology have left them. Even those who are not dissatisfied with their exclusion by law or usage from nearly every pleasant and lucrative mode of earning a livelihood, or who accept marriage as "woman's mission," are dissatisfied with the theory of the wife's position on which both the law of marriage and the popular notion of her moral rights and duties are based. There are very few people of either sex who do not feel that there is much to be done before women can be said to hold their proper place in society; that, as long as the female half of the human race occupy in every country the position of a "prey," without either enough moral or physical strength to enable them, even in the most highly civilized communities, to dispense readily with "male protectors," or to take charge comfortably and confidently of their own destiny, something is wrong; that there ought to be no rest till it is set right; that if better education be needed, it ought to be supplied; if better laws, they ought to be passed; if other and better usages, they ought to be established. In this enquiry certainly the clergy should play the leading part; and the Catholic clergy most of all, because no other clergy are so dependent on women for their influence. There is no country in the world in which they retain any hold on the educated or intelligent men; and yet, to all doubts or questionings about women's condition, about the sufficiency of her education, and about the justice of her legal helplessness, they oppose implacably the maxims of mediæval jurisprudence, or texts of Scripture, which when the family was a legal organism represented in society by the oldest male had force and pertinence, but which in modern society—pulverized as it is into individuals, in which even parental responsibility little more than suffices for the provision of food, clothing, and education in infancy—are as unfit to form a basis of legislation, or even of social usage, as the injunction to turn the right cheek when we are smitten on the left or surrender our coat when robbed of our cloak.

"LITTLE DIGS."

THIS colloquialism is known to everybody, we suppose, and always, we suppose, it means the same thing, namely, a brief, somewhat malignant remark of the kind called personal, made in a sly, concealed sort of a way. Perhaps it may be doubted if malignity belongs to every little dig; but a certain degree of malice will, we think, be found in the most innocent of them—in the very mildest remark which any one would think of calling a dig. There may be a doubt, too, whether the quality of slyness and concealment is an essential quality, but it is, we take it; so far, at any rate, as concerns the spoken dig the doubt is to be disregarded, and so far as regards the printed variety a little consideration causes it to disappear. As used by women—and nobody will deny that people, male or female, who are of feminine natures are apt to be most accomplished in the use of it—it is in any given case almost a certainty that the remark shall seem harmless or unintelligible to everybody but the particular person for whose irritation or punishment the little dig contained in it is designed. Every one will recall occasions when he suffered great anguish from little digs which it was impossible that anybody but himself and his tormentor could understand. It is, of course, not necessary, nor often possible, that the intention of irritating should be concealed; the expression and manner of the victim and victimizer alike commonly make it clear to the spectator that secret stabbing or pin-sticking is going on, but as a rule the stabs are not individually perceivable as such. The printed dig, on the other hand, may be and generally is entirely intelligible on the face of it, as well as obviously intended to produce uncomfortableness. But a little while looking at the matter shows that this intelligibility in the one case is not at bottom inconsistent at all with the unintelligibility in the other. If we confine ourselves to the outside of the thing which—to make a noun—the Little Digger produces, there is an inconsistency; not so if we consider the thing produced in its relation to the nature and character of the producer. For cowardliness and some malignity are principal traits in the character of any person who habitually deals in little digs, whether he works with the pen or with the tongue only. Now, the newspaper furnishes that hiding-place for the malignity which the cowardliness demands, and serves the printing little digger just as the veil of unintelligibleness and ambiguity serves the speaking one. The woman who gives her husband a succession of little digs for half a dozen meals always can—and when he begins to rage and prepare for serious fighting she usually does—take refuge in some other interpretation of the distasteful remarks. She is not fond of open warfare, and discreetly, if not valiantly, she provides herself with a loophole of retreat. The same woman doing the same thing in the public prints would be perfectly plain in speech; would speak as boldly as if she were writing an anonymous letter. There is, however, a word that should be said in behalf of some of the makers of little digs. (By the way, it is a word that will partly relieve us of the accusation of insolence and great shallowness in what we have been saying about the feminine aptness for this species of weapon.) There are people not particularly malignant and not particularly cowardly who, in the expression of their displeasure, are not more able than at other times to be simple and downright; subtleties delight them; it would be as impossible for them to make attacks except by innuendos and far-off hints—non-committal, which allow of reserve—as it would be for the typical masculine nature to refrain from going directly and without concealment at whatever provokes its hostility. As a matter of historical fact, the two worst cases of habitual little diggers that we know—they are both men, by the way—both have for their distinguishing characteristic delicacy of mental apprehension; only one of them is cowardly, and one of them is particularly free from malignity or more than seeming spitefulness—in other words, he plays with spitefulness, having an intellectual appreciation of its uses and an intellectual enjoyment of it, and being too sound morally to be a truly spiteful person.

The little dig in its oral form we are not here going to consider. It is a wide subject, and almost any of our readers is perhaps as well qualified to treat of it as we are. But the thing, as it appears in print, we have had an exceptionally good opportunity to see and understand. To know it is not, we find, to love it. Some examples will give our innocent readers a clearer idea of what we mean than much general talk about it, and we begin with a very mild and hardly reprehensible one which, a day or two after the Democratic Convention hadn't nominated Judge Parker for the Presidency, appeared in a New Jersey paper:

> "The following advertisement we reprint as news matter, without charge, from a Monmouth County paper:
>
> 'JOEL PARKER, Attorney-at-Law,
>
> has resumed the practice of law at Freehold, N. J.'"

On the whole, Mr. Parker himself would not probably object to that little dig, which has but a slight savor of malice. The other one is maliciousness itself, and as for its truthfulness—for properly characterizing that Mr. Greeley would be required. The writer, without having the slightest authority for doing so, and merely to give a dig at a man whom Tammany abhors, makes Max Müller speak in this way of his justly distinguished colleague:

> "In fact, we quite agree with the ex-professor's eminent colleague at Oxford, Max Müller, that the transportation to America of such lecturers upon history and philosophy as Mr. Goldwin Smith is very like 'sending coals to Newcastle.'"

As will be seen, by perusal of this second specimen, it is not easy to illustrate by examples. To do so is almost to become the digger's accomplice in crime by helping his concoctions into publicity. As regards this case, however, it was proper for us, as having first published Professor Müller's letter referred to, to deny the correctness of the construction put upon it. But we have had recently any number of the most acrimonious little digs, which are fresh in the memory of everybody in the country, and to which we refer without scruple. Reference to them can do no harm; it will serve our purpose and will hurt nobody's feelings, unless, indeed, some stray little digger may have grace enough left to blush at the recollection of his own rascally handiwork. We mean, of course, the attacks made upon Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Fessenden, who may boast that they have been more abused by more cowards, and more unjustly, than any two men in the last half-century of American history. There was a fortnight or so this spring which was the very heyday of the little digger. It was then that he printed "significant straws" showing that "among the visitors at the White House to-day were Senator Henderson, Senator Fessenden, Perry Fuller of Kansas, and Senator Doolittle"—as who should give a little dig and say, "The corrupters and the corrupted meet together in secret assemblage, and gloat over the defeat of the wishes of an earnest and patriotic people." He used to note how Trumbull entered the House of Representatives, and, "after shaking hands with Niblack and other Democratic members, went away"—which is as much as to say, "See how the traitor and the enemy collogue together." He made lists of the number of Mr. Fessenden's relations who are, or have been, in the public service, in order that the people might be informed of the greediness of a senator so ungrateful as to refuse a simple vote for the good of his country. He proved that "this same Lyman Trumbull," in the winter of 1866, was very near losing his seat in the Senate, which is a little dig meant to imply that the said Trumbull, now so stiff and pertinacious in holding his own opinion, could once eat humble pie, and did eat it, for fear he should be turned out of office. In short, it was then that he got behind the fence of the anonymous and threw more vitriol than he ever had before with great ardor. Some of his kin are still doing it. It is not a week since a Massachusetts paper, which ought to be, and hitherto has been, above it, permitted somebody to get under cover and make about Mr. Fessenden, àpropos of what we recently said of his brother, a brutal remark, which had every indication of having had great pains taken by the little digger in its preparation.

It is a fact not to be forgotten, in regard to this latest carnival of small villany, that there was not a creature engaged in it who three months before would not have squirted dirty water on anybody or stuck pins into anybody whom he thought Mr. Trumbull or Mr. Fessenden might wish to see drenched or pricked. For those gentlemen he had all his life been swinging his hat. In January last he would have asserted the truth that it was to Mr. Trumbull and Mr. Fessenden and their "judicial minds" that we owed either the whole or a great part of all that is valuable and that will be durable in the legislation of the last five years. If you had disagreed with him, he would have declined argument, for the true little digger has the true feminine dislike of argument, and would very likely have made a pretence of agreeing with you; or it is possible that, having others like unto himself with him at the time he might have plucked up his courage and gone on bawling. Whichever he did—whether he deafened you or wheedled you, and smiled sickly smiles—it would have been all the same; in a day or two you would discover him giving you a little dig in some paper which he owned or which he had the run of. We know one engaging creature of this kind who habitually revenges himself for any little grievance he may think has been put upon him by at once going away with speed and jotting down on you some such thing as this: "It had been thought that every father of six children in the neighborhood of Smith Park knew how to behave himself at a public gathering. The conduct of a certain paterfamilias who sat in a conspicuous place at the last Morris Brothers, Pell, and Trowbridge concert causes the contrary opinion to prevail." Or something like this: "A certain gentleman from Savin Hill was probably very much surprised to find that loud talking in a railroad car against New England's most honored sons is not the way to make friends among our people."

We notice another curious thing as having been made plain in the late series of attacks on the seven senators, and that is that some of the most wickedly envenomed of the little digs were made by persons supposed to be exceedingly strong as regards morals and moral ideas and the cause of progress. Possibly we have hit on the true explanation of the fact: Every aggressive and violent "cause" has of necessity a wonderful attraction for natures essentially feminine, which are sure to take violence for strength; and if persons of such natures are men, and are self-conscious, as men of such natures are apt to be, they go not only involuntarily, but voluntarily and eagerly, into the service of such causes, in the hope that by their fierceness and fearsome boldness their virility may the less be questioned. This is how we have been accustomed to account for the presence in the abolition ranks—among men of whom John Brown was the type, and the men of predominating moral convictions—of many of the very flaming and terrible persons of the minor-poet order. Well, the late little digging, it is to be confessed, happened to be to a great extent done from an anti-slavery point of view. It is evident how the feminine character of the sort of anti-slavery men we have been speaking of may, and indeed must, have led them, moral and progressive as they are, into great excesses of giving little digs.

Bad as many of those excesses were, we do not know that the Presidential campaign will not furnish examples of worse. The campaign against Grant, as conducted by the World, must kindle fires of ingenuous joy in the breast of, say, an American who reads it abroad among the bloated aristocrats who believe Northern Yankees to be cowards and republicanism to be by nature scurrilous. And setting aside the shame which such a course on the part of so able a journal brings upon the country, and the frightful example set, which is, we dare say, corrupting half a dozen of the young journalists who are to write for the next generation—setting these considerations aside, what decent person, seeing the regular outpouring of filth on a man who has no remedy for the anonymous injury and insult, will not sympathize with him amid undeserved indignities?

ENGLAND.

LONDON, July 3, 1868.

THERE is one topic which is proverbially supposed to furnish the staple of English conversation—I mean the weather. Just now it is even more eagerly discussed than usual, though for a different reason. Instead of the national mist and fog, we have had a long series of weeks of uninterrupted sunshine. Nothing like it has been known for years, and the consequences are becoming serious. The country is parched and baked. Hyde Park, instead of a refreshing green, is showing a dusty brown, suggestive of the Sahara. The grass is catching fire, and the prospects for harvest are becoming extremely doubtful. Meanwhile, in London, we are thirsty and suffering. Our dogs are all muzzled in compliance with a new police regulation; as the poor beasts suffer and pant miserably, and as the doctors now tell us that hydrophobia is really commonest in winter, it seems to be a useless cruelty to tie up their mouths under this burning sun. We console ourselves with knowing that the weather, though bad for farmers, dogs, and cockneys, has its advantages for travellers; we may hope that our foreign visitors are acquitting us of the ordinary imputations upon our climate; and the improvement is not inappropriate at this moment when one of the chief amusements is the reception of distinguished strangers. Mr. Longfellow has been heartily welcomed and, I should fear, must be almost overwhelmed by the general anxiety to do him honor. The last symptom of the feeling has been the appearance of some verses in this morning's Times, whose signature, "C. K.," I may venture to translate into Charles Kingsley.* They will, I hope, do more credit to the American than to the English poet; for the best thing to be said of them is that they express in rather ineffectual language the very general desire to give your countryman a hearty welcome, both on his own account and in some sense too by way of return for the hospitality shown to Mr. Dickens. Mr. Cyrus Field, too, was treated to a dinner of congratulation the other night to commemorate his services to the Atlantic Telegraph. It was chiefly remarkable as bringing together such political opposites as Sir John Pakington and Mr. Bright. They did their best to honor the guest of the evening, and if Mr. Bright's best is rather superior to Sir J. Pakington's best, their intentions were doubtless equally good. The greatest excitement, however, is naturally due to Sir Robert Napier's return from the Abyssinian expedition. He is being received with the warm enthusiasm which is due to one who has proved that English troops can still make long marches and overcome great natural obstacles. Mr. Disraeli praised him last night in his most elaborate eloquence, which, as usual with Mr. Disraeli's more pompous efforts, grazed very closely the borders of the ridiculous. He observed that the elephants of Asia had carried the artillery of Europe over the mountains of Africa, and through places that would terrify the trapper, and appall the hunter of the Alps. If the trapper refers to America, it is really hard that Australia alone should have been excluded from this brilliant bit of buncombe. A still more daring flight was the assertion that the standard of St. George was planted upon the heights of Rasselas. Poor Abyssinia is in a very bad way when so brilliant an orator can think of no better guardian angel for her mountains than Rasselas. One or two remarks may perhaps be made upon this Abyssinian expedition before it is finally dismissed to the limbo of forgotten campaigns. The war was due, as the Pall Mall Gazette has reminded us—not without a certain complacency—to two causes: first, to the inexcusable carelessness of Lord Russell and Mr. Layard, or some other Foreign Office authorities, who contrived between them to insult poor King Theodore after a most unnecessary fashion; and secondly, to the persistent way in which the papers—and especially the Pall Mall Gazette—managed to keep the case before the country. We did wrong originally, and we were extremely anxious to back out of the whole affair. The constant agitation in two or three newspapers alone prevented it from being huddled out of sight, and our wounded honor being left to heal itself. The fact is rather characteristic of the way in which things are managed just now, when no Government is sufficiently strong to take any decided line about anything, but allows itself to drift helplessly before the breath of public opinion—at one time into a reform bill, at another into a petty war which costs us five millions of money in killing a few savages and rescuing some not very interesting captives. However, when it was settled to do the business, it was done well, and we are all too glad to look at the result and forget the rather unstatesmanlike series of blundering bad management by which it was preceded. Sir Robert Napier is, and well deserves to be, the great lion of the season, for getting us so well through a very awkward scrape. Personally, he seems to be a man for whom every one entertains the highest possible respect. He is to be made a peer.

* Since attributed to Mr. Charles Kent.—ED. NATION.

With these excitements we have already forgotten the action of the House of Lords in throwing out Mr. Gladstone's Suspensory Bill. There has been a certain quantity of exultation about it on one side, and of indignation on the other; but neither exultation nor indignation has been very lively. The fact is that our new masters, the householders, will decide for us what is to be done, and every one knows that the House of Lords will not really hold out in face of a strong majority in the new Parliament. The debate was rather creditable to the assembly than otherwise. The arguments on both sides have been worn so utterly threadbare that little is to be made out of them, even by the ablest orator. Some of the orators, indeed, were very able. I was present during the first night of the debate, and the spectacle was rather striking after listening to an animated discussion in the Commons. The Lords meet, in the first place, in a really fine chamber, where there is ample room for every one concerned. The House of Commons is almost mean in its ornamentation and size. On an exciting occasion every inch of space in it is crammed to repletion, and every unit of the crowd—of course, excepting the spectators—seems bent on trying the strength of his lungs. In the House of Lords the galleries are occupied in great part by ladies, who can sit comfortably and display their dresses to advantage. In the House of Commons they are put behind a grating, in a kind of den, and only such glances are to be caught of their features as are to be seen of an Eastern woman above the edge of her veil. The House of Lords, in short, is full of color and light and space, instead of being a dingy, crowded, noisy receptacle for bad air. But its chief grace is derived from the bench of bishops. They, of course, mustered thick on the occasion of a great Church question, and looked inexpressibly fine in their flowing robes of fine lawn. The benches which they occupy look as if some flock of beautiful white birds had settled down with unruffled plumage to contemplate the floor below. The lay peers, it must be confessed, are not very superior in appearance to commoners, and lounge upon their benches with hats on in studious disregard of dignity. Lord Derby was the only speaker of much merit on the first night. He still retains some of the fire of manner which made him so effectual a combatant in oratorical struggles. His voice is clear, and he started with much fervor, throwing himself, with characteristic gallantry, into the most untenable position, and taunting his adversaries as robbers and wanton despoilers. But the atmosphere is unfavorable to eloquence. It imperceptibly calms down rhetoric as an invisible gas extinguishes flame; and Lord Derby has no longer his old physical vigor. After a good opening burst, he appeared to tire, and occasionally stumbled over awkward bits of grammar. He had not impetus enough to carry him over the obstacles of refractory relatives and pronouns and difficult concords. His flights grew shorter and more feeble, and at last he became positively dull: he took to that most wearisome variety of Parliamentary eloquence—an elaborate attempt to prove from the pages of Hansard that some opponent had used different language one year from that which he had employed twenty years before. He gathered himself again for a peroration; but the whole gave me the impression of a speaker suffering from want of sufficient stimulus. The roar of a House of Commons cheer compared with the gentle "sucking-dove" utterance of the House of Peers explains the difference of the rhetoric. No man, or scarcely any man, can rise to real eloquence without a thoroughly excited audience. Or, if another explanation be wanted, any one may conceive himself speaking in a room with twenty bishops in lawn sleeves. They diffuse around them a holy calm, somewhat as a large lump of ice extends a cooling influence throughout a room. Bishops in the background would, I am sure, weigh upon the soul of the boldest orator. The bishops, indeed, contributed something to the debate. The Archbishop of Canterbury dropped a few dignified sentences, which, I hope, were not a fair indication of his powers in the pulpit. The far more lively Bishop of Oxford, who is, indeed, a man of quite irrepressible vivacity, managed to be more amusing. The worst of him is that he is always oscillating between unctuosity and buffoonery. In the pulpit he puts too much oil into his style; in the House of Lords he is content to be broadly humorous. The two best speakers, however, were the Lord Chancellor, who even performed the feat of drawing cheers from the galleries at the conclusion of his speech, and the Marquis of Salisbury (late Lord Cranbourne). Both of them were fresh from the House of Commons, and had retained a good deal of the vigor of the more popular assembly. I need not speculate as to the length of time during which their constitutions will effectually resist the debilitating influences of the thin atmosphere of the loftier region. They both possess a manly and sensible style, though Lord Salisbury's forte lies rather in hard-hitting personalities, and Lord Cairns's in clear legal statement, and were certainly more than a match in mere speaking talent for the Liberal members of the House.

Meanwhile the political campaign is beginning. The elections will be vigorously contested, as there is so strong an element of uncertainty in the new constituencies. Mr. Mill, for example, whose seat was supposed to be safe, is threatened with a strong competition in Westminster. He has offended large classes by his proposals for Irish confiscations, and perhaps made himself a little ridiculous (by ridiculous I mean simply an object of laughter) by his advocacy of woman's rights. Such engines as can be brought to bear upon the electors will undoubtedly be worked against him without scruple. I hear, indeed, on what I believe to be good authority, that his prospects with the new class of voters are good. The story went that he would be opposed by General Eyre, and, if the election were in the hands of the clubs, the general's prospects would be good. As it is, the story is a mere "shave." Mr. Vernon Harcourt ("Historicus") is pretty safe to come in as a Liberal member for Oxford; but I have at present heard of few expected changes of any general interest. Indeed, the most remarkable thing hitherto is the smallness of the apparent alterations. The old caucuses are at work, and the old list of members seems to be presenting itself to the new constituencies. It is possible that no great change is to be anticipated until, under some warmer excitement, the new voters begin to feel their power. Hitherto the attempt to get up a No-Popery cry seems to be a failure, and has only resulted in a few insignificant riots.

Correspondence.

THE BONDS AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the House Committee of Ways and Means and the agents for sale of bonds and the newspapers had in July, 1863, promised to pay the buyers of the five-twenty bonds fifty per cent. interest in gold, instead of six per cent., as the law promised, would the Government now be bound to pay fifty per cent. interest in gold thereon? Are the acts of a government or municipal officer binding on the people beyond the terms of the law under which he acts? And do you not think those who invested millions of dollars in Government securities knew the terms of the law under which they were issued?

And why is it that, if the Government charters a steamer worth half a million dollars and pays one hundred dollars a day for its use, that its right to tax the boat is undisputed, while if it hires half a million dollars and pays six per cent. thereon, it is dishonest to tax the bonds?

Why should not foreign capitalists pay their proportion of tax to sustain and carry on the Government they look to for protection and security, as well as our own citizens? It seems to me that every one may fairly be chargeable with knowledge of such an obligation as well when they lend money to the Government as when they build railroads here.

And lastly, the Nation hits hard and well at fustian; but is not the talk of the "widows' and orphans' pittance," and of "scoundrelism" and "rascally repudiators" of the same kind, though perhaps more touching, as that of the "subsidized minions of a bloated bondholding aristocracy"?

In other words, we owe a debt. Let us pay it according to the terms of the law, no matter who holds it; but give no greater advantages to the bondholder than to the tax-payer, for the rights of neither, as I think, are superior to the other.

Yours, etc.,

Charles M. Walker.

Adrian, Mich., July 14, 1868.

[It is difficult to reply to a letter like the foregoing, we admit; but the difficulty consists in deciding how far back to begin. What has raised the "coin or greenbacks" controversy is that there are two kinds of currency just now familiar to people's minds. The law does not, in all cases, specify which the Government meant the bonds to be payable in; but its agents explained, in order to get the money, that the law meant gold, and the present repudiators stood silently by and never contradicted or corrected this explanation till the money was all paid in and spent. They now for the first time raise the point. We know what this is called in transactions between individuals. The promises of Government agents openly made through several years, and not disavowed, are, when money has been obtained from individuals for public use by means of them, binding on an honorable people. Nothing binds knaves; and "the people," not being suable, are not legally bound to anybody for anything. When a government talks of its "legal obligations" as something separate and distinct from the public undertakings made by its officials on its behalf, it does something which, when done by an individual, makes the mildest man long for a cudgel. The case of the steamer Mr. Walker surely does not put seriously. Government bonds are already taxed. If Mr. Walker holds any he knows perfectly well he pays five per cent. on the income derived from them, as on that derived from all other property. The reason why it is dishonest to tax them more than other property is taxed is, that this would be in reality a forcible reduction of the interest, or, in other words, a swindle. It would be simply a roundabout way of saying, "We promised you six per cent., but will only give you five." The reason why foreigners ought not to be called on to support governments to which they have lent money, is the same reason which forbids Mr. Walker levying contributions on his creditors, if he has any, for the support of his family or the extension of his business. His creditors are interested in his success, just as the foreign creditors of the Government are interested in its success; but that would not justify him in stopping a portion of his interest every half-year in order to ensure his life or to speculate in real estate. As to "fustian," Mr. Walker evidently does not use the word in the sense in which we use it, so that his objection to it does not touch us.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Hurd & Houghton announce "The Linden-Tree Cottage" and "The Accepted Sacrifice," being poems by Mrs. Angelica Bishop Barrett; "Poems," by Horace P. Biddle; "Admiralty Jurisdiction and Practice in the United States," by David Roberts, Esq., and "Military and Anthropological Statistics of American Soldiers," by B. A. Gould, M.D.——Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. are busily preparing what will, we suppose, be the most popular of the holiday gift-books—"Kathrina," illustrated with about seventy pictures from designs by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, engraved by Mr. Linton personally. Another book that will be popular among the dealers in such things will be a photographically illustrated edition of Ik. Marvel's "My Farm of Edgewood." Of other books in preparation for the holidays by various houses we have heard some rumors, but as yet nothing definite. ——G. P. Putnam & Son will publish a translation of a German novel, "The Amazon," by Franz Dingelstedt.——Leypoldt & Holt add another to the very agreeable novels of the author of "Who Breaks, Pays," and "Skirmishing"—Mrs. W. C. Jenkin she turns out to be—and the new book is called "A Psyche of To-day."——"The Catholic Publication Society" announces "Memorials of Those who Suffered for the Catholic Faith in Ireland during the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries," by Myles O'Reilly. The same house will publish a translation of the Life of Père Ravignan; "Love's Sacrifice," by Lady Herbert of Lea; and Adam Moehler's "Symbolism."——Messrs. Roberts Brothers are to give us a translation, also by Miss Preston (H. W.), of more of Sainte-Beuve's biographical sketches. The volume will be entitled "Portraits of Famous Men contemporary with Madame Swetchine and Madame Récamier."

—When Mr. Frank Moore began his "Rebellion Record," it is possible that he may have been of the half-dozen men who foresaw that the struggle would be as protracted as it afterwards proved. If he was, he gathered scraps and documents for a public which in its heart was as hopefully prophetic as Mr. Seward, and which purchased the early issues of the Record with far less caution than it was wont to use in making subscriptions to cyclopædias, and other works published in parts, which proverbially exceed the estimate of the prospectus. There was a time, we think—when rebellion had grown unmistakably into civil war, and that again was blossoming into revolution, with no certainty that authority would maintain itself—when the Record was, perhaps, the most discouraging thing on which the troubled patriot could reflect. This regular, remorseless, impassive, impartial, unlimited publication was like an assurance of misery as it was a constant reminder of past trials and reverses. Or it was like the Englishman in the "Wandering Jew," who attended every exhibition of the beast-tamer, in order to witness the catastrophe which he confidently expected, and which his evil presence at last occasioned. Mr. Moore's persistency, happily, survived the era of doubt, and the title which he gave to his chronicle has been saved from the ridicule that might have befallen it. At last the publisher, Mr. Van Nostrand, announces the end of the Record, Part lxxiii. closing the eleventh volume. We presume there can be no question that there never was so complete a body of mémoires pour servir published as this, and at least that it is destined to be the resort of all those who wish to study, from a political, social, or military point of view, the events of the years 1860–1865. That no libraries fit to be called such, whether public or private, can dispense with it is certain. The portraits of prominent officers and politicians which have generally accompanied each monthly part, have been of a high order of excellence, and add materially to the value and attractiveness of the Record.

—Some of the most amusing things in our periodical literature are to be found in the Historical Magazine, which, often with singular vividness, reproduces for our inspection our ancestors as they lived and moved in their simplicity. For our study first, usually, and for our inspection not till afterwards—it is the materials for the picture rather than the picture itself that are given us. The last number of the magazine contains the sixth of a series of articles contributed by Mr. Moore, the librarian of the New York Historical Society, to which he gives the general name of "Work and Materials for American History." In the article before us he publishes from the original manuscript in the British Museum a scoffing and gibing account of a well-known incident in the very early history of Massachusetts—namely, the mutilation of the standard by rigid John Endicott. It will be observed that the author has rather a low opinion of the conscience-stricken soldiery:

"In 1633 or thereabouts when people were Revelation mad and drunk with scism & blind zeal one of ye chief men of Boston in New England being then in authority & warmd with a lecture against that which ye Ignorant call superstition, with a daring Impudence set up for a Reformer of ye Kings Colour's & haveing taken ye same in his sanctifyd hands took his conscience to witness against a monstrous Idol that he found there in, to witt, a great Cross, & there upon drawing his Knife bravely cut it out with a great deal of self satisfaction & applause & ye next day boldly confess'd & defended ye same.

"This unparralel'd Act created great differences in ye Town, amongst all sorts of People, as well amongst those who have nothing to do with affairs of such a nature as those that had, in so much that ye very women were fit to pull coive's about it. As for ye common Soldier's who had as little of Religion as Courage or Honesty amongst them, most of them commended ye Act declairing that theyd sooner turn Heathen's & yield to ye Enemy than follow or fight under a Popeish Idol."

The author goes on to give the arguments made use of by "the Reverend Spite-Fires that were summond from all ye Country round & commanded to lay their heads together upon this weighty Matter." We have no space to do more than reproduce a little that was proffered by each side. Those who held the lawfulness and expediency of the worshipful master Endicott's act, urged, fifthly, that "If the Partakeing of Idolothytes in ye Places where ye Idols are worshipd, express a Communion with Idols & Idolaters; then ye setting up of ye Cross in ye Places where Idolaters do worship it, namely in ye Banner, is an Expression of Communion in their Idolatry. Tis true such meats when sold in ye Shambles might be eaten without scruple of Conscience; but besides this that it was onely a common place where these might be eaten, whereas ye Cross in ye Banner is in ye Temple where ye apocaliptic Gentiles adore it."

To this it was replied, not, we think, with great conclusiveness, that meats, though sacrificed unto idols, were permitted to be eaten if bought and sold in the market, and a cross, there could be no doubt, was as much an Effect of Art and a Creature of God, as any meat, etc., etc. But in their "Thirdly," the party that desired the deposition of Endicott (and who triumphed on the final vote) were very cogent. Perhaps there is ground for suspicion that the wicked prelatist who summarized the arguments may have foisted in adulterations and coinages of his own. The "little dig" about the thirst for lucre is rather more in his manner, we should say, than in that of the clerical gentlemen:

"3dly If that ye Cross first used by Constantine had in it any thing unwarantable, it follows not, that ye following use of it, is of ye same Lump with ye first, for if it now be used upon another Design the uncleaness is taken away. Besides Constantine brought ye Cross with as much unwarantableness into his Coin's as he did into his banner, but tis certain that there are few or none this day that would refuse money tho' they got thereon a Popish Idol, but would set mighty esteem on it ye bigger & ye better ye Cross was."

—Among late English books, most of which are to be found at Scribner, Welford & Co.'s, we notice these: The Rev. Henry Parry Liddon, a preacher whose eloquence gives him a great following just now among the young men at Oxford, is enough of a scholar and a thinker to make his discourses bear the voyage to this country without losing their attractiveness for the readers of religious literature. He was the Bampton lecturer for 1866, and his eight lectures are now in a second edition. In England almost nothing is stereotyped, and the former edition (Rivington's, Oxford) has been for some little time out of print, and sold at a premium on the regular price. A new edition being called for, it was decided to make it comparatively cheap, and the volume before us is not higher in price than similar American books. We have previously mentioned the name of the Rev. Mackenzie E. C. Walcott's "Sacred Archæology," and now mention it again after having seen it and given it a cursory examination. Our clerical readers will find it a book of considerable value. It is designed chiefly for the use of clergymen of the Church of England or that of Rome, but will be useful to readers and students of other denominations. It is a popular dictionary, containing information on every topic connected with churches and church worship. The author began its compilation years ago; whenever in his reading he found a term which he did not understand, he kept watch for an explanation of it, and the result is a mass of information, gathered from a hundred fields, and from which, doubtless, there is not a man in the world who might not learn many new things. As Mr. Walcott says, an interleaved copy of it, in two volumes, or as many as the owner might like, would furnish amusement and be of value; it is only by the gleanings of many hands that such books are made to approach completeness.

—To the almost innumerable collections of poetry, three have recently been added. One was compiled by Archbishop Trench, who has himself written verses showing at least cultivated poetical taste. His hand-book is as good as the average; it is to be regarded merely as a collection of pieces, and cannot take rank with such a volume as Palgrave's, which is an educator of the poetical capacity. Another volume is due to the labors of Frederick Locker, perhaps the very best English writer of vers de société since Praed, and, to our mind, at least the equal of that writer. His collection is made up of vers de société, and the task of giving a very full view of that field of poetry without admitting the indelicacies abundant there, and without omitting things necessary to the completeness of the view, he seems to us to have done very well indeed. A third book of like nature is one which, commendable as it is, would be liked better if it performed what it promises. The compiler is Emily Taylor, and the title of the book is "Memoirs of Some Contemporary Poets." The poets were all known to the compiler, either personally or through an intimacy with persons who were intimate with poets, and her preface promises that use shall be made of this fortunate circumstance. We do not see, however, that any hack writer, with the ordinary sources of information, could not have done all that is done in the biographical notices. The volume is worth having, because it contains poems by many respectable authors of late date, about whom it is worth while to know something, and who will, most of them, hardly be found in the regular cyclopædias of poetry. Such are Mrs. Barbauld, Miss Fanshawe, Sarah Flower Adams, William Roscoe, and Margaret, Mary Anne, Jane, Henry, William Stanley, and Robert Roscoe, a family which altogether ought to have produced a poem, but which we fear did not, either altogether or separately. The Baroness Nairn, who wrote so little, and everything that she did write wrote so well, is one of the chief figures in the book. Miss Taylor gives the latter part of Lady Nairn's "Land o' the Leal" in a form different from the usual one. The many lovers of the poem will perhaps thank us for giving the variation:

"Sae dear 's that joy was bought, John,
Sae free the battle fought, John.
That sinful man e'er brought
To the land o' the leal.

"Oh! dry your glistening ee, John,
My soul langs to be free, John,
And angels beckon me
To the land o' the leal.

"Oh! haud ye leal and true, John,
Your day it's wearin' thro', John,
An' I'll welcome you
To the land o' the leal.

"Now fare ye weel, my ain John,
This warld's cares are vain, John,
We 'll meet and aye be fain
In the land o' the leal."

Miss Taylor offers no proof that hers is the authentic reading. Few will think that the poem is not better in the commonly accepted version, which, for one thing, wholly wants the first three lines above given.

—The bad behavior of the undergraduates of Oxford on Commemoration days is in great part a conventional and arbitrary thing, and argues much less against the general character of the young men for gentlemanliness than some people think and say. The youth in the gallery who raises wild cries at the stranger in the white hat or grey coat, who makes remarks other than laudatory on the distinguished gentlemen who are up for doctorates, who interrupts the Vice-Chancellor, who shouts and hoots during the delivery of the Public Orator's addresses and of the prize poems and essays, is doing his duty by the "customs of the day" rather than indulging the taste for low barbarity with which he is yearly charged in the newspapers. This conduct is not nearly so horrifying as it is often made to appear; as, for instance, it is made to appear in a late defence (Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes) kindly volunteered by "An Honorary M.A." He represents himself as having conversed with certain foreigners who rejected summarily his excuses for the conduct of the undergraduates. "But you see," he told them, "these compositions (prize poems, etc.) are long, cannot be heard distinctly by all who are present, and become too tedious." To this the foreigners very properly cried "Shame! Shame!" The fact of the matter is, we suppose, that whether the compositions were long or short, whether the owner of the white hat were present or not, the traditions of the day would be kept up, and rather more strenuously each year, as long as the government suffered any degree of carnival or saturnalian license. We are not saying that the custom would not be vastly more honored in the breach than in the observance, but only that any given shouter and hooter is probably much less of a barbarian than the foreigner or the "Honorary M.A." who is the object of his attentions is apt to admit. To the question, Why the state of things is worse now than it was twenty or thirty years ago, various answers are given. Mr. Grant Duff has said that the devotion to athletic sports has assumed the dimensions of a national calamity, and it is held that great numbers of the students have entirely lost respect for literary pursuits and literary success, and feel no sympathy with the prize poet or essayist. It is said, too, that there has been "a gradual but conspicuous decay of discipline," and, as a prominent instance of this, is cited the appearance on the streets of young men arrayed "in those wonderful costumes which have been described as 'vestments,' and which would have driven a proctor of thirty years ago to commit suicide." "A very simple man" looking about for a remedy for the particular evil of which we have been speaking hits on this one, which we hope may be tried if the University authorities are unable, single-handed, to cope with the noisy minority. "Let," he says, "tickets be given to ladies only on condition that they will immediately leave the theatre on a signal from the Vice-Chancellor, to be given at his discretion." In this country we should probably put proctors or policemen in the gallery, and afterwards try a little expulsion of ringleaders from college.

—Under the operation of the new press law in France, new journals are daily springing up in the Departments as well as in Paris. We see the names of the Indépendant Remois, established at Rheims; of the Union Libérale, at Tours; the Libéral Bayonnais, at Bayonne; the Libéral de Seine-et-Oise, at Versailles; the Avenir Démocratique, at Lyons; and at Caen the Suffrage Universel.

ABORIGINAL AMERICAN MYTHOLOGY.*

The second volume of Professor Max Müller's "Chips from a German Workshop" opens with his elaborate dissertation on Comparative Mythology, which was published originally as one of the Oxford Essays, in 1856. It is not strictly true that from its first appearance "dates the origin of a new science;" but that essay certainly gave a new impetus to the "science of religion," and threw open to English students a large and interesting field which had previously been entered, somewhat timidly, only by German explorers. Following quickly upon the republication of Professor Müller's essay comes Dr. Brinton's "Treatise on the Symbolism and Mythology of the Red Race of America," which is, upon the whole, a substantial contribution to the science which the friend of Bunsen has done so much to develop. Dr. Brinton was already known to students of American archæology by his "Notes on the Floridian Peninsula; its Literary History, Indian Tribes, and Antiquities," published in 1859; but in the present work he enters a much wider field, and one which but few have explored with the same broad aims as those which have guided him. From a bibliographical note appended to the first chapter, which, by the way, might well have taken the place of the very brief and vague preface to the book, it appears that the list of those who preceded the author in the department of American mythology embraces only five or six names; and none of these offers us a satisfactory interpretation, or even an adequate report, of the facts which lay spread before them. Carl Knortz's "Tales and Legends of the North American Indians" (in German) was probably not yet published when this list was made out. In the comprehensiveness of his design, and perhaps in familiarity with the facts, Dr. Brinton is superior to all his predecessors; he is also quite thoroughly imbued with the scientific spirit; yet, for reasons which will come to view as we proceed, he has failed to do what he might have done for the anthropology of America.

* "The Myths of the New World: A Treatise on the Symbolism and Mythology of the Red Race of America. By Daniel G. Brinton, A.M., M.D., Member of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, etc., etc." New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.

"During the last fifty years," says Professor Müller, in the preface to his two volumes of essays, "the accumulation of new and authentic materials for the study of the religions of the world has been most extraordinary; but such are the difficulties in mastering these materials that I doubt whether the time has yet come for attempting to trace, after the model of the science of language, the definite outlines of the science of religion" (p. ix.) To trace definite outlines, either in the mythology or in the philology of the New World, is, as every one knows who has tried it, a peculiarly difficult task; and Dr. Brinton must not be condemned for eschewing it. The attempt would have been premature. There is, nevertheless, ground of complaint against our author in the fact that he has so little apprehended the importance of "definite outlines," and the desirableness of having in the mind's eye, in all such investigations as his, the largest possible scientific scheme. It is only thus that a collection of mixed materials can be transmuted into a valuable addition to the aggregate of our systematized knowledge. Perhaps it would be unfair to demand that he should have wrought with the framework of the "science of religion" before his mind; for it is a science which has not yet grown into definite form. There is more of it in Professor Müller's preface, already referred to, than anywhere else in English literature. But American ethnology is a department which has well-defined limits; and to this Dr. Brinton might have made an important contribution had he done his work with more of the scientific method. This, however, was not his aim. He simply proposes to "invest the fruitful theme of American ethnology with a more general interest," and announces distinctly, on page 82, that his "purpose in this work is not comparative mythology." We regret this; or, rather, we regret that the "comparative" element in some form has not been more largely introduced; that the search after relationships, by which so much has been accomplished in philology, has scarcely been attempted in the work before us. The consequence is that the book is chiefly an assemblage of facts grouped according to the author's fancy, interesting enough to the "thoughtful general reader" referred to in the preface, but serving the man of science simply as a directory, to show him what paths he must follow and where he must dig. Whether to the general reader or to the man of science, there is nothing more interesting than the discovery of relationships; and, while it is well enough to know "the fancies of the Sioux concerning thunder" (p. 151), and a hundred other fancies gleaned from a hundred authors, yet he who has once had his eyes opened to the existence of the "comparative" method will find himself, as he reads, constantly attempting to connect the strange legends or customs together, and at the same time to discriminate between them on some well-defined basis. The ethnological bearings of the American myths are of decidedly greater consequence, just now, than their philosophic or theological significance; and those would have been much more readily discerned had they been classified according to some ethnographic scheme. A comparison of the religious system of the Toltecs, for example, with that of the Incas on the one hand, and that of the Algonkin tribes on the other, would be more instructive, at once to the student and to the general reader, than a hundred myths culled indiscriminately from all the American tribes. But no such comparisons of system with system are to be found in Dr. Brinton's book.

These defects, however, exist side by side with characteristics which make the work, as we have said, a substantial contribution to modern science. No one can read it without perceiving that the author is familiar with the ground he has gone over, and has explored it with patient care. There is scarcely a page without foot-notes, and these, as well as the text, are of such a character as to leave no doubt respecting the author's extensive and accurate learning in his department, or the thoroughness of his method. The volume opens with a chapter of "general considerations on the red race," in which he discusses (1) the peculiarities of the American languages in their bearings upon American mythology, (2) the isolation of the red race, and (3) its predatory character, insisting that it is beyond all others a hunting race. This is followed by a brief but excellent ethnography, on the basis of language, describing the various families of the race as they existed at the date of the discovery; and some opinions are ventured, in conclusion, respecting the course of the American migrations, the age of man in America, and the unity of the red race. The proper subject of the book is entered upon in the second chapter, which is devoted to "the idea of God." Then follow in succession, and without a very obvious plan, chapters on the sacred number; the symbols of the bird and the serpent; the myths of water, fire, and the thunder-storm; the supreme gods of the red race; the myths of the creation and the deluge; the origin of man, the soul and its destiny, and the native priesthood. The last chapter discusses "the influence of the native religions on the moral and social life of the race." When we consider the vastness of the subject, and its inherent difficulties—resulting from the diversity of languages, the want of native literatures, the uniqueness of the race, and the prehistoric character of the materials employed—we cannot do otherwise than accord high praise to the author for diligent research, discriminating criticism, good sense, and, we may add, a large charity. He has placed before the American public what ought to interest them more deeply in the original American race than the entire bulk of "Lo-the-poor-Indian" poetry, with the Leather Stocking tales thrown in.

In each of these chapters Dr. Brinton has overthrown some too hasty generalization, dissipated some false impression, or shown the emptiness of some misrepresentation which, by virtue of its antiquity, had become quite respectable, and in one or two of them he has given us something valuable in the way of hypothesis and interpretation. He seems to have proved, for instance, that there was not in any of the American religions a conscious monotheism, and, on the other hand, that there was no well defined dualism, the numerous assertions to the contrary notwithstanding. He also denies the existence of any genuine phallic worship in America, and reduces to the lowest point the ethical significance of the "serpent symbol," to which Mr. Squier has devoted a book. He recognizes in the flood-myths simply "an unconscious attempt to reconcile a creation in time with the eternity of matter." He credits the Indians with a firm belief in the resurrection of the dead. He establishes the mythical import of many names, local and personal, which have commonly been supposed to be historical; and, in reply to the assertion of Waitz, in his "Anthropologie," that "no natural religion appears to have been able to develop from a germ within itself anything whatever of real advantage to civilization," he points to the Toltecs, the Peruvians, and the Mayas, insisting that their advancement must be attributed not to the influence of heroes and great men—for these have only a mythical existence—but to the dominance of certain noble ideas among them, which found embodiment in their supreme divinities—in Quetzalcoatl in Mexico, Zamna in Yucatan, and Viracocha in Peru. It is certainly to the credit of uninstructed human nature that it should have given expression to such a prayer as that to Viracocha, reproduced on page 298:

"O Pachacamac, thou who hast existed from the beginning and shalt exist unto the end, powerful and pitiful; who createdst man by saying, Let man be; who defendest us from evil and preservest our life and health; art thou in the sky or in the earth? in the clouds or in the depths? Hear the voice of him who implores thee, and grant him his petitions. Give us life everlasting, preserve us, and accept this our sacrifice."

A prominent place is given in the volume to the sacred number four, because of the prominence of this number "in the religions of the red race. This is so marked and so universal," says the author, "that at a very early period in my studies I felt convinced that if the reason for its adoption could be discovered, much of the apparent confusion which reigns among them would be dispelled. Such a reason must take its rise from some essential relation of man to nature, everywhere prominent, everywhere the same. It is found in the adoration of the cardinal points." He proceeds to establish his interpretation by reference to the inevitable presence of four cardinal points in our conceptions of the natural world, and the importance of such points to a race of hunters. From this one discussion a very fair idea of the author's method may be derived—which is the method of the rational school of mythologists, in distinction from the symbolical. "Some essential relation of man to nature" lies at the basis of every myth, and finds expression therein. He applies this principle throughout—to the solution of the myths of water and fire, the myths of the creation and the deluge, and the myths concerning the origin and the destiny of man.

But the most interesting example of this method, and that which reminds us most forcibly of Professor Müller in his famous essay, is in the sixth chapter, which treats of the "supreme gods of the red race." The myths to which we refer are those relating to Michabo, the chief deity of the Algonkin tribes. His name has commonly been taken to mean the Great Rabbit, and has served as a proof that the red men worshipped brutes. But Dr. Brinton informs us that the root wab, which appears under all the variations of this name, means not only "rabbit" but "white"—in other words, that there are two distinct roots having this same form, and that from one of the two are derived the Algonkin words for the light, the dawn, the morning, the day, and the east. He therefore translates Michabo, "the Great Light," and its synonym, Manibozho, "the Spirit of Light, or of the morning"; and at once the stories in which Michabo is the central figure receive a natural and beautiful solution. We can see at once why he is the grandson of the moon, why his father is the West Wind, and why his mother is a maiden who dies in giving him birth.

"For the moon is the goddess of night, the dawn is her daughter, who brings forth the morning, and perishes herself in the act, and the West—the spirit of darkness, as the East is of light—precedes and begets the latter as the evening does the morning. Straightway, however, continues the legend, the son sought the unnatural father to revenge the death of his mother, and then commenced a long and desperate struggle. 'It began on the mountains. The West was forced to give ground. Manibozho drove him across rivers and over mountains and lakes, and at last he came to the brink of this world. "Hold," cried he, "my son, you know my power, and that it is impossible to kill me."' What is this but the diurnal combat of light and darkness, carried on from what time 'the jocund morn stands tiptoe on the misty mountain-tops,' across the wide world to the sunset—the struggle which knows no end, for both the opponents [combatants?] are immortal" (pp. 166, 167).

How natural and how instructive the comparison of such legends as this with the very different, yet strikingly similar, legends of the ancient Greek and Sanskrit mythologies!

We hope, in conclusion, that this interesting and handsome book will do much to popularize the study of American ethnology. The red race, not as it appears in Cooper's novels and in the poetry already referred to, but as seen through scientific eyes, ought certainly to engage, to a larger extent than hitherto, the thoughts and the labors of American students, and indeed of the American people. Our past relations to that race, however we may estimate our dealings in the light of the moral law, have been such as should impose upon our consciences a duty of commemoration. Our fathers slew them, and the least that we can do is to build their sepulchres. But apart from this, we cannot learn too soon, or believe too fully, the sentiment expressed so long ago in the house of a gentile centurion, that "God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him." It is some such doctrine as this which lies at the foundation of all true democracy.

DE TROBRIAND'S "ARMY OF THE POTOMAC."*

It is not too much to say that it is fortunate for the people of the United States that General de Trobriand accepted a commission in their army in the late war. He did good service in the field, and the merit of his services was recognized. He was promoted to the grade of brigadier-general and brevet major-general in the volunteer service, and, when the war was over, he received the further reward of a commission as colonel of the Thirty-First Regiment of infantry in the regular army. But, good soldier as he was, he has done more for the country since peace was declared than he had done before. He possessed a rare combination of qualities fitting him to report us and our cause aright in Europe, and he has used them admirably. A Frenchman by birth and education, he came to this country in early manhood, and made it his home. He is a man of character, intelligence, and culture—a man of observation and of conduct. He served almost all through the war of secession, and he often found time to make minutes of events as they were occurring.

The scholar has recorded what the soldier saw, and the record makes a very excellent and interesting book; but its value is immensely enhanced by the fact that it is written in French by a Frenchman who speaks of what he knows, and published in France by a Frenchman of sufficient military rank to make it likely that his book will attract attention. Its merits are such that, if it is begun, it will be finished. Thus, the character of the composition, the language in which it is written, and the rank of the author unite to promise for these volumes an extensive European circulation. It is just such a book as it is good for us to have foreigners read. The author is thoroughly sound in his political opinions, as here expressed, and warmly in sympathy with the anti-slavery character of the late struggle. He is well informed as to the course of events which preceded and led to the secession of the South, and he begins his book with a very clear, satisfactory, and succinct statement of them. He is a man of sense; and while he is clear-sighted enough to perceive the defects existing in the state of things among us, and especially in military matters, and is honest enough to mention them, yet he is equally able and always ready to suggest such explanation and apology for them as the case may admit. He was a studious soldier as well as a gallant man, and his account of the organization of our army is accurate and ample. He had large experience in different positions, from that of colonel of a regiment to that of division commander, and his term of service extended almost continuously from the first summer of the war to Lee's surrender.

Having given, in his first three chapters, an account of the causes of the war, and of the manner of its commencement, and a sketch of its earlier events, the author proceeds, in the fourth chapter, to describe the transformation of the "Gardes Lafayette," a French regiment of New York militia, into the 55th Regiment of New York volunteers, a three-years regiment in the service of the United States. At midsummer of the year 1861 Mr. de Trobriand was elected colonel of the regiment, and on the 31st of August he set out with it for Washington. In this and the three following chapters he tells the story of the movement of the regiment to Washington, its arrival there and establishment in the neighborhood, and of the leading features of that first winter of the war. He tells it with a truth and spirit which will be acknowledged by all who were then in service. The passage of the troops through Philadelphia and Baltimore, the indifference with which they were received in Washington, so strongly contrasted with the enthusiasm that attended their departure, the vast floored barrack at the railway terminus in which they passed their first night there, the pitching of their camp, their experiences with the rain, wind, and mud of the South, the inspections and reviews, the improvement of the army and growth of the defences of Washington, pay-days and court-martials, presentations of colors, visits to the camp of Mr. Lincoln and the French princes, the surging to and fro in the city of the great wave of speculators, contractors, and intriguers, the crowds of uniforms in the hotels, the popularity of the South with the residents of Washington and the corps diplomatique, the enthusiasm for McClellan—all these and many other things are recorded or referred to by the author in a way which will awaken a thousand recollections among those who were in or near Washington that year. The remainder of the first volume is occupied with an account of the experiences of the Army of the Potomac and of the Army of Virginia until General McClellan was relieved from his command and succeeded by General Burnside. Colonel de Trobriand was present with his regiment at the battle of Williamsburg, but a fever kept him from taking part in the other battles of the Peninsular campaign, and his ccommand was not present in the battles of Pope nor in the Maryland campaign.

* "Quatre Ans de Campagnes à l'Armée du Potomac. Par Régis de Trobriand, ex-Major-Général au Service Volontaire, et Colonel au Service Régulier des Etats-Unis d'Amérique." Paris: Librairie Internationale, 15 Boulevard Montmartre, au coin de la Rue Vivienne. A. Lacroix, Verboeckhoven et Cie, Editeurs, à Bruxelles, à Leipzig, et à Livourne. 1867. [For sale by F. W. Christern, 863 Broadway, New York; price $4.]

In the second volume the author describes the battle of Fredericksburg, of which he saw the movement on the left under Franklin; the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, in each of which he took an active part; the brilliant affair of Kelly's Ford, in November, 1863, in which he commanded a brigade, forced the passage of the river, and carried the position of the enemy beyond, while Sedgwick, higher up, was storming their works at Rappahannock station; and all that he saw of the campaign which commenced with the passage of the Rapidan and the battle of the Wilderness, in May, 1864, and ended with the surrender of Lee on the 9th of April, 1865. Besides, he gives a very satisfactory account of the part of the campaign which he did not see, and completes the story by a sufficient statement of what was going on meanwhile in other parts of the theatre of war, and of all the important events, political and other, of the time.

The book is charming because the author is competent to tell what he saw, and saw what he undertakes to tell. Many newspaper correspondents wrote most picturesque accounts of battles, but they either did not see these same battles at all, or saw them from a distance. But here we have the work of a man who was in the thick of the fighting. He commanded a regiment until June, 1863, and he commanded a brigade until three days before Lee's surrender. Thus he had rank enough to give him a good chance to see what was going on when his own command was not engaged, and yet not rank enough to keep him apart from the very smoke and dust and blood of the combat. His descriptions have often the reality of a dream. A man who made the Peninsular campaign will feel, in reading his account of Williamsburg, as if he were fighting the battle over again, and one who had the fever there will find the whole of that dismal time reproduced—the low ground, the flies, the luxuriant vegetation, the wet and swamps, the cry of the whippoorwill, the glistening of the beautiful woods when the Southern sun shone on them wet with Southern rain, the loneliness when the troops moved away and left the hospitals, the magical change by which solitude and silence succeeded in a moment the crowd and hum of an encampment which numbered more grown men than are to be found in a great city

His accounts of the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg deserve especial praise. The former gives a better idea of the confused character of fighting in a wooded, broken country, especially at night, than most writers have been able to convey, and one reads the account of the night attack made by Birney's division with almost matchless interest. Such sentences as "Plus on approchait, et plus on voyait les baïonnettes du premier rang s'abaisser en décrivant un arc de cercle," make one feel that what he is reading is the real thing, and not a make-believe. The latter is valuable for the clear and spirited description which it contains of the severe struggle in which Sickles was forced back from the advanced position at Gettysburg, which he had imperilled the whole army by taking.

These volumes are enlivened by criticisms upon many prominent officers, and by many interesting anecdotes. The author is very severe upon McClellan, both as a soldier and as a man. His condemnation is well-founded, but it is none the less true that our armies fared better under him than under Burnside, Hooker, or Pope, and, as he is no longer either a soldier or a candidate for office, we can afford to be to his faults a little blind, and to remember that it was under his leadership that we took the first lessons in the art of which we now see he was not an able exemplar. Moreover, the character of General McClellan's corps commanders must never be forgotten when his failures are discussed. Two of them amounted to nothing, and passed into obscurity early in the war; another was cashiered; another, who had probably more ability than all the rest put together, was never fortunate. The fifth carried the dash and recklessness which might have been in place at the head of his cavalry regiment to the command of a magnificent corps, and shipwrecked one of its divisions at the Antietam by his headlong manner of putting it into action, and his disregard of the information and suggestions offered to him by one of Mansfield's division commanders, who had been on the field some hours before him. General de Trobriand tells a story about the evacuation by the enemy of the right of their lines at Yorktown, his reporting the facts to the corps commander, and the neglect with which his report was treated, which affords an apt illustration of what we are saying. He adds the neat remark: "La ville prise, c'était un victoire; la ville évacuée, ce n'était qu'une déception."

It is delightful to read the epigrammatic sentences in which the appearance and manners and character of various officers, or classes of officers, are mentioned. The sketches of Blenker, Stoneman, and French are good sketches of men whose names were more widely known than their merits deserved. Those of Hooker and Hancock give an excellent idea of the strength and the weaknesses of each. The brief mention of General Seth Williams does justice to the sterling merit of that most excellent and much regretted officer, and the gallery is enriched by an excellent portrait of Humphreys, who was probably, when the war ended, the best corps commander in the service of the United States. There are many light touches also, which are agreeable and illustrative, as when we are told how a general passes by, in the lines of a battle, with a cigar in his mouth and his horse at a walk, and tells an officer, loud enough for all the men around to hear him, that everything is going well. The telegram received by a private individual at Fort Monroe, on the 30th June, 1862, from the Secretary of War, and printed here—"Is the enemy at White House? And if not, where are they?—Stanton"—is a vivid reminder of those days of doubt and alarm.

We found next to nothing in these books to find fault with. As a rule, almost without exception, matter and manner were alike satisfactory. The first volume is a little wanting in military incident, but the reason of it is that circumstances permitted the author to be present but seldom in the engagements of the first eighteen months of the war. The remarks on the first Bull Run battle do not show much study of the best accounts of it. We are sorry to see that the author defends the practice of picket-firing; but so he does, and he alleges the usual arguments in favor of it. Two or three times, moreover, there peep out indications of a peculiar character, whether individual or national it is not easy to tell. Thus, on the day after the battle of Williamsburg, he visits a hospital, out of mere curiosity, finds a Southerner of seventeen years, "almost a child, with blue eyes and long light hair, whose leg has just been taken off above the knee, asks him his age, and why he enlisted, and on being told, "Pour défendre mon état contre ses ennemis," replies, "Dites pour rompre l'Union au profit de vos meneurs d'esclaves." In the same hospital he heard many of the sufferers asking for water. The surgeons had only one man to help them, and he was busy burying the amputated limbs. As Colonel de Trobriand, having finished his visit of curiosity, is leaving the hospital, he meets this man, and we quote: "'Sam,' lui dis-je, 'si vous êtes un bon homme, allez tout de suite au puits chercher de l'eau pour les blessés qui ont grand soif.' C'était tout ce que je pouvais faire pour eux." The oddest example of all shall close our notice. The author tells the story of two men, the term of service of whose regiment had expired, and who were to return with it to their homes the following day. Believing that their speedy departure would make identification impossible, they offered violence to a woman in the neighborhood. They were arrested, tried, found guilty, sentenced to death, and hung. The author says: "Je ne dis pas que ce ne fût d'un bon exemple; mais le temps de service expiré, à la veille de revoir les siens . . . c'est dur."

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW FOR JULY.

WHAT with Sterne, Dryden, Frere, Curtis, and the book reviews, the literary element rather predominates in this number of the North American. The article on Sterne is by Mr. Adams Hill, who has got up his facts as industriously as he did for his essays on Lamb and Swift. As in the case of those authors, so in this, he undertakes to set aside the common opinion in regard to his subject, and, as happened to him before, he fails. Doubt, generally, is the mother of knowledge, and the frame of mind in which he examined the evidence as to Sterne's character was probably the best frame of mind in which to undertake the task of satisfying himself in the matter. But in specific instances Doubt often makes no addition at all to the family; Mr. Hill offers nothing that should have convinced his own mind that Sterne was not what he was held to be; unless, indeed, he formerly entertained an opinion of him considerably worse than the one that has prevailed among ordinarily intelligent students and critics. We, for our part, find it hard to see how anybody can read two pages of Sterne together and think of him as sincere. He himself pretty well describes, under a figure, his own method with his readers—and by implication pretty well describes himself—when he tells of the man who poured sentiment over the dead ass: "He then took his crust of bread out of his wallet again, as if to eat it, held it some time in his hand, then laid it upon the bit of his ass's bridle," and finally "looked wistfully at the little arrangement he had made, and then gave a sigh." We are bold to say that we have not very much confidence in the man's power of appreciative criticism who does not everywhere in Sterne's letters and other works find proof that he was as insincere, untrustworthy, and humbugging as he was clever. It is futile work to say that he was not, and then leave such an assertion unsupported by any new facts or any new light on the old. We find no new ones and no new light in Mr. Hill's article, and there are too many things like this: "Mr. Thackeray's sketch in one of the 'Roundabout Papers' is purely fanciful: 'Yonder lean, shambling, cadaverous lad who is always borrowing money and leering at the housemaids is Master Laurence Sterne,'" etc. But by-and-by, on the next page even, Mr. Hill quotes from an autobiographic description, which shows us "a pale face," "spider legs," and "a cadaverous bale of goods for a body," and what any good biography would tell us concerning the housemaids or their equivalents would easily be enough to make Thackeray's sketch, as a whole, seem not "purely fanciful," nor fanciful at all. Good painting such a sketch would seem, we imagine, however bad it might seem as whitewashing. It is a principal objection to these attempts to reverse well-established decisions that the writer who seeks the reversal is very apt indeed to do great injustice to many estimable witnesses, whose characters, quite as much as that of the prisoner at the bar, are worthy of consideration. And, of course, the writer's own tone during the process is in great danger of being displeasing.

A better article by Mr. Hill, calmer in tone and in every way more satisfactory, is his sensible account of the "Chicago Convention." Very good reading, too, is Mr. Simon Newcomb's article on "Meteoric Showers." It is only within a year, it appears, that there has been an adequate and well accepted theory of the phenomena in question, and this Mr. Newcomb sets forth plainly. Clearness is also to be predicated of the account of "The Lumber Region of Michigan," by Mr. C. H. Brigham. It is only in this country that such an article could have been written. It is a story of the immense natural resources of a virgin region seized upon by the pioneers of civilization—a picture of the substitution within a few years of the college and the steam-reaped wheat-field for the primeval forest and the huts of savages.

Longer or more important unliterary articles than these just mentioned are one on "Liberal Education," by Mr. John Fiske, and one on "The Religious Reform Movement in Italy," by Mr. H. C. Lea. Mr. Lea is not an unfriendly critic of an ideal Catholicism, but as regards the actual Catholicism of Italy, as it exhibits itself in the lives of the priestly class, in the government of the Papal dominions, in the attitude of Pius IX. and his trusted advisers towards every phase of what enlightened non-Catholics have agreed to call progress, he is severely critical, and apparently he is quite hopeless of better things evolved from within and not forced from without. He will no doubt be attacked for what he has said on these and other points, and we promise to keep our readers advised of any successes obtained against him. The whole matter becomes interesting in the light of the fact, not so well known as it ought to be, that the Church in this country (and here it wears a pleasing show of liberality and of consonance with our American ideas of liberty and the purity of religion) is increasing greatly in the number of its communicants and laying foundations of power. Speaking of the General Council which is to meet in November next, Mr. Lea expresses an opinion opposed to that of some observers, and believes that the Council will do nothing more than register Papal decrees, and that it is idle from the assembled prelates to hope for anything but slavish subserviency to the Holy Father. We suppose this is most likely true; still a crowd sometimes develops a very different spirit from that of the individual members composing it, and it is not impossible that the bishops may refuse to part with the last vestiges of their independence, and that the Pope's reluctance to call a council may be proved to have been well founded. Mr. Lea's article is throughout instructive and readable. Before leaving it we may be allowed to quote a becoming jest which Mr. Lea reports as having been made by the pious Monseigneur Dupanloup when he was told of the slaughter of the Garibaldians. "It was necessary," said he, "that blood should flow, 'Transtulit illos per mare rubrum.'" It is no wonder, after that, that ungodly men wanted the chassepot beatified into Saint Chassepot, and no wonder that Bishop Dupanloup is much loved by persons "outside the pale."

The subject of Mr. Fiske's article is the book of "Essays on a Liberal Education," edited by Mr. F. W. Farrar, which during the past year has, with an almost countless number of similar books, been making so much stir in England. We see everything to commend in the article, and while we do not look—it would be vain, we suppose, to look—that the bigoted devotees of classicism or the, if possible, still more bigoted devotees of "useful" and "scientific" education should agree with it, we are mistaken if its conclusions will not be soon everywhere received by all sensible thinkers on the subject as sound in theory, and practical enough to go to work on immediately wherever there is opportunity to carry them into effect.

Readers who read with pleasure Mr. Howells's recent remarks on Longfellow will find in his "George William Curtis" a companion piece which elegantly pays the tribute that none of us feel like withholding from one of the most graceful and agreeable literary friends that any American can find among his countrymen. Mr. Curtis, as a sentimental writer and as a satirist, is well remembered by Mr. Howells, who then proceeds to consider him as a moralist. He is chiefly the latter, his critic thinks. Only to his contemporaries we should say—we ourselves being much of the mind of Mr. Howells's friend—who, whenever he has a present to make, gives away "Prue and I"—and thinking Curtis's best literary claim to continued remembrance and liking to be his work as a sentimental essayist. He has other than literary claims, as no one will forget who remembers his political value in the services which his weekly paper renders to the cause of decent government, and his services in his magazine—it is his in a higher sense than any one's else—to the cause of the civilization of the country.

Mr. Norton revives for us John Hookham Frere, a man of the sort that Emerson somewhere speaks of as commonly to be met in England—men who have seen everything, who know everything, who can do everything, and who keep quiet about it all. Frere was a statesman, a scholar, a wit, a man of genius, the author of literary performances which plainly reveal his culture and abilities, and yet one whose fastidiousness and reserve and carelessness of applause have resulted in his being forgotten, or recollected chiefly as the respected friend of Scott and Byron and the other intellectual magnates of his time. The breed is not yet extinct in England. That we may have it here, and the scholarly culture and the unvulgarity that its existence presupposes, is a thing to be desired, and the article we are speaking of will help on a consummation so much to be wished. It is to be hoped some one of our publishers may be disposed to act on Mr. Norton's recommendation, and give to the better class of readers the now unobtainable works of the best of English translators, one of the best of English humorists, one of the most elegant and acute of English scholars, and an excellent poet.

Mr. Lowell writes of Dryden, making, after all that has been said of "glorious John," much the best essay on the poet that has yet been written. Whatever critic, or student of English literature, or of literature in general, or indeed of human nature in general, does not read it is unfair to himself. We say "human nature in general," thinking of the often repeated words (somewhat indefinite) of an extremely enthusiastic admirer of Lowell's—"the most Shakespearian man since Shakespeare"—words which, we take it, refer to the younger poet's insight by sympathy into any and every phase of character brought under his eye. We do not know if he is unequalled in this power since Shakespeare—though the name of a disputant for so much honor does not now occur to us, certainly not the name of a disputant who joins Lowell's power of expression and certain other powers of his with his eye for character. Fitz-Adam, Parson Wilbur, Mr. Sawin, will at once occur to the reader as examples of this faculty in the creative mood; but perhaps in the "Rousseau," the "Shakespeare," and by flashes in all the other essays we see it in equally, if not in more satisfactory exercise. But the tail end of a short article is not the place to treat of this subject. As for the "Dryden," we do not feel that we have any additions to it to offer, nor any exceptions to take, nor any subtractions to suggest, and will only repeat our advice to people to go and read it.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. | |
|---|---|---|
| Bartlett (J.), Familiar Quotations, 5th ed | (Little, Brown & Co.) | $3 00 |
| Collyer (Rev. R.), A Man in Earnest, Life of A. H. Conant | (H. B. Fuller) | |
| De Lesdernier (Mme. de), Headland Home, a Tale | (James Miller) | |
| Dickens (C.), Tale of Two Cities, and Great Expectations | (Ticknor & Fields) | 1 50 |
| Littell's Living Age, Vol. IX | (Littell & Gay) | |
| National Academy of Design, Exhibition of 1868 | (D. Appleton & Co.) | |
| Pollard (E. A.), The Lost Cause Regained | (G. W. Carleton & Co.) | |
| Punshon (Rev. W. M.), The Prodigal Son, swd | (Roberts Bros.) | |
| Rebellion Record, Part LXXIII. and last, swd | (D. Van Nostrand) | 0 60 |
| Table-talk and Opinions of Napoleon Bonaparte | (Roberts Bros.) | |
| The Art-Journal, July, swd | (Virtue & Yorston) | 1 50 |
| The Workshop, No. 6, swd | (E. Steiger) | 0 50 |

Fine Arts.

THE FINE ARTS OF JAPAN.

III.

If the present or late Shogoon [Tycoon] is to be the last of those powerful deputies, and the awakened imperial power is to take the place among sovereignties which the military leadership or mayorship of the palace has long assumed, the government of the Shogoons may be remembered as contemporaneous with the great time of Japanese art. The vigorous and independent art which we have tried to describe took its beginning after the first Shogoon, Taiko-Sama, as his name is generally given, had established his derived, but nearly absolute, executive office, and made it hereditary in his own family. And now that his successor has abdicated and the West is finding out that it must revise its treaties made during fifteen years with "his Majesty the Tycoon of Japan," the fine arts of Japan also are abandoning their thrones. The art of China is dead; still they paint porcelain and carve ivory, with dim recollections of bygone splendors, but the old and good art is gone, and can never come again. The art of Japan is deteriorating, and a few years more of intercourse with Europeans will finish it. The decorative arts of an Eastern people cannot bear the evil effect of the European market; Chinese art has died of the demand for dinner sets, backgammon boards, work-boxes, and chessmen for exportation; and Japanese art is moribund now that Mr. Vantine can sell two or three hundred thousand fans a year, with glove-boxes and teapots in proportion. The workmen who have the exceptional skill required for the finest work, to whom have descended those secrets of workmanship and that familiarity with design which we find so extraordinary, will not continue to do fine work when cheap articles of sale have begun to pay well. When Shanghai was opened for trade, delicate inlaid work was to be bought there; one large, round table we know of which was bought for eighteen silver dollars; similar work bought there now at four times the price is very inferior in design and in workmanship. So a bronze vessel of exquisite finish which cost forty silver dollars in Nagasaki a few years ago, a French bronze-worker would not attempt to reproduce for less than six hundred francs. The native workmen hear of European prices, and there is every probability that the Japanese founders and engravers who did this wonderful piece of work are now engaged in making the common silver-inlaid bronze vases and candlesticks of poor workmanship and no particular design for the European market.

There is this one thing to be said on the other side, this one reason to hope. The princes and rich men of Japan are asserted to be great lovers and collectors of their countrymen's handiwork. It is known that pieces of ancient and rare porcelain and lacquer bring enormous prices in Japan, and that such gems remaining in Europe from the time of free intercourse, two hundred years ago, have been re-exported to Japan of late years, and sold there at higher prices than it was thought they would have fetched in Paris. But from this connoisseur spirit not much good can be expected to come beyond the mere preservation of the good art which already exists. Paris has been showing a lively taste for Japanese curiosities these three years past, and gives great prices for rarities, and has established manufactures of clever enough imitations, but this furore can do nothing to save the fine art of Japan from speedy decay; nor does it seem probable that the better informed native connoisseurship will be able to do more.

This art of Japan, which was born, as we think, and which is dying with the government of the Shogoon, finds its highest development in, and is represented by, those works of the great Oksai of which we have spoken in a former paper. It cannot be supposed that this art actually began with his labors; his drawing is too perfect, his conception of his subjects too firm and vigorous, for that to be the case; no such knowledge and skill as his have ever in the history of art been gained by the unaided and original efforts of one man. But it is no less evident that he brought it to its highest point of development, and that, as regards all Japanese art since his death, he may be considered the founder and originator from which all has come. Just as Giotto created the types for Italian art, and, though basing his work upon that of his predecessors, may yet be said to have painted the first Deposition, the first Death of the Virgin, and the first Salutation, which all subsequent art took as inviolable precedents, so Oksai settled it for ever how to represent humanity in its daily life, in war, and in worship; how to describe, in line and color, the wild superstitions of his countrymen, and how to picture the plants and animals of his own land, and those of which strange stories were brought by travellers. It would be of the greatest interest if we could learn what his own handiwork was like, what sort of touch and handling was his, and what his full chord of color. But we only know him by his drawing, and by his characteristic treatment of the subject of his art.

It is of this that we propose to speak: the common subjects of Japanese art, and the treatment of them by the Japanese artists, especially by Oksai. And first of the subjects of mythology and legend, magic and apparitions. There occur frequently figures of seated gods or demi-gods, around whom are priests or worshippers, not very reverential in manner, nor at all bowed down with awe, but going through with formal ceremonies of worship. In one large picture covering two pages, a rocky sea-coast is shown; on a high crag is placed a seated, cross-legged figure, dignified and calm, possibly a statue, but we think the god himself in unruffled meditation. Squatted close by the water's edge are two priests, one of whom holds in his left hand a staff with an ornamental head, with rings in it, as if to clash or rattle together, and in his right hand, high above his head, a black dish. From the dish issues a dense cloud of black smoke, which grows larger and spreads irregularly, and half emergent from the smoke is a portentous green dragon, not large, nor bigger than an alligator, but of splendid ferocity of aspect, and certainly large to have come out of a basin, like Pharoah's serpents from their little cones of cyanide of mercury. The other priest has filled a bowl with sea water, which he tosses up and scatters about, looking intently at the monster in the cloud. Now, both these incidents—the cloud-born dragon issuing from a bowl, and the tossing up of water as an offering—occur again and again in the pictures; and, for the dragon, beasts of his kind with the same admirably fierce head and action, and like him wrapped in cloud, are a large part of the paraphernalia of the Japanese mythology. In one impressive picture a priest is waving a sort of flag or pennon; a dense black cloud or vapor-like smoke drives full in his face, with a furious wind before which the trees bend and rock, and in the cloud comes a beast vastly larger than the other, terrible and savage-looking, but not seemingly meaning mischief. Indeed, these celestial serpents seem to come in answer to prayer, and as guardians; and a picture exists, which we have not seen, representing a lady who goes safely through the sea, protected by this formidable friend, though assailed by all the monsters of the deep.

Beside the stately god who sits on the rocks by the sea, and who appears now and then in other situations, we find other divinities. One, like a man of stalwart form, with two curved and sharp-pointed horns upon his head, sits staring at his priests with a fierce look which they seem to return. It must be noticed that this ferocity of aspect seems to be inseparable from the ideas of the Japanese of dignity and manly virtue, and is one of the worst blemishes upon their art. This being with the horns may be identical with the god of agriculture whom Koempfer speaks of, who was a fabulous Emperor of China about three thousand years before the time of Christ, and who taught the people to till the ground. Another god rides through the clouds seated on a great fish like a perch; it is not winged, but seems borne up by the clouds which half conceal it. This is a favorite subject; we find it twice in the Oksai series, and again on the first page of a volume by another celebrated artist, named Boun-Tujo; again, in low relief, upon a bronze bell, eighteen inches high, a very interesting work, and again in gold lacquer, moulded solid, and raised from the top of a splendid tortoise-shell box. Another favorite deity is a fair-faced woman, who appears among clouds, with folded arms and downcast eyes, heavily draped, a scarf flying out like a halo around her head, and her head and whole body emitting powerful rays of light. Her worshippers wave burning torches in her honor, and it seems that they scale mountain heights to reach her abode, for they are always standing on jagged pinnacles of rock. This subject occurs often; we have it in a colored picture by Oksai, again chased upon the cover of a silver box, and, on a large scale, and with splendid details of costume, painted upon a plaque or disk of porcelain. It is probably the same goddess who appears riding upon a dragon, very different in appearance from the awful creatures described above; when the goddess appears in this way it is always as a giver of gifts. She may be identified with the Japanese Eve, so to speak, or mother of their race, whom Koempfer calls Isanami. The god whose picture occurs the most frequently is a wonderfully corpulent personage with drooping ears, his face wearing a good-natured leer, and little other expression; he is generally cross-legged and nearly naked, and in this way is constantly represented in bronze; there is a statue of him now at Mr. Fountain's store. There are some things about him and his worship which go to prove him the husband of the lady last named, and the Adam of the Japs, Isagani Mikotto by name, according to old Koempfer. There is another divinity whose image we find given in one way only—engraved or in relief upon a huge bell. The bell we spoke of above is in New York, in all its bronze solidity; but this one we see in pictures, hung high and surrounded by priests, mounted on a car and dragged by strength of men; it is represented as ten feet high or so, and bearing always the figure of this god, whose appearance is not otherwise remarkable.

In a very splendid colored drawing, probably of great antiquity, and undoubtedly of a time before Oksai, a god comes down upon a rolling cloud, to visit, in a dream, his sleeping protégée. That incident we do not find in any of the recent work. But another curious part of the old drawing is known to modern art as well—the thunder demon, who, in a black cloud, and surrounded by a ring of little drums, rolls out his alarum. He is a fiery red and deformed man, and his aspect is particularly malicious. Evidently the Japanese have no liking for thunder, nor belief in any beneficial influence from it. In one of the Oksai books appears also a lightning fiend, he also vermilion red, without the drums, and seated on a black cloud, from which red, forked lightnings blaze in every direction. It seems that the Japanese do not suppose the thunderbolt an attribute of their Zeus or father of gods and men, but hand that weapon over to a subordinate and evil-disposed fiend, or two such—

> "Of middle air the demons proud,
> Who ride upon the racking cloud."

But when we leave the great gods, and get to the "Demonology and Witchcraft" of the Japanese, a new and interesting subject opens up, which we must defer until another time.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED.

HEADLAND HOME;

OR,

A SOUL'S PILGRIMAGE.

By MADAME DE LESDERNIER.

Price $1 50.

Sent free on receipt of price.

JAMES MILLER, Publisher,
647 Broadway.

American Method for Piano.

By EDGAR A. ROBBINS.

This work combines harmony with those indispensable points recommended by all eminent masters for daily practice, and imparts a knowledge of the art of understanding and executing the difficulties involved in the piano music of all the various schools. Price $4 50. Mailed post-paid.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers,
277 Washington Street, Boston.
CHARLES H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY
OF
HORACE GREELEY.

PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENT.

The undersigned have nearly ready, and are about to issue, by subscription,

HORACE GREELEY'S

"RECOLLECTIONS OF A BUSY LIFE,"

in a handsome octavo volume of over 600 pages, well printed on fine paper, illustrated with an admirable steel portrait of Mr. Greeley, and with pictures of his various homes in early and later life, together with a beautiful portrait of Margaret Fuller, engraved by Linton. Originally published in the New York Ledger, these interesting papers have been revised, and in part rewritten, by the author, with much additional matter, concerning Politics, Reconstruction, Jefferson Davis, etc., which make it one of the raciest and most readable books of the day.

Mr. Greeley has said of it: "I shall never write anything else into which I shall put so much of myself, my experiences, notions, convictions, and modes of thought, as these Recollections. I give, with small reserve, my mental history."

The book embraces views of early New England settlement, the author's own youthful life, education, apprenticeship, adventures, professional and political reminiscences, experience in Congress, newspaper life in New York, and much useful talk about farms and farming. It is a peculiarly entertaining and valuable work—a look behind the scenes during an important period of the country's history.

Price, in extra cloth, $3 50; in sheep, $4 50; in half morocco, $5.

Applications for Agencies received.

Exclusive Territory given.

J. B. FORD & CO.,
164 Nassau St., Printing-House Square, New York.

THE MECHANIC'S TOOL-BOOK,

WITH

PRACTICAL RULES AND SUGGESTIONS

FOR THE USE OF

MACHINISTS, IRON-WORKERS, AND OTHERS.

BY W. B. HARRISON,

ASSOCIATE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN ARTISAN.

ILLUSTRATED WITH 44 ENGRAVINGS.

1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $2 50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
192 BROADWAY.

 Copies sent free by mail on receipt of price.

SCHOOL-SPEAKER.

The Advertiser wishes to publish the coming season a SCHOOL-SPEAKER adapted to the GRADE of GRAMMAR SCHOOLS, also one for Small Children, and desires to arrange with some Gentleman to compile and arrange one or both books.

Address, until August 20, 1868,

B. B. R., Publisher,
Box 2166, Boston, Mass

THE LITERARY WONDER OF THE AGE!

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome Street, New York,

Have now ready

The Cheapest and Most Beautiful One-volume Edition ever published of

SHAKESPEARE'S

COMPLETE WORKS.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

It is printed in a new diamond type, cast expressly for the purpose, upon a rich toned paper, and in the very best style of typography. It is edited by Mr. Charles Knight, and possesses the advantage of all the research made by that ripe Shakespearian scholar in his recently completed and beautiful new edition of "Knight's Pictorial Shakespeare."

From the (London) Daily News.

"The Shilling Shakespeare is, perhaps, the most remarkable product of an age of cheap literature. The volume consists of 768 pages foolscap 8vo, and is got up with all the care and finish of much more expensive works. The paper is good, and the cream tint gives it almost an air of luxury. The type is evidently new, and although it is necessarily small, it is so beautifully clear that the eye experiences no fatigue in reading it. There is none of that appearance of hasty work or flimsy material which often characterizes very cheap literary productions; there is, on the contrary, every evidence of careful printing, so that the pages have that equal and finished appearance which usually characterizes the best literature. . . . . It is the cheapest book of the season, and we can hardly conceive how the large expenditure at which it has been produced can be repaid to its publishers."

This edition can also be had neatly bound in green cloth, 80 cents; or handsomely bound in half Roxburgh, gilt top, $1.

Just Published:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By Howard Kingsbury and Rev. A. A. Graley. Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. Cloth, price $1 50.

CATSKILL MOUNTAINS,

And the Region around; their Scenery, Legends, and History. By Rev. Charles Rockwell. Cloth, price $2. The above books mailed free on receipt of price.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, New York.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.—NEW EDITION.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON,

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in common use. By JOHN BARTLETT. FIFTH EDITION, revised and greatly enlarged. 16mo, cloth, pp. 790, $3.

"The fourth edition of "Familiar Quotations" was published in 1863. The present edition embodies the results of the later researches of its editors, besides the contributions of various friends, and includes many quotations which have long been waiting a favorable verdict on the all-important question of familiarity. A few changes have been made in the arrangement, and the citations from Shakespeare have been adapted to the principal modern editions. The former edition has been freshly compared with the originals, and such errors removed as the revision has disclosed."—From the author's preface.

"The volume, as now improved, is the best and most complete of its kind ever published. As to its use, we should say it was a necessity to everybody. The questions which it answers are put every day in all companies, and most of them puzzle even those best acquainted with English literature to answer unhesitatingly."—Boston Transcript.

"The work before us is the most perfect book of the kind that has ever been produced, and has reached the position of a standard authority in this field."—Chicago Journal.

"The book is chiefly valuable for reference, but as a mental stimulant it is well worth its cost. It is a collection of striking thoughts and marked expressions, and meets a wide want in a convenient and elegant form."—Springfield Republican.

"A more amusing volume for desultory reading, more interesting for study, or more useful for reference, has rarely been issued."—Cleveland Herald.

"The work is well known to students and authors, and is almost as indispensable as a dictionary or encyclopædia."—Boston Journal.

JUST ISSUED.

THE AUGUST NUMBER

OF

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE

OF

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND EDUCATION.

CONTENTS:

1. DALLAS GALBRAITH. An American Novel. Part VIII.
2. ECHO NOTCH.
3. SMOKING.
4. OUR GLOBE IN 1868.
5. IN A MONTH.
6. A MONTH'S HOLIDAY IN GERMANY.
7. PROVIDENCE.
8. A WINTER'S NIGHT IN A WINTRY PLACE.
9. ALAS! POOR GHOST.
10. CLAIMS OF THE BONDHOLDERS.
11. LEATHERN MEN.
12. MADAME LA DUCHESSE.
13. MY ACQUAINTANCE WITH PLANCHETTE.
14. A NOCTURNE BY CHOPIN.
15. GARIBALDI AND ITALY.
16. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
17. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

For Sale by all Periodical Dealers.

Yearly subscription, $4; single number, 35 cents.

Specimen numbers sent to any address on receipt of thirty-five cents by the publishers.

MISS YONGE'S CAMEOS.

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY.

By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe."

12mo, tinted paper, vignette title, fine cloth, $1 75.

THE HOLY LAND.

By WM. HEPWORTH DIXON, Author of "New America," etc.

With two Steel Engravings and other illustrations. Crown 8vo, fine cloth, $3.

For sale by booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

Publishers, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S

NEW

MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For August, 1868.

CONTENTS:

TO AND UPON THE AMOOR RIVER.

ILLUSTRATIONS. — Petropavlovsk, Kamchatka. — Church at Petropavlovsk.—Kamchatka Sables.—Ascending Ghijiga Bay.—Light-House at Ghijiga.—Boat towed by Dogs.—Koriak Yourt.—Dogs Fishing.—Beach Scene, Nicolayevsk.—On the Amoor.—Gilyak Man.—Gilyak Woman.—Native Village, Amoor River.—Native Boat, Amoor River.—Goldee House at Night.—Head of the Amoor.

A LOVER'S GARDEN.

AMONG THE ANDES OF PERU AND BOLIVIA. By E. G. SQUIER.

ILLUSTRATIONS. —View in the Plaza del Cabildo, Cuzco, Peru.—Aqueduct over the Tullamayo or Rodadero.—Lower Fall of the Rodadero.—Upper Fall of the Rodadero.—Part of Inca Aqueduct.—Plan of the Inca Fortress of the Sacsahuaman, dominating the City of Cuzco.—Section of the Walls of the Fortress.—Part of the Fortress of the Sacsahuaman, from "The Seat of the Inca."—Salient Angle of Fortress.—View of Cuzco and the Nevada of Asungato from the Brow of the Sacsahuaman.—Niche in Terrace Walls of the Colcompata.—Rock Seats, near Fortress.—Section of Terrace of Chinchero.—Coped and Niched Terrace Walls, Chinchero.—Ollantaytambo Fortification.—Doorway to Corridor, Ollantaytambo.—Porphyry Slabs, Fortress of Ollantaytambo.—Horca del Hombre, Ollantaytambo.—Inca Building, Ollantaytambo.—An Ancient Block in Ollantaytambo.—Plan of Palace of Ollantay.—View of Part of Palace of Ollantay.—Sacred Rock and Circular Building near Calca, Valley of Yucay.—View in the Valley of Yucay from Corridor of the Hacienda Umeres.—Principal Fortress of Ollantaytambo.—The Inti-Huatana of Pisac.

JOHN BULL IN ABYSSINIA.

ILLUSTRATIONS. — Group of Shohos at Hamhamo Spring.—Gondar, the former Capital of Abyssinia.—Shoho Village of Akoo.—Annesley Bay.—View of the Plateau at Senafe, looking toward the Adowa Peaks.—King Theodore.—Consul Cameron.—Church at Goun-Gouna, between Senafe and Adigerat.—Map of Abyssinia.—Abyssinian Warriors.—General Napier's March: Mules and Mule-Drivers.—Water-Carriers and Camp-Followers.—Arrival at Adigerat of an Ambassador from Kassa, King of Tigre.

IN THE MAGUERRIWOCK.

LIFE'S CHANGES.

THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM: A LOVE STORY. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

ILLUSTRATIONS. — Gertrude. — "Curse you!" — Private John Stone.—"Te Deum Laudamus!"

HOW FORT M'ALLISTER WAS TAKEN.

SELFISH SORROW.

PAROLE D'HONNEUR. PART I.

A VISIT TO THE FRENCH CORPS LEGISLATIF.

THE NEW TIMOTHY. PART IV.

WHY THE ANCIENTS HAD NO PRINTING-PRESS.

MRS. POLLY HAND.

DUELS AND DUELLISTS. By T. B. THORPE.

THE STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

ENGLISH PHOTOGRAPHS BY AN AMERICAN.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

LITERARY NOTICES.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

Terms for Harper's Magazine, Weekly, and Bazar.

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year - | $4 00 |
| WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year - - | 4 00 |
| BAZAR, One Copy for One Year, - - | 4 00 |

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10; or any two for $7.

An extra copy of either the Magazine, the Weekly, or the Bazar will be supplied gratis to every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 each, in one remittance, or Six Copies for $20.

Bound Volumes of the Magazine, each Volume containing the Numbers for Six Months, will be furnished for $3 per volume, and sent by mail, postage paid. Bound Volumes of the Weekly, each volume containing the Numbers for One Year, will be furnished for $7, freight by express paid, the weight of the volumes being beyond that allowed in the mail.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Legends and Poetry of the Hudson.

LEGENDS AND POETRY OF THE HUDSON.
THE SHATE-MUC.
INDIAN LEGENDS AND TRADITIONS.
BEAUTY OF ITS SCENERY.
REVOLUTIONARY SKETCHES.
DUTCH LEGENDS AND HISTORY.

1 vol. 12mo, pp. 100, heavy tinted paper, extra English cloth, bevelled boards, price $1 25.

P. S. WYNKOOP & SON, Publishers,

108 Fulton Street, New York.

For sale on all the river boats and cars.

CULBERT & CO.,

24 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

POCKET BOOKS,
TRAVELLING BAGS,
DRESSING CASES,
CARD CASES,
RUSSIA LEATHER GOODS.
Writing Desks a Specialty.

REPUBLICAN

CAMPAIGN ENVELOPES FOR 1868.

Unique, Handsome, Significant, True, Ornamental, Useful, and Historical.

ON THE FRONT—The names of the distinguished candidates, with the latest heart sentiment of each. ON THE REVERSE—A Complete Synopsis of the Republican Platform.

The Political campaign of 1868 is destined to be the most memorable of any since the foundation of the Republic. There can be no more expressive souvenir of the Republican aspect of it than these envelopes.

Every Citizen should have a few, at least, to keep for posterity. Copyright secured. Republicans will, of course, use and circulate them extensively as possible.

100 sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.
400 " " " " " " 3.
1,000 " " " " " " 5.
5,000 sent by express, at $4 per 1,000.
10,000 or more, sent by express, at $3 50 per 1,000.

WM. P. LYON & SON,

Envelope Manufacturers,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

"AMER. SCHOOL INST.,"

Founded 1855,
Is a reliable Educational Bureau,
To aid all who seek well-qualified Teachers;
To represent Teachers who seek positions;
To give parents information of good schools;
To sell, rent, and exchange school properties.

Thirteen years' trial has proved the AMER. SCHOOL INST. a useful and efficient auxiliary in securing

"The Right Teacher for the Right Place."

Those who want Teachers should have the "Teachers' Bulletin," published in the AMER. EDUCATIONAL MONTHLY.

Those who want positions should have the "Application Form."

Circulars explaining plan, and giving Testimony from first-class educational and business men, sent when asked for.

J. W. SCHERMERHORN, A.M., Actuary,

14 BOND STREET, NEW YORK.

Branch Offices in San Francisco, Chicago, and Boston.

WHITTIER'S BAREFOOT BOY.

L. PRANG & CO. have now ready the fourth edition of Eastman Johnson's poetical illustration of Whittier's famous poem of "THE BAREFOOT BOY," one of the most charming genre pictures ever painted in this country. The first three editions of this chromo were sold in advance of publication.

THE POET, John G. Whittier, says of our chromo: "Your admirable chromo of 'The Barefoot Boy' . . . is a CHARMING illustration of my little poem, and in EVERY WAY SATISFACTORY as a work of art."

THE PAINTER, Eastman Johnson, writes of our chromo: "It strikes me as being one of the best chromo-lithographs I have ever seen."

Sold at all Art Stores, or sent by express, free of charge, to any address in the U. S. East of the Mississippi, on receipt of price.

Size 9¼ x 13. Price Five Dollars.

L. PRANG & CO., Art Publishers, Boston.

The Nation.

VOL. VII—NO. 161. THURSDAY, JULY 30, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. { TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

MALDEN PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE WEEK ..... 81
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Where shall Honest Men go? ..... 84
A Word for the Speculator ..... 85
The Power of Congress to regulate Railway Commerce ..... 86
To the Indignant Author ..... 88
CORRESPONDENCE:
Illinois Stock Statistics.—The "Fog" of the Impeachment Question ..... 89
NOTES: Literary ..... 90
"Camors" ..... 91
How shall we Paint our Houses? ..... 93
The Magazines for August ..... 93
Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen.—In the School-room.—Maritta.—Familiar Quotations ..... 95
Celebrated Sanctuaries of the Madonna.—Books of the Week.—The Fine Arts of Japan ..... 96

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

THE week just passed has probably been the last week of the Fortieth Congress—at least it is far from certain that there will be any session in September. By dint of hard work at the end of the session both Houses pretty thoroughly finished what work was before them, and have left over only a dozen or so unimportant bills and some nominations unacted upon. Of unfinished bills Mr. Boutwell's, for the more efficient government of Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia, was of most consequence; of the offices remaining unfilled, the two most important are that of Commissioner of Internal Revenue and that of Naval Officer of this port. General Rosecrans was easily confirmed as Minister to Mexico, which will partly compensate him for his failure to get the Spanish mission—a post that Mr. Hale has contrived to keep. He is one of the fathers of the Republican party, and personally popular; so, despite the offence he gave at the time of the McCracken affair, the Senate would not disturb him. On Wednesday week, in the House, Mr. Stevens denied that he had ever been in favor of paying gold for the five-twenty bonds. Mr. Garfield, on the following day, brought him to book, and proved by the official report of the debates that he had often committed himself to that side of the question. On the same morning there was an excited debate in reference to the condition of the South, some of the new Southern members being very violent. The Senate passed the bill subsidizing a line of American steamers between New York and Europe. The vessels—there must be seven of them within a year—must make as good average time as any ocean steamships plying between American and European ports, and the postal charges must not exceed $600,000 per annum. The Senate on Friday adopted a joint resolution, introduced by Mr. Wilson, ordering the removal of all office-holders in Texas and Virginia who are unable to take the test-oath. The House did not act on it. On Saturday the chief business done by the Senate was the passage of the Freedmen's Bureau Bill over the veto, by a vote of 29 to 5, and the passage of the amended bill relative to the rights of American citizens abroad. As passed, it is a bill in which Mr. Conness said his heart was no longer interested. As it now stands, it is little more than a Congressional declaration as to the status which, according to international law, naturalized Americans have, or should have. It is somewhat more than merely that, perhaps; possibly it may encourage some future President to take more energetic action, in conjunctures such as the bill relates to, than he would take if left to bear all the responsibility alone. Other practical effect it cannot have, so far as we can see—except on the November elections, and possibly in dampening England's avowed willingness to give what we ask. Senator Henderson made a long and bitter reply to the insinuations made by General Butler in the singular report about the impeachment bribery and corruption. The House also passed on Saturday the Freedmen's Bureau Bill over the veto—yeas 115, nays 23. On Monday the Senate had no time to take up Mr. Boutwell's bill, before mentioned, but went into executive session, at the close of which it adjourned till the third Monday in September. The House passed the Funding Bill in spite of the resistance of the Democrats, but did not send it to Mr. Johnson in time, he said, for his signature. As amended in conference, the bill transforms the five-twenties into consols of two classes—one payable as soon after thirty years as the United States may please, and bearing four and a half per cent. interest; the other payable after forty years, and bearing four per cent. interest. Principal and interest are expressly declared to be payable in gold.

---

The first Legal Tender Act was brought into the House in January, 1862. Mr. Thaddeus Stevens took no part in debating it till the last day of the first debate, February 6, at which time he made a speech, a good part of which was in favor of that provision of the bill which made the notes a legal tender in the payment of private debts. The notes would soon be used, he said, in the purchase of the bonds which were to be simultaneously issued, and the bonds would be a good investment. "A dollar in a miser's safe," he said, "unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could he invest it? In United States loans at six per cent., redeemable in gold in twenty years, the best and most permanent investment that could be desired." A little further on he said: "But widows and orphans are in tears lest their estates should be badly invested. I pity no one who has his money invested in United States bonds, payable in gold in twenty years, with interest semi-annually." It is not surprising that the farmers and farmers' widows in Mr. Stevens's district began to change their savings into bonds. Again he said: "Let me restate the various projects. Ours proposes United States notes secured at the end of twenty years, to be paid in coin." When the bill came back from the Senate, no one gave any intimation, directly or indirectly, that the bonds could be paid otherwise than in coin. Mr. Spaulding, of New York, said: "They intend to foot all the bills, and ultimately pay the whole, principal and interest, in gold and silver." Mr. Pomeroy said:

"The credit of the Government is alike bound for the payment of both these classes of indebtedness ultimately in gold; each derives its entire value from that."

The letter of the law, interpreted by the concurrent language of the law-makers, hardly gives Mr. Stevens so much shelter as people would suppose, to hear his denunciations of the "bloated speculators" and the "swindle on the taxpayers." The facts above set forth in regard to Mr. Stevens and other prominent Republicans were collected from the Globe by General Garfield by way of meeting Mr. Stevens's assertion that he had never been in favor of any but a paper payment. Mr. Stevens offered no other reply, when the exposure was complete, than a promise to defend himself at some future time, and this remark: "Why it is he has renewed the attack on me, God only knows."

---

Mr. Stevens's memory fails him. It was not till nearly a year after the debate on the five-twenties that he spoke his first word of repudiation. When the ten-forties were authorized, Mr. Stevens, while Mr. Horton of Ohio was speaking, made this remark:

"It would be fair, I suppose, to state that my amendment proposes to pay for these bonds at the end of ten years in coin, but to pay the interest in currency, while the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to redeem the bonds in currency."

Mr. Horton replied with a refusal to state what Mr. Stevens wished to have stated, because, he said, "it is not correct. The bill of the Committee of Ways and Means does not contemplate paying in paper." Whereupon Mr. Stevens, questioning a second time, said, "Are not the bonds payable in lawful money—whatever that is?" "No, sir," was Mr. Horton's answer; and, on motion of Mr. Thomas of Massachusetts, and out of abundant caution, as Mr. Garfield says, the words "in coin" were inserted in the bill, and the doubt raised by Mr. Stevens was supposed to be very effectually laid. In this case again, as in the previous one, neither more nor less certainly, the United States clearly bound itself to adopt the anti-Butler, anti-Stevens, anti-Morton, un-Pendletonian way of meeting its obligations to its creditors.

---

Mr. Butler's Select Committee's report has been made the occasion of some forcible remarks by Mr. Henderson, who does not seem to understand that the people are few, and every day getting fewer, who attach any great weight to anything said by Mr. Butler when acting in his capacity of partisan—legal or political. The senator was too bitter; he did not hesitate to charge Mr. Butler with being not only a "bold, wilful, and intentional falsifier," but a thief as well. Very much has been said on this latter topic, and a good deal of it very roundly; but we know of nothing before the public which justifies such a belief in the accusation as warrants a point-blank assertion of its truth. People loudest in their denunciations of General Butler, people from New Orleans who had had good opportunities for seeing him in his highest activity, we have always found unable to put their finger on any one indubitable instance of General Butler's having appropriated other people's property to his own use. As to the other charge made by the senator, those who read the speech, with its extracts from the report, can form their own conclusions. Here is a sample of what may be got from it, and the whole animal, we feel free to say, might be constructed from this particular bone; it is all in symmetrical harmony with the bit we append. On the eighteenth page of the report is a telegram: "Washington, May 15, 1868. John R. Garland, New York: Senator Henderson says conviction will fail by two votes.—Lockwood." Upon this Mr. Butler makes the comment, "So the gold-room had the benefit of Senator Henderson's knowledge." Now "Lockwood" is Mr. Crounse, of the Times. He was in communication with several members of the Missouri delegation, who just then were "laboring" with their senator, and from them he got the information which he telegraphed to Mr. Garland; telegraphing so briefly and positively as he did because his information came so directly. General Butler had not the slightest reason for believing that Mr. Crounse and Mr. Henderson had combined to let "the gold-room have the benefit of Senator Henderson's knowledge." Yet he insinuates that. After all, it is no wonder that Mr. Henderson is wrathful; but he can comfort himself by observing how flat the whole affair falls; the newspapers seem to be getting very sick of the General.

---

It would be a mistake, however, for any one who enjoys Mr. Butler's malicious humor and his unblenching, thoroughly cynical impudence, to leave unread his reply to Mr. Henderson's rather Hungarian defense of himself. It was in Sunday evening session that the speech was made, and to see how this circumstance of the time lacerates the General's bosom is affecting. He is far more "exercised"—as they say in his own Gloucester—by the misguided Henderson's desecration of the Sabbath than by the reviling and persecution which he himself has been called to undergo. "On the evening of the Lord's day," he says, with horror; . . . . "if that assembly to which I allude"—"a certain debating assembly," he calls the Senate—"deem the holy Sabbath well spent in listening to such an harangue; . . . . as a part of his Sabbath-day speech"—these are some of the passages which show how the sin of the Senate's violation of the Fourth Commandment weighs on his mind. It was with sorrow that Mr. Butler submitted "the report of your committee," which "was assented to by all the members of the committee in the city"—(Senator Henderson had said that the other members of the committee were gentlemen, and that none of them would have anything to do with the report, and the above form of words is Mr. Butler's way of meeting the charge.) He submitted it with sorrow, "grieving continually that without the explanations of the senator from Missouri, of which he of his own will had deprived the committee, the evidence seemed to bear so hardly and conclusively upon him," especially when he was compared with "admittedly innocent and honorable senators." This last stroke—when it is remembered that in the report itself General Butler makes confession of utter failure to find a particle of proof that every senator was not innocent and honorable—requires in the man who gives it some considerable power of face. He then goes on to make several inuendoes and assertions concerning Mr. Henderson's conduct, to which people will attend when some one else's word is brought in support of Mr. Butler's. The House did well when it declined to let this precious document be read, and remitted its author to the printer. Let us hope the Eighth Massachusetts District is satisfied with the piety of its representative, to say nothing of his candid honesty.

---

The Boston Commonwealth has done what we were afraid it would. It had only to give plain answers to four questions, but it declines that, and becomes abusive. We hurl back with more than the usual scorn and contempt the imputation that we are cynical. So, also, as regards all the other charges; we defy the Commonwealth to make good its comparison between us and the South before the war, or us and Pontius Pilate, or to prove that we are Jesuitical unbelievers, or that we write jargon and twaddle, or that we are flippant and hate the verities. We merely do not like a man to be so fond of the verities and "the primal" and "the elemental" and the eternal aspiration and the instincts, that when he is asked why Mr. Fessenden should not be invited to a public dinner of honor, he can find nothing better to do than to beg a certain disputed question and bawl about Mr. Fessenden's "guilt," and declare him "denounced by the masses." Mr. Fessenden, most people think—though we admit they were less numerous awhile ago—is "guilty" of nothing but of doing his duty. Even if what he had done was wrong, where will the Commonwealth find one tittle of proof that Mr. Fessenden did not think he was doing right and did not try to do right? Who has found evidence on which to impugn the motives that actuated him when he came to the conclusion that the Senate, when sworn to try an impeachment and do impartial justice in the trial, was a court? Nobody has offered any such evidence. The men who invited Mr. Fessenden to a public dinner did so, then, because they saw in him an honest man assailed by a storm of persecution for having done what he thought his duty. But the Commonwealth thinks he was not persecuted. We doubt if the Commonwealth knows how abusive newspapers can be. Sometimes they are shockingly foul-mouthed and cowardly. And apparently it does not know how unhappy it can make an honorably ambitious man to find that a hard-earned character for honor and integrity, supported for years and never blemished, cannot save him—if a certain number of editors of a certain size think him a "traitor"—from being cried through the length and breadth of the land as a liar, a rival meanly jealous of his fellow-senators, and a receiver of bribes.

---

On the only question as to which the Commonwealth, in its last article, talks in such a way as to merit in any degree the attention of argument, we have already argued so often that it is hardly worth while to go over the ground again. We have given our reasons for thinking the Senate sitting for the trial of impeachment a court. We were of that opinion before Senator Drake, who is a good lawyer, was defeated in his anxious endeavor to get senators to pronounce the assemblage not a court, but a body sitting to legislate the President out of office, and we have been of that opinion ever since. That the Senate trying impeachment—impeachment is a word with a well-defined legal meaning—wants some of the mere accidents of an ordinary court is, of course, true. It is equally true that there are various other processes besides impeachment, some of which the Commonwealth enumerates, which have never been called judicial, and yet which, likewise wanting the mere accidents of regular judicial processes, have, as we hold, all the essentials of such processes, have, at any rate, this quality—that he who, being engaged in them, under oath to do impartial justice, on the evidence of course, does not do that, fails in his duty. It will not be long before the better part of the Commonwealth's followers will be taking the view of Mr. Fessenden's course which, if we are not utterly mistaken, is now taken by the larger part of the Republican party.

The moral turpitude of the candidates increases, if anything, and several new shameful passages in their lives are discovered since we last wrote. Can Jesse R. Grant, for example, tell us if his son, when in command in the Southwest, did not quarrel with some respectable Hebrew gentlemen doing a little business in cotton under the firm name of Messrs. Mack? And did he not afterwards, and on account of this brawl, promulgate his tyrannical order expelling all Jews from his department? Will Jesse Grant deny that the quarrel grew out of the sale of his son's influence as department commander to this Hebrew firm? Then Mr. Seymour has for years been going under an alias, we are informed, his true name being Horatio Nelson Seymour, and he having, for some undivulged reasons, probably of a base kind, dropped the middle name. As for the name of his associate on the ticket, it may be Frank P. Blair or Francis P. Blair, or Frank P. Blair, junior, or General Frank P. Blair; the men who nominated him call him one thing, the army-rolls call him another, and he signs himself variously. This is a matter of importance. For, as one of our journals asks, if the Democratic ticket is elected, who must swear in, Francis P. Blair, junior, Francis P. Blair, senior, or Frank P. Blair, or Frank Blair? The solicitude of the World about the precise name which Grant signed to Buckner's and Pemberton's and Lee's capitulation-papers seems to have caused all this enquiry into the aliases of the aspirants. Seymour, we learn, was very near filling a bloody and dishonored grave in 1863. A party of gentlemen were lunching a few days ago at one of our handsomest down-town restaurants, when one of them was asked if he, being a good Democrat, did not, of course, intend voting for Seymour. A frown passed over his brow as he said, Never. He proceeded to relate that, Democrat as he was, he aided to defend the Tribune building in the riots of 1863. Rifle in hand, he could see Horatio Seymour as he addressed the infuriated crowd, and, drawing a bead on him, he covered his heart, and mentally resolved that if that mob should leave Seymour's feet to surge towards Mr. Greeley's building, Seymour should fall on the instant with a bullet through his breast; "and my bullet never fails," he added. A shadow passed over the company at this reminiscence, which has now gone into most of the country papers.

The Boston Pionier quotes our remarks on the relation of the eight-hour law, as recently passed by Congress, to the public respect for the Presidency and the probable duration of that branch of our Government under a growing contempt for it, and evidently thinks we are very near joining it in demanding the abolition of the Executive. This we might do if we thought the tendency was to increase instead of to diminish the President's prerogatives, and if we were unable to conceive of his usefulness when stript of a good deal of what now makes him formidable. We shall, however, first labor to make his office one of dignity rather than power; and we think it will almost immediately become so when he is deprived of his patronage, and ceases to be the terror of small postmasters and custom-house clerks. We shall not then, if we have impeachment at all, have it promoted chiefly in the interest of office-seeking flatterers of the Vice-President; nor see a party nomination for Vice-President hinge on the prospect of the candidate's meanwhile becoming President, with spoils at his disposal and friends to be rewarded. We would almost say that the mischief which Mr. Johnson, if successful, could bring upon the country would be less than that which might have been caused in the eight months of Mr. Wade's incumbency, by a general subversion and expulsion of office-holders, such as we know to have been planned with all minuteness. In the one case, we should have had an isolated, acute attack of a malady which we could both hope to cure and to avoid incurring in future. In the other, we should have aggravated a disease to which every party is liable, but which the country cannot afford to have aggravated in the party of progress and good government, and trust to its recovery.

There has been very little European news by the cable this week. Probably when we get the full reports of the debates in which M. Rouher denied that the Jecker bonds were at the bottom of the invasion of Mexico, and replied to M. Pelletan that the Government had no intention of altering the election laws, we shall have interesting reading. The English House of Commons passed on Thursday the bill providing for the purchase of all the telegraph lines by the Government, and the next night the Corrupt Practices (or Bribery) Bill, which had been upwards of a fortnight under debate. The bill provides for a hearing and decision in the case of contested elections, where corruption is charged by one candidate upon another. Local courts are to be held immediately after the presentation of a petition, whether Parliament is in session or not, by one of three judges of the superior courts in rotation. One important clause directs the entering of the Judge's finding on the journals of the House; and another that a Judge's finding that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in any place shall initiate a commission of enquiry, on the joint address of both Houses, the locality to pay the expenses of the enquiry. The bill is a Government measure, conducted of course by Mr. Disraeli, and half opposed by the Liberals, with Mr. Gladstone at their head.

Some one, according to a correspondent of Le Nord, having recently remarked to the Emperor at Fontainebleau that the assassination of Prince Michael of Servia might breed another Orsini attempt, Napoleon "held the contrary opinion," based, as it further appeared, on the observation that political assassins almost invariably effect just the opposite of what they intended. This reasoning would be sounder if the assassins themselves were in the habit of paying much attention to the failure of their predecessors. But they are not, partly because they are apt to be ignorant men, or men made desperate and almost lunatics by injuries which themselves or their country have received or seem to have received. Indeed, many of the late attempts on the lives of monarchs have been made by real lunatics. Speaking from a real or pretended regard for France, the Emperor professed the utmost tranquillity in the face of an improbable event. He is sure that his son or "some little nephew, some Milano or other," would avenge his death and maintain the Empire, and that his life or death would be equally useful to the country. These remarks are scarcely ominous, though increasing age and infirmity, joined to administrative failures and mortifications, seem to have changed the temper of Napoleon and rendered him timid and more yielding than he used to be. The subject, however, is one which, the more he talks about it, will the more excite suspicion that he has premonitions of peril to his dynasty.

One of the minor burdens of the Second Empire has just been brought to light in the Corps Législatif. The Legion of Honor, which, as founded by the First Napoleon, supplied nothing more than a decorative distinction, was reorganized by the present Emperor in 1852, and endowed with annual allowances, ranging from 250 to 3,000 francs, besides pensions. The cost of the order would be easily calculable if any limitation were set upon new decorations. This was attempted under the Restoration, except for the class of chevaliers; but such has been the Imperial liberality that the cadre then determined on has nearly doubled, so that it now contains 34,000 Legionaries, or, adding the civilians, 63,000, with 3,700 officers and 900 commanders. The medallists, also, who belong to the army solely, are estimated at 40,000; and these, if private soldiers or non-commissioned officers, are entitled to a pension. The army, as might have been expected, and not the civil list, has swollen the expenditures of the past ten years, and raised the total from 4,197,900 francs in 1858 to 18,425,000 francs in 1868. M. de la Tour, who has taken pains to collect these statistics, protests against the vulgarizing of his order, and proposes that an obsolete regulation of 1852 should be revived, prohibiting future decorations in any instance except when there are two vacancies by death or degradation. To this the caustic M. Glais-Bizoin has offered as an amendment, that the Cross of the Legion of Honor be given to whoever is willing to pay for it.

WHERE SHALL HONEST MEN GO?

We have no disposition to underrate or excuse the faults of the Republican party or of its leaders; indeed, some of our readers think we err in the opposite direction. Certainly no one can accuse us of blind partisan zeal. We can fully appreciate the doubts and difficulties which trouble many of the best men who ordinarily vote the Republican ticket, and sometimes cause them to hesitate in regard to their political course. And before answering their objections, it is only fair to mention some of the principal ones.

It is alleged that the Republican party, as an organization, has become as corrupt as the Democratic; that its managers are lobbyists and its chosen legislators venal; that Republican revenue officers defraud the Treasury of millions and a Republican Senate keeps them in office, while a Republican House of Representatives kills every proposition for reform in the civil service and Republican newspapers strive to abolish the only court which is a terror to the whiskey ring. It is further alleged that even the honest portion of the party is so ignorant of political economy, and so blind to the corrupting influence of government expenditure, that any scheme which pretends to foster the interests of the country finds favor with it, while it is always ready to applaud such follies as the Gold Bill of 1864 in the hope of violently checking the operation of the laws of trade.

And, in substance, the Republican party must plead guilty to these charges. It has an army of corruptionists in its midst, and it has inherited from the old Whig party a disposition to tinker at the business of the country and to spend the public funds liberally, which makes it easy to be deceived by men whose schemes contemplate a return of one dollar to the nation and a hundred dollars for themselves.

Having admitted this much, let us consider what is the prospect for reform offered by the character of the Democratic party, and what an honest citizen may reasonably hope to accomplish for the public good through that means. Ignoring for the present the overshadowing question of reconstruction, we ask any one to tell us what measure of political reform can be hoped from the restoration of the Democrats to power.

The Republican party, for a temporary purpose, debased the currency and unsettled the business of the country. The Democratic party is enthusiastic in favor of perpetuating this debasement, and thus annihilating all legitimate business.

The Republican party of New York and Pennsylvania evaded the just obligations of those States to foreign creditors by paying their interest in a depreciated currency. The Democratic party proposes to repeat the operation on a scale a thousand times larger, and with a currency that will thus be made absolutely worthless.

Republican officials in this State plunder it through the Canal Department and otherwise, it is estimated, of possibly a million dollars a year. We never heard of a higher estimate. The Democratic officials who control New York City extract at least three times that amount annually from the funds of that city alone—probably very much more.

There are many dishonest Republican officials, but there are also many honest ones. An honest Democratic official (we speak now of executive officers in minor departments) is a thing scarcely known within our sphere of observation.

The Democratic party is steadily growing worse. For years past its increase has been derived mainly from the lowest class of the immigrant population; and this class, profoundly ignorant, selfish, blind to considerations of public good, and destitute of that foresight which enables men to see their own ultimate advantage in the observance of moral law, are constantly gaining more control of the party. No amount of corruption in their leaders shakes their confidence in them. No argument ever reaches them.

There was a time when there were Democratic Congressmen of inflexible integrity, who were the unsparing foes of every device for public plunder. There are absolutely none such now. There is scarcely a single Democrat in either branch of Congress who even votes against such schemes, and there is not one who is known as their active and zealous opponent. So at Albany and Trenton it is found that bad as Republican legislatures are, they are made respectable by their Democratic successors.

A critical examination of the personnel of the party will have a still more discouraging effect upon those who think of accomplishing any reform by its means. Let any one count up all the Democrats in his own neighborhood, and unless his experience is widely dissimilar from ours, he will find that those who are externally the most respectable are precisely the ones from whom the least co-operation in reform may be expected.

The Democratic party of former days had some definite principles, and afforded a legitimate channel for the activity of all men who believed in those principles. But it has now abandoned all its old doctrines, and takes no interest in any questions other than the reduction of the negro to political servitude, and the repudiation of the public debt. Its members are more ignorant of, and more indifferent to, the teachings of political economy than the most narrow-minded Republican can be. Their whole attention is devoted to the perpetration of a huge national swindle. Robbery, and that (as we said in our first comments on their platform) a robbery out of which few of them can make five dollars each, is the absorbing vision of their dreams, the goal of their ambition. You might as well talk political economy or social reform to a party of cracksmen on their way to a burglary as to the Democratic party of to-day.

The descent of the Democratic organ in this city offers a striking illustration of the irresistible tendency of the party. The World, in 1862, was in many respects the best newspaper in New York. It had some of the best writing that has been seen in our political press. It has still upon its staff some of the best writers in their line, but the paper has been dragged through the mire until there is nothing too mean and vulgar for it, and it has on the same day published—in fact, we may say it now habitually publishes—a column of able and dignified argument, with another column of mingled scurrility and obscenity. Why is this, but because the readers whom it must now please will have it so?

We do not pretend that it is easy to reform and purify the Republican party. It takes hard work to keep any organization decent. Ask a candid minister whether it is easy to keep up the moral tone of his church. Ask a teacher whether it is easy to excite his school to diligence in study. No good work can be effected, even under the most favorable circumstances, without zeal and industry. But we do affirm, and we think what we say will be assented to by every man of practical experience in the details of politics, that hard work for reform within the lines of the Republican party always produces encouraging results, and rarely fails of entire success. Nothing but fraud and violence ever defeat it; and these would not, if they did not prematurely discourage those who engage in the good work.

The development of correct ideas on finance, revenue, and general political economy among Republicans, is, we admit, a more tedious process. They are much more ready to respond to moral considerations than to intellectual or prudential arguments. But they are not so obtuse as they are often supposed to be. Very little has been done in this direction; but the fruit of what has been done has been much greater among Republicans than among Democrats. No reasonable man can feel greatly discouraged in view of the facts.

In conclusion, we exhort every one who desires the growth of a sound public sentiment in respect to the management of public affairs to do as we intend to do—work with and in the Republican party, submitting to its mistakes of judgment, voting against its candidates when they are personally unworthy of confidence and voting for them when worthy, denouncing corruption in our own party more unsparingly than anywhere else, exposing its mistakes and regretting them more deeply than the mistakes of an adverse party, and in every way striving to make it a wise and a pure organization.

Drawbacks and discouragements we expect; entire success we do not expect; but we feel entirely certain that no other path lies open to any man who loves liberty, who hates corruption, and who seeks to establish the honor of his country by means which shall leave his own honor unsullied.

A WORD FOR THE SPECULATOR.

THERE is no class of the community that is so generally abused by everybody, and at all times, as the speculators. During the war nine-tenths of the evils from which the country suffered were laid to their charge. Furious were the onslaughts of the whole press upon the forestallers, middlemen, produce speculators, rebel and British gold-gamblers and Hebrew money-changers; and various attempts were made by Congress to legislate the whole tribe out of existence. But the efforts of the legislature proved abortive, the fulminations of the press remained mere bruta fulmina, and the speculators have continued to flourish, and are likely to flourish still, in spite of the recent renewal of the warfare on the part of the press and of the fresh thunders hurled at the "bloated speculators" from within the walls of Congress. In fact, to exterminate speculators would be to exterminate a great many more people than is generally believed. For a speculator is nothing more nor less than a person who seeks to discover in advance of the rest of the community the probable course of any given market, and who, acting upon his judgment in regard thereto, buys the article likely to advance or sells the article likely to decline. In this sense every merchant or manufacturer, every shopkeeper or mechanic, is more or less a speculator. They will all buy a little more than their momentary needs when an article is unusually cheap, and will sell everything they possibly can and contract to deliver more if an article is high and they think it likely to decline. Why should the same action be right when done occasionally by the mechanic and the merchant, and wrong when done habitually and as a business by the speculator?

It is very true that speculators frequently buy that which they have no intention of ever receiving; but they do so only because they expect that, before receiving the article bought, they will be able to sell it at a profit. It is also true that speculators frequently sell that which they have not got; but they do so only because they expect that, before delivering the article sold, they will be able to buy it for less than what they sold it for. And wherein do they differ in this respect from the cotton factor, who buys a planter's cotton crop at twenty cents a pound before the boll has formed upon the plant; or the manufacturer, who contracts to furnish a hundred cases of broadcloth at three dollars a yard before the roof is up on his factory building? Throughout all the large transactions of commerce similar engagements are of daily occurrence, and, indeed, of absolute necessity. No railroad builder can contract to build twenty miles of road without speculating on the price of labor and of stone and ties and iron, or whatever else he may agree to furnish. The Government advertises for army uniforms: the contractor cannot make a bid without contracting in advance for the cloth, the cloth manufacturer must contract in advance for the wool, and the wool merchant contracts with the farmer for the wool before it is fairly grown. Thus all four speculate by contracting in advance, and if they do not contract in advance they speculate still more.

It is very true that professional speculators sometimes combine to force up the price of an article, and thereby injure the consumers of that article; but they evidently benefit to the same extent the producers and holders of it. Or they combine to depress the price of an article, and thereby injure the producers and holders of that article; but they evidently benefit to the same extent the buyers and consumers of it. And if speculators do sometimes unfairly and dishonorably combine to depress or enhance prices, thereby, while benefiting some, injuring many others, we should not on that account condemn all speculators, any more than we should condemn all mechanics because the tailors or bricklayers or gas-makers sometimes forcibly seek to advance their wages, and strike work to the great injury and inconvenience of many individuals and of whole communities.

It is very true that when people go outside of their regular business to speculate in articles of merchandise or gold or stocks, about all of which they probably know little or nothing, they are very apt—nay, almost certain—to lose money. If lawyers will speculate in cotton, and doctors "dabble" in gold, it is very likely that they will come to grief, and when they have lost their money in speculating, which in their case is nothing else but so much gambling, they are certain to declaim violently against the professional speculators, by whom they think themselves injured or actually robbed. But nothing could be more unjust than such an accusation, just as nothing can be more absurd than the ignorant tirades against speculation and speculators in general that leading journals feel occasionally compelled to indulge in. The speculator is just as important and necessary a part of the business community as the merchant or manufacturer, and so far from being the cause of fluctuations in price, the speculator is really the great preventer of fluctuations, is above all classes of the community the very class whose efforts—unconsciously enough on his own part—constantly tend to keep prices steady.

Paradoxical as the latter assertion may appear to most people who have not given the question much thought, it is nevertheless the simple fact, and a rudimentary truth of political economy. Although everybody is accustomed to talk glibly of the bulls and bears, meaning those who speculate for a rise and those who speculate for a fall, yet whenever speculation itself is spoken of, and especially when it is complained of, one of the two classes of speculators is always singled out for reprobation, and the existence of the other class is always conveniently ignored. In the eyes of an unconditional admirer of our present financial management, to be a bull in Government securities—that is, to buy Government securities in expectation of their advance in price—is a meritorious deed, well becoming a loyal citizen; but to be a bull in gold—that is, to buy gold in expectation of an advance in the premium—is the height of disloyalty, and qualifies a man to be classed among gold gamblers and rebels. In the eyes, however, of the retired capitalist, who has his July dividends to invest, these self-same bulls in Government securities, who buy bonds in June when they are cheap and when the capitalist has no money, and who expect to sell them in July at an advance, are mere robbers, middlemen, and forestallers; while as for the bear in gold, the good citizen who wants to see the premium go down, and the credit of the nation rise, and himself make a little money by it, hear him abused by the California and Nevada miners, who send their gold here for sale, and who swear that the bears in gold are leagued to cheat them out of their rightful dues. The farmer is an inveterate bull speculator in produce of every kind; the men who speculate for higher prices at the Produce Exchange are his friends, they put money in his plethoric purse; the bears are his enemies, they seek to depreciate his property, they combine with the banks to make money tight, and to compel the farmer to sell at the lowest price; they ought to be stopped by some legislative action. The city editor, however, not always over well paid, and with a large family of hungry children to feed, may well look aghast when his own columns announce a further advance of fifty cents in the price of flour by the barrel; he is naturally a bear in flour; he, if any one, can be excused for railing at the bulls in the Produce Market, and for calling the most generous of men heartless extortioners, and for not knowing or forgetting that just as many men, women, and children desire to see flour advance in price as there are men, women, and children who desire to see it go down, and that there are in all trades just as many bulls as bears, as many bears as bulls.

Now, if there are generally as many bulls as bears among the speculators, as in the nature of things there evidently must be, it is equally evident that the speculators cannot advance or depress the price of any article unless the convincing evidence of events induces some of them to change sides—that is, some bulls to become bears or some bears to become bulls. A speculator can only make money by correctly foreseeing the future course of the market. If events do not indicate a change, the speculators, pretty equally divided, cannot make one. It is only when an early change becomes obvious to the keen-eyed that the balance of speculation gradually inclines to one side or the other, increasing the number of buyers for a rise or of sellers for a fall, and thus gradually advances or depresses the price of the article dealt in. If the speculator did not foresee the change and by his purchases gradually advance the price, and have his stock on hand to supply the demand when the great mass of consumers come into the market, the fluctuations in the price would be far more sudden and more extensive.

In the winter of 1867 the belief was general both in Europe and here that our cotton crop was large. The receipts from India and other producing countries were heavy. The demand for manufacturing was light all the world over. Prices declined to fifteen or sixteen cents a pound in December. Planters and factors of cotton were poor; they shipped their product to England as rapidly as possible, and sold it at a very low figure. The lower the price went, the more cotton declined likewise, and the less the manufacturers wanted to buy. At this juncture keen speculators, seeing that the extent of the crop was exaggerated and that the demand was underestimated, began in increasing numbers to believe in higher prices—to turn bulls in cotton—and they bought large amounts on speculation and held it until the price advanced largely, and then sold it out, making a very handsome profit. No one buys cotton except manufacturers and speculators. What would have been the result if the speculators had not bought American cotton in December and January? Why, the price would have declined still further, more cotton would have been shipped to England, and when our manufacturers came into the market in February and March they would have found an insufficient supply, there would have been a perfect scramble for what was left, we should probably have had to import cotton from Europe at a great loss to all concerned, and prices would have fluctuated double and treble what they have done. Instead of which, the speculators did buy, their purchases advanced the price gradually, manufacturers began to work more carefully—began to purchase slightly—the planters ceased to press their stocks upon the market, the price here became almost equal to that of Liverpool, it no longer paid a profit to export cotton, the balance of the stock remained in the country in the hands of speculators, and when the manufacturers had to make further purchases they found a supply of cotton which they would not have found but for the action of the much-abused and heartily-hated speculators. Even now it is seen that the speculators in cotton did not speculate quite enough, did not put up the prices quite enough, did not sufficiently prevent the export, for the stock in the country to-day is so light that nothing but the almost unprecedented forwardness of the growing crop prevents American cotton to-day from being brought back from Liverpool to keep the New England cotton-mills from stopping work.

The course of speculation in the grain and flour market has been almost identical with that of the cotton market. The stocks of wheat and flour in the country to-day are so small that it is absolutely certain that if the much-decried bull speculation of last winter had not put up the price, caused increased economy in consumption, and stopped the export, we should to-day be importing flour from Europe, and be suffering from the evils of a scarcity bordering upon famine.

In May, 1866, when the speculators in gold foresaw the outbreak of hostilities between Prussia and Austria, they immediately commenced buying large amounts of gold, knowing full well that war in Europe must inevitably result in a drain of specie from here, and a consequent advance in price. The purchases made by the speculators in this anticipation naturally caused an advance in the premium. The Secretary of the Treasury, with a perverseness almost incredible, refused to see in the advancing premium anything but a combination of the gold gamblers to ruin the credit of the country. He thought it his duty to counteract their efforts, and by enormous sales of Treasury gold kept the price so low that foreigners delightedly took all they could get, and in less than six weeks carried thirty millions of it out of the country. In order to put a stop to speculation, Mr. McCulloch sold this gold to foreign bankers at 130. He could not sell them all they wanted, and was obliged to stop selling altogether. But the foreigners wanted the gold, and had to buy it in the market, and our people, alarmed at the enormous export, wanted it likewise. The price rapidly advanced to 160, at which figure Europe not only stopped buying any more of us, but also very soon began to send back what it had bought, and to sell it to us at an enormous profit. The Secretary's foolish attempt to stop speculation—that is, to prevent sensible men from acting upon their foresight and judgment—involved the country in a loss of twenty or thirty millions of dollars. If he had left the market to the speculators, their purchases would have advanced the price gradually and steadily, until it would have been no longer profitable for foreigners to buy gold and carry it out of the country, and we should have been spared the loss and the folly of sending steamer-loads of cheap coin out of the country in June, and bringing steamer-loads of dear coin back in September.

Middling cotton sold in this city last week at thirty-two cents a pound, and good brown sheetings at eighteen cents a yard. A speculative planter in Georgia sells to his factor in Savannah his growing crop of cotton at eighteen cents a pound, deliverable in November. The speculative Savannah factor sells the same cotton to a New York merchant at twenty-one cents a pound, deliverable in December. The speculative New York merchant sells the cotton to a Lowell manufacturer at twenty-four cents a pound, deliverable by the 1st of January, 1869. The speculative Lowell manufacturer, calculating to a nicety, can make brown sheetings at fourteen cents a yard when cotton costs twenty-four cents a pound, and he immediately sells the sheetings to the Warren Street dry-goods dealer at fourteen cents a yard, deliverable in February. Nothing can well be more frightfully speculative than this: selling brown sheetings that are yet to be manufactured out of cotton that is yet to be raised on a plantation in Georgia, that perhaps never had any existence! But mark the result! The dry-goods dealer knows that in February he will receive sheetings that cost only fourteen cents a yard. It will not do for him to have any stock on hand at that time that costs eighteen cents. He will set to work immediately to lower the price of his present stock. His neighbors do the same; by-and-by the retailer gets the advantage of the decline, and puts down his prices, and before we know it, three months before a bale of the new cotton crop has appeared in market, we may buy cotton goods in Broadway as cheap as they can be produced next March. This again we owe to speculation; and in precisely the same way the speculators in advance of liberal harvests cheapen the price of bread for us long before a single bushel of new wheat has been ground into flour

We might fill column after column with examples of the manner in which speculation tends constantly to equalize prices. But those we have given will suffice. When we find in all countries of the world a number of men, against whose individual character no objection can be raised, engaged in an occupation which to us may seem useless, injurious, or immoral, it is always safer to mistrust our own judgment than to hastily indulge in abuse and indiscriminate condemnation. If the influence of speculation upon the welfare of a community is carefully examined, it will be found to be not only not injurious but overwhelmingly beneficial. It is time that the name of speculator should cease to convey a reproach.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE RAILWAY COMMERCE.

THERE is a continuous line of railway communication between Boston and Omaha. The companies which control this line owe their existence to the separate legislation of Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. Passengers and goods may be carried from one of these points to the other without change of cars or transshipment, and are, of course, on their route, successively brought under different and perhaps conflicting codes of local laws. May Congress apply to this line and to all others similarly situated a uniform rule in respect to all matters connected with the business of transportation?

The answer which we must give to this enquiry, and the key to the whole discussion, depend upon the answer to another question: Is the transportation of passengers and goods upon railways to be called commerce, so that if the transportation be from one State to another there thence exists "commerce among the States"? If so, the power we are considering plainly exists, for the Constitution in express terms authorizes Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States."

The national Constitution is an enumeration of general legislative functions conferred upon the Government rather than a description and definition of the particular acts of law-making which Congress may perform. Political parties have to a great extent been divided upon the question, What specific powers are included within these generic statements of the organic law, and, therefore, what measures is Congress permitted from time to time to adopt? The discussion which began at the very outset has continued to the present day, and has been participated in by the legislators, the judiciary, and the people. General principles of interpretation have been repeatedly assumed by Congress in making a law, confirmed and established by the Supreme Court in declaring the law valid, and approved by the people in the choice of their representatives. Yet it has constantly happened that when a new measure is proposed, although it is clearly within the general principles of constitutional interpretation settled by the highest authority, and is in all respects analogous to others with which the people have long been familiar, it is opposed, the power of Congress to pass it is denied, simply because it is new, because the object to which it is directed has never before been brought within the scope of Congressional legislation. The contest must, therefore, be again waged from the beginning; first principles must again be appealed to, as though the combined assent of legislators, judges, and people had determined nothing in respect to our organic law. This statement is most emphatically true in reference to the subject now under consideration. Congress has again and again enacted laws in every respect analogous to the proposed measure, laws depending upon the same generic grant of power, and interfering in an equal degree with the State legislation. These laws have often been subjected to the scrutiny of the Supreme Court, and as often been upheld. The long line of splendid judgments upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce, commencing with Gibbons v. Ogden in 1824, and ending during the current year, has completely settled every principle upon which the authority to control inter-state railways depends. Nothing is new except the particular object to which it is now proposed to direct the regulative function. Yet we see two Democratic members of the Committee on Commerce dissenting peremptorily from the decision of the majority, and denying the existence of any power in Congress to regulate railways.

The Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It should be noticed that there is no difference whatever in the compulsive efficacy of these three grants; each one is as comprehensive as each of the others. To whatever extent Congress may regulate commerce with foreign nations, it may regulate commerce among the several States; the one function bears no badge of inferiority to the other. No one now questions or limits the national authority over foreign commerce; that over inter-state commerce is equally broad, and if it has not been so fully exercised, this has resulted simply from motives of policy. Chief-Justice Marshall said, in Gibbons v. Ogden: "The subject to be regulated is commerce; and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse." In a subsequent case the same great judge shows that commerce includes traffic as well as mere intercourse. In the celebrated "Passenger Cases" (1849) the Supreme Court formally decided that persons may be the objects of commerce, and that the transportation of persons is a branch of commercial intercourse which may be regulated by Congress. State laws interfering with the national regulations were pronounced void. These principles lie at the basis of all the legislation of Congress, and of all the judgments of the Supreme Court, and have become a part of the established constitutional law of the country.

Commerce, therefore, contains two elements, transportation and traffic; each of these may be regulated, if they are carried on with foreign nations, or between two or more States. We are so geographically situated that by far the greater part of our commercial intercourse with foreign countries is conducted upon the ocean; and thus it necessarily happens that most of the laws regulating that intercourse are made applicable to water transportation. For a considerable period of our history most of our inter-state commerce was also transacted upon navigable waters, partly upon the ocean, partly upon the great chain of lakes which skirt the northern frontier, and partly upon the vast rivers which divide and separate many of the States; and it happens that most of the regulations which affect this intercourse have reference to navigation or to navigable waters. Congress has, by virtue of its general function, prescribed rules governing all this navigation as special and minute, and interfering as radically with State legislation, as any which can ever be demanded and enacted for the government of land transportation and traffic. In this class are found regulations for the ownership, transfer, and use of vessels sailing upon foreign voyages or from one State to another. Other statutes regulate the use and conduct of the vessels themselves, provide for the safety of crews and passengers by prescribing rules concerning boilers, engines, medicines, bulk, ventilation, number of the crew, the form and nature of their contract of hiring, their rights, powers, and duties. No one questions the validity of such laws as these. Not a steamer sails from New York to an adjacent port which is not under the control of United States statutes; not one plies on the great lakes, or on the Ohio or the Mississippi, which is not in like manner the object of national legislation. Many of these vessels are owned by corporations created under State authority, which are thus interfered with in the same manner as railway companies would be if the measure under discussion should be adopted. But Congress has gone much further in its work of regulation. It has invaded the common law of the States, and has relieved the owners of vessels from much of the liability as carriers of goods which that law casts upon them. The Supreme Court has sustained the statute which makes this change, and has declared that it applies to the great lakes and navigable rivers as well as to the ocean. Again, Congress has assumed to authorize the construction of certain bridges over great rivers which run between several States. The Supreme Court, in the case of Pennsylvania v. Bridge Company—18 Howard's Rep.—has directly sustained this exercise of power. In the very late case of Gilman v. Philadelphia it was conceded by the same tribunal that the national legislature may, by general or by special laws, provide for the erection of bridges over streams navigable from the ocean, whether lying entirely within a single State or not.

These examples of the existing system of regulation might be indefinitely multiplied. But enough has been said to show that the principles upon which the whole question of power turns have been settled; that commerce includes transit as well as traffic; that inter-state commerce is as much within the scope of the Congressional function as that which is foreign; and that the national legislature has, to a large extent, exercised its authority over the intercourse among the States carried on in the natural water channels of intercommunication. The whole discussion is, therefore, reduced to one narrow point. Unless intercourse by land, over the natural or artificial ways now in use, is not commerce, Congress has ample authority to prescribe rules governing the inter-state transportation of persons and merchandise by railways.

It hardly needs an argument to show that the methods and instruments of the intercourse—bridge or river, stage-coach or pack-mule or railroad—are not the essential facts; these change; new inventions banish the objects which were once familiar and to which the laws once applied, and the laws must be amended in order to adapt themselves to the altered circumstances. The Constitution concerns itself only with the fact that persons and merchandise are transported from foreign countries to our own, or from one State to another, and not with the particular methods which may be in use from time to time to effect this transit. The Supreme Court very properly said in Gilman v. Philadelphia: "It must not be forgotten that bridges, which are connecting parts of turnpikes, streets, and railroads, are means of commercial transportation as well as navigable rivers, and that the commerce which passes over a bridge may be much greater than would ever be transported on the water which it obstructs."

One consideration, however, is absolutely conclusive upon this point. If the power of Congress extends only to that inter-state transit which is carried on through the natural water channels, and does not also embrace that carried on through the means of railways and other artificial channels, then the same is true as to its power over foreign commerce. Those who deny the authority of Congress to regulate the railway traffic among the States must, of necessity, deny its power to regulate the railway or other land traffic with Canada or with Mexico. In fact, the opponents of the proposed measure are driven to the position that the Constitution was only framed for the state of things, physical as well as political, which existed at the time of its adoption, and that it contains no quality of elasticity, no faculty of adaptation to the changes in the forms of conducting the activities of life, and to the progress in the material arts.

TO THE INDIGNANT AUTHOR.

"ONE of the innumerable Browns and Joneses of ordinary journalism" has recently been saying a word in an entirely outspoken and candid manner to the innumerable Browns and Joneses whom ordinary journalism seriously offends when it undertakes the office of criticising their literary productions. What he says is so well said, and here in this country—where literature is, of course, in a state of crudity, and literary men do not very well know their true relation to the rest of the community—there is so much need of looking into the matter that we shall offer no excuse for repeating to our readers what he says. Let us premise that the real name of the writer who adopts for the nonce the humble patronymic of Brown or Jones is Bernard Cracroft, and that of English contemporary critics he is one of the most fearless and subtle—often much too subtle, be it confessed; too fearless, we suppose, a critic cannot be.

He begins by speaking of what he calls the professorial class, and charges upon it a certain jealous and contemptuous feeling for non-professorial critics. We, for our part, should have made no objection if he had given to this class—honestly enough and naturally enough jealous and contemptuous—a more comprehensive descriptive name. For example, one hardly thinks of the body of professors, giving that term the usual meaning, as a body of men engaged in, so to speak, creative literature. But the poet and novelist, equally with the men engaged in producing the literature of mere knowledge, are affected unpleasantly by criticism from outsiders, and are perhaps even more apt to resent such criticism as impertinence. However, it is as well to adhere to the narrower term; so far as the principles laid down are susceptible of general application the application of them may safely be trusted to the reader.

Well, then, the professors, says Mr. Cracroft boldly, have no right to ask that all criticism should be professorial. To begin with, professors would, as a general thing, write bad criticisms, and be very unreliable assistants to the editor. For, in the first place, they have their own work to do; the editor must wait their convenience, and if he waits he may have the mortification of seeing a good subject drift past him, or he may find the late-coming contribution altogether out of tune with his journal, and be obliged to print an article which sets all his literary teeth on edge. How often this latter misfortune happens is known only to the journalist at once ambitious and conscientious. For the professors are, except in rare instances—when, really, the professor is something more or other than a mere professor—unfitted for the task of appraisement and presentation. They are hampered by the partiality which comes of special knowledge. Then, very likely, they make a bad article by reason of a natural tendency to reserve their best writing for their own books; and we may add that the temptation to do this is greater than people would suppose who have never felt the stress of the severe competition which is now one of the necessary conditions of a literary life of any sort. Then, for another reason of professorial bad writing—bad from the editor's point of view—professors cannot compete on his own ground with the professional, trained journalist, who, in order to live, has been compelled to make a study of the science of fitness, proportion, and popularity. Journalism is a trade to be learned, and like every art and mystery has its secrets, which only a long apprenticeship can teach. To give an extreme example, if Mr. Bennett might have from Victor Hugo—on condition, let us say, that the writer's name should not be revealed—an off-hand description of the next hanging of a man in New Jersey, instead of having it from one of his own reporters, he probably would much disgust M. Hugo by the choice he would make. Very properly he would demand a man who should know the Herald, that is to say, a man who by long experience should be able to please the Herald's audience. To do journalistic work and live by it, a man has to learn the tact of the moment—a composite thing made up of the tact of the particular journal in which he is writing, and of course that includes the knowledge of the particular public which the journal addresses—and the tact of the subject with which he happens to be dealing. He must have "great clearness of judgment, great rapidity of perception, the instinct of truth, . . . and the faculty of exact appraisement," or, in other words, an appreciation of the value of the subject absolutely, and also relatively to the value of other things in which the public for which he writes is interested.

Let it be granted that hard labor for years at this sort of work gives to the laborer certain facilities and powers of mind not to be acquired in any other way, then is the person who has acquired these therefore fit to say anything to his particular audience in regard to a book of which he knows considerably less than the book's author? Why not, unless we are going to demand of one class of workers a perfection to which no other class pretends to attain, and to which no other class is required to attain? But "instead of viewing the journalist and reviewer as a cold and abstract instrument—more or less delicate, as the case may be—to be used by them for the purpose of testing the outer and exoteric effect of their inner and esoteric labor, they set him up in their mind as a personal enemy and unscrupulous detractor; and adding up all the points in which they differ from him (and he has a right to differ from them) to any mistake he may have fallen into, they debit him with an artificial but overwhelming balance of incompetence. . . . . Instead of viewing his cool indifference and placid impersonality as a most valuable element in his criticism, they are outraged and filled with scorn because he does not officiate with humble alacrity and devotion at the head of a devout public in the capacity of high-priest-in-ordinary and incense-bearer-general to their inwardly begotten and fondly conceived literary godhead."

"At the head of a devout public." After all, it is in these words that we find one great reason why any but adulatory criticism is so bitterly resented. A devout public spends money on its idol. The artist very often has strong in him the feeling of the mere shopman. He does not stand beside his work, within earshot of the bystanders, thankful to catch any honest word which may fall from the spectator, that thereby he may perchance be helped in his task of expressing what is in him in such a way as that it may have most effect on the minds and souls of those to whom he speaks; too often—too often of necessity, let us say, of hard necessity—he listens as one who hates each depreciatory word as tending to spoil his market. However, in so far as the literary man is only a shopman we may best leave him unmentioned. But the not more respectable feeling, the childishness which, though he may be unaffected by pecuniary considerations, makes him angry when the average critic ventures to speak unreservedly about his productions, is common almost beyond relief. No one has ever filled an editor's place in an American newspaper office—probably no one has ever been an editor in any country—without being very frequently called to account for words spoken honestly and without ill-will about the productions of persons who (on any theory except the theory that they are either market-men or else more sensitive and egotistical than beseems a thinking man) should be well content to let everybody speak his mind concerning that which—by the fact of publication—everybody is invited to consider and pass judgment upon. Usually the observations which are addressed to editors on such occasions are more threatening than expostulatory; generally they fix upon some personal enemy as being indubitably the objectionable writer; often they mention the extraneous reasons which have induced him to make the unpleasant remarks; but, on the whole, this appended portion of a deprecatory-minatory note—the latest of very many that we have seen—serves well enough as a specimen of thousands. We cut it from the last number of a well-known periodical:

"SIR: I have just seen the notice of my 'Early History of ———.' It is so unkind and unjust that I might well attribute it to some personal ill-will, but know of no cause for such a feeling on your part."

Still, that some personal hatred must be at the bottom of this offending criticism the writer of the note is evidently well persuaded, and he grows more and more savage through a column of matter, at which the recipient must have laughed. As we have said, it is usual among our writers to take this view of the motives which actuate the reviewer, and it would be easy indefinitely to multiply instances precisely like the one with which he furnishes us of undue sensitiveness to criticism leading to absurdly calumnious accusations.

Let it be said that it is the office of criticism to try every work by comparison with the best that is known on the subject of which the work treats. We need not, therefore, quarrel with criticism which seems to us bad, but which—crede experto—is ninety times utterly honest and impersonal out of every hundred times that it is accused of being basely and cruelly otherwise. And we must think of the welfare of the vehicle in which—for we do not live in an ideal world—our best that is human has to be conveyed to the public. So we must have the man who by special training has become capable of using the vehicle in question without smashing it and driving people to put up with a worse. Such a man may be professorial, or he may not; as we have seen, it is very likely that he will not be a man with exhaustive special knowledge of anything but journalism. Let it be that he is merely the average man, trained to feel the pulse of his fellows, competent to tell whether they are being pleased and instructed or are being fooled and bored, and under bonds to hit the white with due regularity, because by his trade he lives, and too frequent failures mean loss of his wages. Still, in all this we have no respectable reason for resenting his condemnatory criticism; nor is there in it any reason for wholly despising it, though, true enough, there is in it reason good for setting upon it a less value—a less exaggerated value—than some people do set upon it—such people, however, be it said, being small buyers of literature rather than judges of it, and hardly to be regarded by the literary man who has any high motive to work. But because there is such a class, and it is so large, there is stronger reason for urging writers to possess their souls in peace under adverse criticism than for urging readers in general to abate their faith in the taster, who tells them how he likes the viands which are offered for general deglutition. It is easier to make writers careless and insolent and presuming than to make the easily fooled reader too severe in judgment. Nine times in ten, the despised and hated critic, confessedly blasé, can better indicate to an author what will be his value with the next generation—generations are brief in the world of books—than the author's purchasers can. We are, of course, supposing a state of things in which criticism really exists, and have not in mind the notices that publishers buy of papers that are in no sense organs of criticism, which are not sold as such, nor bought as such, and whose word, therefore, has no value as an indication of the worth of books to this or any generation of readers.

Correspondence.

ILLINOIS STOCK STATISTICS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

I have been looking in your own and other journals for some denial or restriction of your views on the "Financial Prospect," as stated in the Nation of June 25; but instead of any such thing, I find your correspondent J. M. S., July 9, declaring that "the very startling figures of your article" "are incontrovertible," while you yourself proceed in the same strain again July 16. I have not seen the "recent reports of the Agricultural Bureau at Washington," upon which your remarks are based, but I doubt not you are right according to that authority.

Believing, however, that the truth of the matter was otherwise, at least in Illinois, I have examined the reports of the Auditor of Public Accounts of this State so far as to ascertain the numbers of five leading classes of domestic animals, as returned to the auditor's office by the local assessors during fourteen years past. As the examination has raised my own spirits a little, I send you the results below, hoping they may contradict the "recent reports of the Agricultural Bureau," so far as this State is concerned, and so throw at least one gleam of light into the "prospect for the more distant future," which has seemed to you so gloomy:

| | No. Horses. | No. Neat Cattle. | No. Mules and Asses. | No. Sheep. | No. Hogs. | Population. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1854 | 352,823 | 1,042,210 | 15,348 | 743,119 | 1,901,362 | 1,215,555 |
| 1855 | 395,632 | 1,175,823 | 19,523 | 811,827 | 1,829,537 | 1,306,576 |
| 1856 | 497,736 | 1,169,855 | 22,885 | 786,433 | 1,594,903 | 1,337,651 |
| 1857 | 467,531 | 1,351,209 | 23,822 | 760,602 | 1,393,585 | 1,468,726 |
| 1858 | 513,030 | 1,422,249 | 31,881 | 760,703 | 1,903,903 | 1,549,801 |
| 1859 | 532,247 | 1,337,565 | 32,692 | 647,337 | 1,725,323 | 1,630,976 |
| 1860 | 590,963 | 1,425,978 | 36,371 | 584,430 | 1,530,256 | 1,711,951 |
| Average. | 465,718 | 1,274,986 | 26,789 | 737,791 | 1,749,367 | 1,467,305 |
| Ratio. | 31.73 | 86.89 | 1.82 | 49.60 | 119.22 | 100.00 |
| 1861 | 625,242 | 1,428,362 | 39,278 | 731,379 | 2,196,581 | 1,797,862 |
| 1862 | 664,194 | 1,603,949 | 41,033 | 913,024 | 2,601,395 | 1,883,774 |
| 1863 | 652,500 | 1,684,892 | 40,675 | 1,206,625 | 2,506,133 | 1,969,686 |
| 1864 | 722,751 | 1,370,783 | 39,197 | 1,606,144 | 2,044,844 | 2,055,598 |
| 1865 | 793,259 | 1,568,280 | 48,058 | 2,165,972 | 1,743,005 | 2,141,510 |
| 1866 | | | | | | |
| 1867 | 828,628 | 1,464,866 | 72,954 | 2,550,850 | 2,581,431 | 2,313,334 |
| Average. | 714,595 | 1,520,188 | 46,866 | 1,523,999 | 2,278,907 | 2,026,960 |
| Ratio. | 35.25 | 74.99 | 2.31 | 75.43 | 112.44 | 100.00 |

The returns for 1866 have not yet been compiled by the auditor. The population for 1855 and 1865 is given according to the State census of those years; for 1860 it is given according to the last United States census; and for the other years I have computed it.

In seven years, to every one hundred persons we have gained three and a half horses, half a mule, and twenty-six sheep, and have lost twelve cattle and seven hogs. I am willing, if you are, to set off the four of the horse kind against the twelve head of cattle, and the gain in sheep against the loss in hogs, and say that the people of Illinois have about the same wealth in domestic animals, in proportion to population, that they had seven years ago. But then I beg you to remember that a good many of us have been away from home on important business for long spaces of time during the last seven years, and on that account have not given as much attention to stock-raising as we hope to give in the seven years coming.

A comparison of the foregoing figures for 1860 with the figures of the United States census of the same year will show many and great discrepancies. Assessors are not wont to be accurate, and owners of property, when listing it for taxation, are apt to understate it. But we may assume that assessors exercise about the same care, and that owners give in their property with about the same honesty, or dishonesty, one year with another. Assuming this, whatever may be true of the country at large, the people of Illinois have not been "for several years past steadily decreasing in wealth," nor are we of this State "very much poorer in domestic animals than we were a few years ago."

It is true, we are liable for our just proportion of the national debt; but in the past seven years we have paid off an immense amount of private indebtedness, while the debt of the State is less than it was before the war. There is no way of ascertaining the precise amount of private liabilities which have been cancelled. I believe, however, that we in Illinois could personally assume our respective shares of the national debt, if it were apportioned either according to population or according to wealth, and still be in a better condition than we were in 1860. At the same time, as urged in the concluding lines of your last article on this subject, it will be better for us all to work than to brag. S. C.

Peoria, Ill., July 21, 1868.

[Nothing can be more acceptable to us than the criticism of such earnest seekers after truth as our correspondent "S. C." His figures bear us out in the most striking manner. Comparing, as he does, the averages of the two periods of seven years each, he is yet bound to admit that the people of Illinois are no richer in domestic animals than they were seven years ago. But if any of our readers will compare the year 1867 with the average of the first seven years, he will find a gain only of 4 horses, 1¼ mules, and 60 sheep against a loss of 25½ cows and 9 hogs. Or again, if we compare the year 1867 with the year 1860, we find a gain only of seven-tenths of a horse, nine-tenths of a mule, 76 sheep, and 21 hogs, against a loss of 20 neat cattle.

We are surprised beyond measure to find that Illinois cannot show a better record, for if we had been asked to single out one State that could show a large increase in wealth despite the war, we should have named Illinois. Her statements are all that is required to prove the correctness of our assertions. After her, what can we expect of Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and the whole of the South, proverbially stripped of every moving thing during years of war? If the most prosperous agricultural State in the Union, untouched by war, has barely held its own, and in the important item of meat has actually gone backward, what must be the condition of other States less favorably situated, which for years were the meeting-ground of opposing armies and were periodically swept with fire and sword?

If "S. C." has the figures handy, perhaps he can show us what the position of his State is in regard to other articles of food besides meat, comparing the stocks of breadstuffs at the two periods. The reference of our correspondent, however, to the private indebtedness paid off, displays, we think, a delusion which we must take some other opportunity to expose more at length.—Ed. Nation.]

THE "FOG" OF THE IMPEACHMENT QUESTION.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In the Nation of July 9th you ask, "How was it that the great mass of the public in and out of Congress were so completely deceived, and remained so long under the deception, touching the effect of the Tenure-of-Office Act?" . . . "When the President removed Mr. Stanton, the impression became general—we shared it ourselves—that at last he was within the meshes of the law; but it now seems that the main body of the Senators knew all along that this removal had not caught him, and that something else was necessary to bring him to grief." . .

"How was it that the public remained in this fog so long?"

On the 21st of February the Senate adopted the following resolution, with but six dissenting votes, all "Democrats":

"Whereas, The Senate has received and considered a communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant-General of the army to act as Secretary of War ad interim; therefore,

"Resolved, by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office ad interim."

Now, it seems to me that the only "fog" that surrounds this subject is generated by the effort to show that while Messrs. Fessenden and Trumbull could vote as senators that the President had, by the removal of Stanton, violated the "Constitution and laws," they could so soon thereafter vote as judges that he had violated neither. I think we all had good reason to believe in the truthfulness of the resolution of the 21st of February, and I repeat that I certainly think all the "fog" that surrounds the subject is generated by the attempt to show that the duty of a senator is changed the moment he is sworn to sit as a judge, which implies that he is not bound to do his whole duty, to act honestly in all cases, under his oath as senator. J. J. J.

COLUMBUS, O., July 27.

[Without repeating all our former arguments on this question, we shall simply remind our correspondent that there was a wide difference of opinion—which the late trial did not settle—as to what constitutes an impeachable offence, within the meaning of the Constitution. According to the view honestly entertained by any senator would depend his consistency or inconsistency in voting for the resolution above quoted and against the charge of "high crime and misdemeanor." And let us observe that we plunge into a fog as soon as we substitute for the precise terms of the arraignment such vague expressions as "having violated the Constitution and laws." In the next place, we affirm, not for the first time, that there is a very considerable distinction between the legislative or senatorial and the judicial responsibility, and we are disposed to trust and honor the senator who feels this distinction, and avows that he feels it, over one who feels nothing of the sort. And finally, if our correspondent believes that all the elaborate arguments of counsel on both sides, in regard to the intent of an ambiguous statute, were not likely to change the opinions even of some who helped enact it, and that such a change is inexplicable unless dishonorable, we have only to say that he sets a lower value than we do on man's capacity for reason, and extends the reach of human depravity beyond even what theologians have claimed for it.—ED. NATION.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

ONE of the latest—and we suppose it will not be one of the worst—of the twenty or thirty lives of Grant that are, or are to be, in the market, is "Our Standard-Bearer," by Mr. W. T. Adams ("Oliver Optic"). It will be published by Lee & Shepard. There is talk among literary gossipers who write from Boston of a book to be issued by the same firm, written by Mr. William Everett, the author of "On the Cam," which is said to be "after the fashion of 'Tom Brown's School Days at Rugby.'"——Mr. J. S. C. Abbott is going to publish, through B. B. Russell, a "Life of Napoleon III."——Loring will publish Miss Kate Field's lively "Pen Photographs of Dickens," in a new and enlarged edition.——Ticknor & Fields begin to talk about their holiday books. They are to issue an edition of "Locksley Hall," for which Mr. W. J. Hennessy is to do the illustrations; an illustrated edition of Dr. J. W. Palmer's "Poetry of Compliment and Courtship;" an illustrated edition of Whittier's works, which have never in their complete form been published with pictures; "A Christmas Carol," with illustrations by Mr. S. Eytinge, Jr.; two volumes of extracts from Hawthorne's Journal; a volume of Mr. Edward Everett Hale's stories; a volume of Mr. Newman Hall's sermons; and Longfellow's complete poetical works, illustrated. Nothing is said about the new poem by Browning, which "he hopes to make," one correspondent says, "the longest poem in the language;" but the list above given will be held to atone for this house's quiescence—broken only by "The Spanish Gypsy," we believe—during so many weeks. For that matter, there was hardly ever a time when "the trade" generally was doing less than at present.

—The Journal of Speculative Philosophy, which is now rather more than a year old, is a periodical which, in more than one respect, resembles the celebrated "Dial" rather than anything which has appeared since. If it bears any such fruit as that did, it will certainly prove an enterprise of national importance. It owes its existence to the Philosophical Society of St. Louis; and that there should be such a society there is to be attributed largely to the German element in that atmosphere, but probably also to the personal qualities which were requisite to the establishment and, so far, successful conduct of this magazine.

It would seem to be the first design of the editor to engraft upon the American mind the conceptions of German philosophy. At any rate, the most prominent feature of the Journal is its translations from Leibnitz, Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, Schopenhauer, etc. These have been selected with great judgment, and are of permanent value. It has contained, besides, long expositions of Swedenborg, Cousin, and others. Herbert Spencer and Moleschott have been treated from an antagonistic standpoint. Indeed, if these accounts of various philosophers be excepted, the proportion of original matter has been but small. Of this, perhaps the most valuable have been some philosophical and technical criticisms of poetry, music, and painting. The metaphysics has been pretty much confined to an "Introduction to Philosophy" continued through all the numbers. This belongs to the Hegelian school and evinces much thought, but is so excessively brief (objections being but little noticed, and terms not being clearly defined), that it can hardly be of service to a beginner.

The magazine generally breathes Hegelianism. Here is a little example in an extract from an editorial: "There are three styles which correspond to the three grades of intellectual culture. The sensuous style uses simple, categorical sentences, and relates facts, while the reflective stage uses hypothetical ones, and marks relations between one fact and another; it introduces antithesis. The stage of reason uses the disjunctive sentence, and makes an assertion exhaustive, by comprehending in it a multitude of interdependencies and exclusions." The fact that the sensuous stage uses categoricals, the stage of understanding hypotheticals, and that of Hegelian Reason disjunctive propositions, has doubtless been evolved from indeterminateness by a process of Hegelian dialectic. It is a striking illustration of the superior power of that method (or else of its worthlessness), inasmuch as an ordinary statistical enquiry would probably fail entirely to discover anything of the sort. Indeed, upon comparing (by mere enumeration) the relative proportion of disjunctive sentences in some paragraphs of Hegel, said by Mr. Harris (Vol. II., pp. 100–101) to belong to the stage of absolute mediation, with that in a statement of the philosophy of the conditioned by Sir W. Hamilton ("Lectures on Metaph.," p. 526 et seq.), who, as we learn upon the same authority (Vol. II., p. 59), belongs to the stage of reflection, we have found that they are more frequent in the latter.

If the St. Louis gentlemen seriously wish to naturalize the German philosophy in this country, they must be careful to translate German philosophical terms by words which English philosophers have not appropriated long ago to quite other purposes. The translation of "Anschauung" by contemplation instead of intuition, and of "Begriff" by comprehension instead of concept, betrays a contempt for English usage or a want of acquaintance with it.

But the Journal should not be condemned on account of such faults, and if all those "whom the speculative life delights" support it as it becomes them to do, it cannot fail to grow better and to prove a useful stimulant to thought in America.

—San Francisco, and the Pacific coast generally, and, indeed, the whole Western country from Omaha to the Golden Gate, is to have a new magazine of its own. The Overland Monthly is the title of it. It is about the size of the Atlantic, and not unlike that magazine in general appearance inside and outside. It is rather better printed than the Atlantic, though not so well as Lippincott's, and altogether is very creditable to Messrs. A. Roman & Co., its publishers, and Bacon & Co., its printers. Its cover bears the neat device of a grizzly bear standing in anger, and obviously in imminent danger, across the track of the Pacific Railroad. The motto, "You Git," as they say to each other in California, is all he lacks. In fact he "expresses that sentiment" very well as he stands. As for the contents, they will be better by-and-by than now, in this time of the newcomer's infancy; but the first number gives proof of ability in editors and contributors, and the magazine has a healthy look. California has for some reason produced an inordinate number of humorists. Humorists born abroad seem to find that air congenial, and to grow stronger there, as if their feet were on native heath. It was so with Artemus Ward and with John Phœnix, who cannot be said to have been fully licensed as fun-makers till they had gazed on Frisco. We turned, then, on opening the magazine, to find some indication of this quality, and found an excellent specimen of it of a polished kind in the verses entitled "Returned" in the editor's table-talk. Throughout the magazine, from the first article to the end, pleasant humorous touches are frequent, and of an agreeable freshness. The serious verses are all fully up to the level of the older magazines, and one piece, "San Francisco—From the Sea," is very neatly done, and has several pretty and even better than pretty fancies. The prose is nearly all readable, and some of it valuable, as, for instance, the account of Portland-on-Willamett, the capital of Oregon. In another article the Hawaiian population are described in a way that does not give one a very good impression of those mild islanders, who, it seems, hardly repay, by their advance in goodness or greatness, the toils of the missionaries who labor amongst them. Besides these articles we have one on "Art Beginnings on the Pacific," a strange story of "The Diamond-Maker of Sacramento," a specimen of a Chinese novel, and half a dozen others—none sensational, but all looking like an attempt to make an honest magazine of a high class.

—The ever interesting question of human food, and how it may be varied and supplied abundantly, receives two illustrations in the August number of the American Naturalist. Mr. John L. Russell points out the edible qualities of mushrooms, and the small attention they receive from those most concerned to live cheaply and wholesomely. His paper would have been more valuable, it appears to us, if he had furnished some simple criterion for distinguishing the certainly poisonous from the harmless species. Mr. W. T. Brigham continues his notes on tropical fruits, treating in the present paper of the cocoa-nut and the date, neither of which do we eat at its best, and shall not with no better modes of transportation. Mr. W. V. Andrews describes the Japanese Cynthia (silk-worm) which has been introduced into this country, and is found to be very hardy, and to have a strange liking for the odorous ailanthus tree, so abundant and so detested in Brooklyn and this city. The writer refers to some disastrous experiments with the Bombyx mori in the valley of the Connecticut, about thirty years ago, still attested, at least in the neighborhood of Northampton, by the mulberry plantations that have survived the manufacture of the raw material. It is argued plausibly that with this new worm and the prolific ailanthus, the attempt should be renewed to raise cocoons, and make ourselves independent of foreign producers. The capitalists must decide. The strictly scientific article of the present number is that by Mr. George L. Vose, on "Traces of Ancient Glaciers in the White Mountains of New Hampshire," secondary to the continental glaciers. The region under discussion—from Bethel to Gorham—is one of the most charming in New England; and a tourist who should linger a little along the Androscoggin for the sake of discovering glacial scratches (as Mr. Vose directs), might do much worse for his own pleasure, not to speak of his possible contributions to an important enquiry.

—The republication of Vol. I. of Dr. Muir's "Original Sanskrit Texts," which we noticed some months since as in prospect, has recently been made (by Trübner, London, and J. Wiley, in this city). The subject of the volume is the origin of caste—a subject of no small interest, since caste is one of the most characteristic institutions of Brahmanic India, while yet the sacred books of the Brahmans, the Vedas, reach far back of its first development, and show only its inconspicuous germs. The author's method, here as in the other volumes of his series, is to quote all his sources in the original, and to translate them literally, adding his inferences and comments, and citing copiously the views of other writers. In all this work his ample scholarship, his unimpeachable fairness, and his caution and modesty are abundantly exhibited; and the series is well-nigh indispensable to those who desire authentic knowledge respecting Hindoo institutions without being able to command immediate access to Hindoo authorities, as well as highly valuable to those who enjoy such access. The present volume has been expanded from 200 to more than 500 pages. The next to be worked over, we understand, is the third, which discusses the origin, inspiration, and authority of the Vedas, as treated by themselves and by the later Hindoo literature.

—Mr. Hayward, in his recent article on "Macaulay and his School" in the Quarterly, went into the Junius question at considerable length, and quoted from Sir Philip Francis's letters, written at the time when the Junius letters were appearing, to show that of some at least of the latter Francis could not have been the author—at any rate, almost certainly was not the author—because, when they appeared, he was days distant from London making pleasure tours. We do not know that this point was ever made before; we believe it is Mr. Hayward's own. But now the editor of Lippincott's Magazine announces that he has been permitted to examine certain letters—which he cannot publish until after their publication in England—which "fix the authorship on Francis by a piece of circumstantial evidence which will probably carry conviction to the public mind." What the letters are he does not say. They may be from Francis—who had in this country a relative with whom he corresponded, and who was very near coming here himself to restore his fortunes—or they may be the letters of some student of the Junius problem who had better luck than has attended the numerous other laborers in the same field. The "piece of circumstantial evidence" will have to be very strong to shake Mr. Hayward's case or to buttress the case made by Macaulay, Parkes, Taylor, Merivale, and the rest of the Franciscans.

—The tours above-mentioned of Francis and his friends seem to have struck Mr. Hayward unfavorably; but then he entertains more or less contempt for Francis. Francis himself says that on one of them "we travelled like gentlemen and lived like rakes," and in another speaks of "a riotous fortnight at Bath." However, nobody ever pretended that he lived on heights of purity and was other in his manners and morals than the average man of the world in which he lived. The accounts of his rioting are, however, of some importance as evidence going to show that he was travelling like a gentleman and living a rake at a distance from London when the theory of his being Junius requires that he should have been in Woodfall's vicinity doing hard work. Thus in July, 1771, he writes: "Godfrey Tillman, another gent, and I set out on a tour through Derbyshire and propose to reach Manchester;" which accordingly they did, the letters of Junius, meantime, appearing with due regularity. However, we shall doubtless hear from Mr. Hayward again, when the promised American evidence is produced. By the way, it may be remarked that the use of the slang term "gent" in one of the passages above cited seems to indicate another origin of it than that commonly given. It is usual to pronounce it a vulgar abbreviation devised by commercial travellers or shopmen. But it may very likely have been the invention of some young fellows like Francis, barristers and clerks in government offices, accustomed to the legal abbreviation, and, as in all ages since clerks were made, accustomed to "talk shop" in a slangy manner.

—M. Clement Duvernois has recently been doing in the Epoque some French generalizing on the subject of the respect which the English entertain for youth, as shown in their choice of young men for ministers of state. Two or three portfolios, he says, are always kept for the young men. Fox was a minister at 33, Pitt at 23, Lord Palmerston at 29, Sir Robert Peel at 29, Lord Derby at 31, Mr. Gladstone at 34, Lord Stanley at 32; and a great many more names might be cited. They would not, however, the Daily News remarks, prove M. Duvernois' theory correct; and that journal goes on to say that what the Frenchman considers homage to youth is in reality homage to good birth and good connections. Pitt was a minister at 23 to be sure, but Burke died close upon seventy without having ever been a cabinet minister at all. Pitt was the son of an earl, Burke of an Irish attorney. The Marquis of Hartington, the News assures M. Duvernois, was made a minister not on account of British reverence for his small age, but because he is the heir-apparent to a dukedom. This made him secretary of state in a cabinet under which, or its predecessor, veterans like Mr. Lowe, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Stansfeld had to put up with subordinate places. Furthermore, says the News, M. Duvernois might have pointed to instances like that of Palmerston, minister when verging on second childhood, and might have found the same reason for that as for Pitt's being premier while yet a boy—both men had the advantage of aristocratic birth and connections, an advantage which, under the old system, gave the country fifty legislative Lord Verisophts for one Canning. Evidently the News is not afraid of the new constituencies.

"CAMORS."*

THIS latest novel of M. Octave Feuillet is already a year old, but we take occasion, from the recent appearance of an American translation of the work, to offer a few English comments. Let us say, to begin with, that the translation is perfectly bad; that it is equally pretentious, vulgar, and incorrect; and that we recommend no reader who ha the smallest acquaintance with the French tongue to resort to it either for entertainment or for edification. M. Octave Feuillet has been known in France for the past fifteen years as a superior writer of light works—tales, proverbs, and comedies. Those of his plays which have been acted are among the most successful of the modern French theatre, and on perusal, indeed, they exhibit a rare union of strength and elegance. A couple of years ago M. Feuillet was admitted—on the plea, we fancy, rather of his elegance than of his strength—to the French Academy. He has apparently wished to justify his election by the production of a masterpiece. In "M. de Camors" he has contributed another novel to the superior literature of his country.

* "Camors: or, Life Under the New Empire. From the French of M. Octave Feuillet." New York: Bielock & Co. 1868.

One of the most interesting things about M. Feuillet's career, to our mind, is his steady improvement, or, rather, his growth, his progression. His early works treat almost wholly of fine ladies, and seem as if they were meant to be read by fine ladies—to be half-languidly perused in the depths of a satin arm-chair, between a Sèvres coffee-cup and the last number of Le Follet, with the corner of a velvet prayer-book peeping out beneath it. M. Feuillet has a natural delight in elegance—elegance even of the most artificial kind—and this "M. de Camors," the ripest fruit of his genius, with all its nervous strength and energy, is one of the most highly elegant novels we have ever read. But whereas, in his first literary essays, elegance was ever the presiding spirit, she is now relegated to the second rank, and gazes serenely over the shoulders of force. M. Feuillet has gradually enlarged his foundations and introduced into his scheme of society a number of those natural factors which we find in real life to play as large a part as the artificial and conventional. Not that he has not retained, however, all his primitive arts and graces; only, they have lost their excessive perfume, and are reduced to comparative insignificance by being worn abroad in the open air of the world. The long play of "Rédemption" was much better than his short ones: "Dalila" was better still; and "Montjoie" and "M. de Camors" are best of all. Nevertheless, we confess that there is not one of M. Feuillet's comedies and proverbs—"scenes," as he calls them—that we have not read with extreme delight and that we are not willing to read again. It must have been from the first an earnest of future power for the close observer that the author, in spite of the light and unsubstantial character of his materials and the superficial action of his mind, should yet be so excellent a master of dramatic form; but for this excellence—a thoroughly masculine quality—there might have been some truth in the charge that M. Feuillet was a feminine writer. But women assuredly have no turn for writing plays. A play is action, movement, decision; the female mind is contemplation, repose, suspense. In "M. de Camors" the author has simply redeemed the promise, liberally interpreted, of the strong dramatic instincts of "Le Village" and "Alix."

In this work M. Feuillet has attempted to draw a picture of what he calls "one of the most brilliant Parisian lives of our time." He has endeavored to pull off the veil of brilliancy, and to show us his hero in all the nakedness of his moral penury. He has wished to effect a contrast between that face of a man's destiny which he presents to the world and that far other face which meets the eyes of his own soul. He has contrived for this purpose a narrative so dramatic and interesting that we shall briefly repeat its main outline. M. de Camors is the only son of the Count de Camors, who on the threshold of old age finds himself utterly disenchanted with the world. Feeling that he has come to the end of all things, and that his soul is equally indifferent to pleasure and to profit, he indites a long, didactic letter to his son and blows out his brains. This letter—an extremely clever performance—is the profession of faith of an aristocratic cynic. It declares that there are no such things as virtue and vice, and that the sole rule of life is the pursuit of agreeable physical sensations and the maintenance of a perfect equanimity. To be absolutely and consistently selfish is to come as near as possible to being happy. Wealth is essential to comfort and women are useful for pleasure. Children are an unmitigated nuisance—which, by the way, is not very civil to the count presumptive. "To be loved by women," writes the count, "to be feared by men, to be as impassible as a god before the tears of the former and the blood of the latter, to end your life in a tempest—this is the destiny which I have failed to grasp and which I bequeath to you." To cast off all natural ties, instincts, affections, sympathies, as so many shackles on his liberty; to marry only for valid reasons of interest and on no account to have children or friends, to perfect his fencing, to keep his temper, never to cry, and to laugh a little—these are the final injunctions of M. de Camors to his son. They are in many ways cold and pedantic, but they are conceived and expressed with great ingenuity. The young Count de Camors receives his father's bequest as a sacred deposit, and the story relates his attempts to apply practically these select principles. While his father has been occupied in drawing up his last will, he has been engaged in an act of supreme rouerie in the house of an intimate friend. So happy a start in the career of egotism is not to be thrown away, and M. de Camors says amen to the voice from beyond the grave. He forthwith prepares to enter political life, and, betaking himself with this view to a small estate in the country, presents himself as candidate for the Chamber of Deputies. In this region he meets two women—the heroines of the tale. The younger, his cousin, a poor girl in a servile position, and a great beauty, appeals to the reader's interest from the first by offering her hand in marriage to M. de Camors—an overture which he feels compelled to arrest. The young lady subsequently makes a splendid match with an old general of immense wealth The second of M. de Camor's female friends is Mme. de Tècle, a young widow, a charming woman and an admirably-finished portrait. M. de Camors wins the love of Mme. de Tècle and returns it, but is unable, for good reasons, to obtain her hand, which he is not yet sufficient master of his emotions to abstain from soliciting. Mme. de Tècle, to whom virtue is comparatively easy, determines to stifle her passion, or at least to keep it smouldering, by means of a very odd and ingenious device. She offers to bring up her little daughter as the wife of M. de Camors, who in eight years' time, when the girl has arrived at maturity, will have reached the marrying age of a man of his society. This idea and the scene in which Mme. de Tècle unfolds it are, as we say, ingenious; delicate also, and almost poetical; but strike us as unreal, unnatural, and morbid. M. de Camors is by no means enchanted by his friend's proposition; he assents coldly and vaguely and takes his departure, thanking his stars, after all, that Mme. de Tècle had the wit to refuse him.

He becomes engaged in political life and lays the foundation of a large fortune by industrial manœuvres. He works hard, keeps his terms with elegant dissipation, and cherishes the cold precepts of his father. After a lapse of three or four years he renews his relations with his beautiful cousin, now Mme. de Campvallar, but in so depraved (although so dramatic) a fashion that we need not enter into particulars. Mme. de Campvallar is by nature, and with a splendid feminine insolence and grace, just such an audacious and heartless soul as M. de Camors has well-nigh become by culture. The two unite their sympathies, their passions, and their lives. Finally, however, their intrigue is on the point of being discovered by the husband of Mme. de Campvallar—a naïf and honest old warrior, the soul of purity and honor, who esteems with an almost equal warmth his wife and his wife's lover—and an exposure is averted only by the tact and presence of mind of the impenitent marquise. Her husband is concealed and listening: Camors is expected. A motive for their meeting must be improvised within the minute, and a full intelligence of the situation flashed from her eyes into those of her lover. The latter arrives radiant. The pretext is ready. Mme. de Campvallar has sworn that she will not let M. de Camors depart until he has promised to marry—whom?—Mlle. de Tècle. In this way the prayers of Mme. de Tècle are fulfilled, and a third heroine is introduced—a third, and the most charming of all. The scene just indicated is in a dramatic sense, we may add, extremely effective; and if M. Feuillet ever converts his novel into a play (as it is the fashion to do in France), here is a situation made to his hand, strong enough, by itself, to ensure the success of the piece, and admirably fitted to exhibit good acting. M. de Camors, then, marries Mlle. de Tècle and loves Mme. de Campvallar. This is well enough for the latter lady; but the other (who has a passionate childish admiration of her rival) speedily discovers the facts of the matter, and signally fails to reconcile herself to them. M. de Campvallar, whose suspicions, once dispelled, have begun once more to congregate, eventually encounters the most damning confirmation of their truth, and expires under the hideous shock. Mme. de Camors and her mother, more and more alienated from the count, and infected with the most painful impressions touching his relations to the death of M. de Campvallar, no longer conceal their open horror of his character. M. de Camors, on his own side, weary of his mistress, writhing under the scorn of his wife, whose merits he has learned to appreciate, sick of the world and of his own life, dies, without remorse and without hope.

The reader may perceive nothing in this sad story, as we have told it, to justify us in deeming it worthy of repetition; but it is certain that, told by M. Feuillet with all the energy of his great talent, it makes a very interesting tale. The author, indeed, has aimed at making it something more—at writing a work with a high moral bearing. In this we think he has signally failed. To stir the reader's moral nature, and to write with truth and eloquence the moral history of superior men and women, demand more freedom and generosity of mind than M. Feuillet seems to us to possess. Like those of most of the best French romancers, his works wear, morally, to American eyes, a decidedly thin and superficial look.

Men and women, in our conception, are deeper, more substantial, more self-directing; they have, if not more virtue, at least more conscience; and when conscience comes into the game human history ceases to be a perfectly simple tale. M. Feuillet is not in the smallest degree a moralist, and, as a logical consequence, M. de Camors is a most unreal and unsubstantial character, He is at the best a well appointed fop—what the French call a poseur. The lesson of his life is that you cannot really prosper without principles, and that although the strict observance of "honor"—the only principle which M. de Camors recognizes—is a very fine thing in its way, there are sore straits in life from which the only issue is (M. Feuillet would say) through the portals of the Church; or, in other words, that our lives are in our own hands, and that religion is essential to happiness. This is, doubtless, very true; but somehow it is none the truer for M. Feuillet's story. To be happy, M. de Camors apparently needed only to strike a becoming attitude. When M. de Campvallar discovers him in the small hours of the night in his wife's apartment and marches on him furious, he remembers to fold his arms. Another man might have done it instinctively; but we may be sure that M. de Camors did it consciously. And so with Mme. de Campvallar. She is essentially cold, artificial, and mechanical. She is pedantically vicious. For these reasons and many others; from our inability to sympathize either with the delusions or the mortifications of his hero, M. Feuillet's book strikes us simply, as a novel, like any other. Its chief merit, we think, lies in the portraits of Mme. de Tècle and her daughter. Here, too, the author is superficial; but here, at least, he is charming. The virtues—the virtue, we may say, of these two ladies is above all things elegant, but it has a touch of the breadth and depth of nature. The work as a whole is cold and light; but it is neither vulgar nor trivial, and would amply repay perusal if only as a model of neat, compact, and elaborate dramatic writing.

HOW SHALL WE PAINT OUR HOUSES?*

This little book contains much valuable information. Persons who live in the country, as farmers, and who have houses, barns, corn-cribs, ice-houses, and the like, built of frame, and covered with clapboards and shingles, as is the wont in nearly all parts of our country, will find it well to have this book at hand and to study it. All that the author says about the qualities of paints, the relative durability, covering power, and brilliancy of different pigments, the relative purity and usefulness of oils and varnishes, and the best ways of preparing different surfaces, is right in tendency and sound as advice. The chapter on tin roofs ought to be read and remembered by every city indweller, for those roofs have a worse name than they deserve, and various ugly, perishable, and expensive substitutes have been devised, solely on account of the insufficient or actually bad painting the tin roofs get in the first place, and the inadequate care that is taken of them. Flat roofs are not, architecturally speaking, desirable; few buildings can be good in effect with their roofs unseen, nor is there any protection against rain and snow so good as a steep pitch; but if flat roofs must be, let them be the best—"bad 's the best." Charcoaled roofing-tin, well locked together and well soldered, and painted as Mr. Masury advises, makes the best flat roof yet discovered for ordinary purposes.

What the author says about black pigments is very well said; and it has been a much-needed hint that he gives to people in general not to trust the black paints of ordinary commerce. That imperishable pigment, lamp-black, ought to be got pure at any cost, by people who want their painting to be done according to sound principles of economy. For ship-painting it is not unusual, in New York, to use verdigris and lamp-black mixed, a paint that works very well and is quite satisfactorily durable. But for painting iron, both for ship-work and for the store-fronts and other iron constructions now so common, a newly invented metallic paint is used—or mayhap more than one—which seems to answer better under the peculiar circumstances than any of the natural pigments. Mr. Masury does not take notice of any of the inventions and patents which crowd the market, and he is generally right in disregarding what are generally great humbugs, and wasteful of money and patience.

It would have been well if some allusion had been made to the bad trick of blistering which boiled linseed oil teaches to certain colors—Paris green, for instance—when mixed with them, and if the uses of raw oil in this and other such cases had been pointed out. Moreover, the several hints which are given concerning the oils and dryers are scattered through the book, one here, one there, and are nowhere restated in a sequent and orderly manner.

The chapters on harmony and discord of colors, and all that is said about decorative effect, might as well be omitted. It is useless, quite useless, to try to teach people which combinations are harmonious and which are not. "The harmonious combinations of three colors are: Blue and red and yellow, if in proper proportion." That 's the point. Proper proportion is to color-harmony just what position is in chess-playing—everything! The player does not care what pieces he may have, how weak he may be, or how strong his adversary, so he can choose the squares his few pieces are to stand upon. Take his queen away and welcome, so he can choose between K. 3d and K. B. 3d for his knight's post. So in painting. Mr. Masury says we must n't use much green, and it must be of a bright color (p. 182), and that purple and green make always "the worst kind of discord" (p. 179); but we can show to Mr. Masury Byzantine enamels that are more than half deep green, and are splendid in color, not to be matched by modern designers; and for purple and green—well, no two colors are good for much without a third; as Abt Vogler says of his organ notes—noises alone, three together are music; but purple and green and white, or purple and green and gold, will suit well enough any designer who knows how to design. This is not the place to go into the wide and, as we have said, most vexed and unenlightened question of color harmonies; our only point at present is that Mr. Masury's book was not the place either, and that it would be lighter in the hand without the pages so used. It must be added, though, that the views expressed in these chapters are generally sound, and it is quite unusual to find so much evidence of right artistic feeling in a treatise of this kind.

Beyond this we have only faults of detail to point out. The book is curiously unarranged. Chapters viii., ix., and x. are about white pigments, chapter xi. has to do with the theory of color, chapter xii. discourses about color blindness, and chapter xiii. returns to the practical question, and talks of black pigments. And when in a new edition this fault is in process of correction, let the proof-reading tend also to eliminate some rash statements, some meaningless sentences, and some blunders. An instance of the first sort of error we find on page 214, where we are told that reddish-brown is not good with green, and that such a ruddy hue is out of place in the landscape, when no landscape painter but knows that the most seemly houses in the land are the old Dutch farm-houses in Jersey, built of dark red stone, and the next best looking the wooden houses and barns painted red, and grown brown with weather stains and damp. Instances of the second class of mistakes are to be found where it is said (p. 134) that linseed oil does not congeal "till cooled from 4 deg. to 18 deg. below Fahrenheit;" and on page 36, where light cool colors are said to be good for tin roofs, when it is not cool color he means, that is, green or blue, but pale colors, non-absorbent of heat. The cool colors would work badly enough on tin, and wear not at all well. And for the actual blunders, the confounding of lazulite with lapis-lazuli, on page 99, will do as well as any to show what sort of errors we mean.

The book is good enough to be made better in a second edition, which we hope to see very soon.

THE MAGAZINES FOR AUGUST.

The magazines for August are decidedly light reading, but there is none of them, we believe, that does not contain some things which it is worth while to look at. One of them—Lippincott's—has an article which it would be well if every man and woman in the country would read with careful attention. We speak of Mr. Amasa Walker's "Claims of the Bondholders." The writer, who is an authority on this particular subject, begins by classifying the bondholders, and shows that the "bloated" bondholder is a rare variety of the species; that most of the men—four-fifths of them—who hold our public securities are people who either directly or indirectly paid its value in gold for every bond which they bought, and who are simply robbed if repaid in promises to pay. Secondly, he shows what the effect would be on credits in general if we were to act on the wild suggestion of certain politicians who wish for a new issue of greenbacks with which to cancel the national debt. The article is a valuable contribution to the popular literature of the subject, and ought to be widely circulated. Mr. Leonard Kip is the writer of a very pleasant piece entitled "Alas, Poor Ghost!" Mr. Kip once, for his sins, had charge of a young woman of seventeen who was coming East from California in order to finish her education. She was a natural born flirt of the most dangerous and fascinating description—one who was very sorry, but, having it in her blood, could not help it. By chance the pair had to wait at the Isthmus for the steamer, and, on invitation, stayed for a week at the country seat of a certain Don Miguel. There the young woman surreptitiously—for she was under promise to behave as an invited guest should—got up a flirtation with Don Vasco Nunez de Balboa, who, it appears, haunts the residence in question, and unscrupulously she trifled with his feelings. The humor of the article is better than the romance of it, but as a whole it merits a good deal of praise. So does not Miss Brewster's "In a Month," which is in the style of the author of Charles Auchester, and which does not atone for its imitativeness by any valuable things of its own. "Smoking," by J. V. Darling, successfully answers in a scoffing vein Mr. Parton's recent article, "Does it Pay to Smoke?" It does pay some people, Mr. Darling thinks—that is, it probably does; he will not pronounce absolutely till science has something more definite to say than she has said yet. "Our Monthly Gossip" is always good gossip of the literary sort, and this month it is particularly interesting.

* "A Popular Treatise on the Art of House Painting, Plain and Decorative, showing the Nature, Composition, and Mode of Production of Paints and Painters' Colors, and their Proper and Harmonious Combination and Arrangement. By John W. Masury." New York: D. Appleton & Co.

In the August Atlantic Mr. Parton has a companion piece to the one of which we have just made mention. "Will the Coming Man drink Wine?" is the question now propounded. The article has rather less of Mr. Parton's own personal feeling in it than the other, but has no scientific value. The Coming Man will pretty certainly not drink wine, we are assured. As for spirituous and malt liquors, they are not to be thought of in connection with the millenarian; them, at all events, he will not touch. It is an animated, readable article, and adds this much to what we already know in regard to the point in controversy—that Mr. Parton is persuaded that a man is better off if he abstains wholly from wine. That man, coming or come, is not all "physical;" that you have said not very much about him and the universal craving of man for stimulants when you have told us some of the effects of strong drink on the body; that the doctors most decidedly disagree—these and similar little matters Mr. Parton does not get fully before his reader's mind. We do not see that the reviewer of "A Modern Lettre de Cachet" makes out a case against Mr. Davis, the writer of the article so named. In effect he says, what we all believe, that the present condition of the insane is very far better than their former condition, that the medical fraternity are honest men, and that it is very difficult to tell a truly insane person shamming sanity from a sane person. It is just at this last point that need is seen for the most careful legislative supervision to prevent errors and crimes that may, by possibility, be frightfully common. "St. Michael's Night" continues to be a very fresh and agreeable little story, with plenty of old-fashioned love in it, and plenty besides. "Out on the Reef" will be found excellent. Hardly anybody knows anything about the Florida keys, and it is a wonderful region. The writer has noticeable ability in word-painting of the genuine sort—for proof of which see his picture of the shark and of the return of the boat to the fort. The article is in the best style of the writing which military men on the frontiers are apt to do—that kind of literature which reads as if a well-educated young fellow, full of youth and good feeling, fond of adventure, had written home a more than ordinarily careful letter. "Lost and Found" is by Mrs. Prescott Spofford, and is agreeable reading; one would hardly know it to be hers if her name were not given. But then she has two manners, one of which—the least accustomed one, we are sorry to say—gives pleasure. "De Piscium Natura" is some very lively talk about fish-ways. Mr. Bayard Taylor goes to Ischia and comes away thinking that his oratory has not had a great effect in disposing the peasantry to be virtuous republicans. There is apparently an attempt on Mr. Taylor's part in these latest letters to strike a little higher than was his wont, and to emulate certain other travellers in the literary graces that come by cultivation—if previously they have not come by nature. "Cretan Days" is better. "Ideal Property," an article not sufficiently popular in style of handling, will yet give most people new ideas in regard to our Patent Office system. Mr. Shanly, in "Convivial Songs," says that we have all lost confidence in our intoxicating liquors, and that we therefore decline to sing bacchanalian staves. The custom of "perpendicular drinking" would be enough to destroy convivial songs in this country. It is necessary, however, to cover the case of other countries, and we take the truth of the matter to be this—that old one which accounts for so many things—we are too busy, all we western nations; we cannot afford to tarry nearly so long at the wine as our fathers did. The age has some boyishness in it somewhere, probably, but not enough, we suppose, to allow of its sitting in taverns as its predecessors did for want of something better to do. It reads the newspapers, and does an amount of work that would have astonished its festive fathers, and, even when it drinks, talks of what it does and what it reads rather than lifts up its voice in song. The only comic songs that can be called popular now are the outrageously absurd, those which express reaction against pressure rather than natural mirth. The poetry of this Atlantic is by Mr. Tuckerman and Mr. Lowell, the "Lines to C. S." not being by the latter, and "The Footpath" not being by the former.

"Saved by a Bullet" is, perhaps, as good as anything in this month's Galaxy. It is a war story by J. F. Fitts, who is, we believe, at the head of the writers who utilize their battle-field experiences in the lighter magazines. His "Saved by a Bullet" is effectively told. Doctor Hammond has a second article about the nerves, and seems to be making some excellent chapters of a popular physiology or physiological psychology. "Two Artists of Comedy" treats of Miss Maggie Mitchell and of Miss Mary Gannon, and seems to us very good in what it says about the first-named of these actresses, and to show real critical ability. The last part takes the form and has the value of mere eulogy. This bold deliverance of the author on the much misunderstood subject of tragedy is worth quoting:

"What is required is not tragedy; even Shakespeare cannot reconcile us to that, for acted tragedy is in itself a vast deformity. It is not a natural, pleasant thing to witness bloody death brought to our very feet, to see the expiring struggles, to listen to the last groans, of butchered humanity. The player's potent art is to show us the inward workings of the mind, to interpret for us the moral sense struggling from within, inciting to noble deeds and gracious lives. Tragedy pushes nature to the wall, and shows us nothing but her agonized contortions of the body," etc.

"A Journey through Mongolia;" two pleasant articles; "The Galaxy Miscellany;" two well-told love stories, one of which is only begun; some "Driftwood" and "Nebulæ," and so on, make this number of the magazine good watering-place reading. The poetry is by H. H., and Mr. E. R. Sill.

"Clouds that are cool, for all their color," seems to be the one good line in the many of "A Tropical Morning at Sea."

Putnam's calls for little comment this month. The literary notices and the "Table-Talk" are not so "genial" as formerly. The critical remarks on Ristori, for instance, seem to us to state the truth about that lady's powers as an actor more nearly than anything else that has been published. Doctor J. W. Palmer's "Three Graces—a Madrigal" we took the pains to read three or four times, out of respect for the "Poetry of Compliment and Courtship;" but it was only a little more intelligible at last than it was at first, and will be found enigmatic, we should think, by most who run through it. "A Morning among Autographs" gives interesting letters by Raleigh, Charlotte de la Tremoille, her husband, the Earl of Derby of Charles the First's time, Pope, Temple, and other celebrities. The "Journal of a Poor Musician," of which we had hopes, turns out, we are ashamed and sorry to say, a love story of the most unblushing kind. The poor music teacher, from whom, we flattered ourselves, we were to get sound and even profound remarks on one and another of the old masters, devotes himself to burning up inwardly for the wealthy young pupil; sitting at the piano with a bitter heart, he plays the lady out of a bay window away from her lover, across the twilight parlor, to the music-stool; passionately he gazes at her; in a wild moment he avows his seething love, and will marry her as soon as she comes of age, the handsome young colonel who would have had her having been refused in favor of the man of genius and interpreter of the soul. "Our Civil Service" talks on the right side, but not very well. "The Romance of the Great Gaines Case" is timely and interesting; Miss Alice Cary's "Cradle Song" is good but for the refrain, and better by much than her "Worldly Wise," which we forgot in speaking of the Atlantic; "The Wedding at the Parker House" did not take place in School Street, but away down on the Caloosalahatchie, and is amusing reading—which papers make up the body of Putnam's for August.

The Catholic World follows the example of its secular contemporaries, and devotes itself this month, with considerable success, to being light and entertaining. "Anecdotical Memoirs of the Emperor Nicholas" (translated) will be read with interest. The relator of the anecdotes was a French page in the emperor's service, and had good opportunities to learn his character. He seems to have lived in a wholesome fear of the despot, and not to have got thoroughly over it yet. "The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore" is, for its facts, worth reading; "Newman's Poems," we think, is not, though the writer seems to know well both his subject and the poet. Two men, better known by name than otherwise to the readers of magazines, are Count Segur and Count Ladislas Zamoyski, who each have an article appropriated to them. "A New Face on an Old Question" is well named, the author, who is a forcible writer, being better able, apparently, to put new faces on questions than to answer the questions themselves. So, too, are "The Catholic Church and the Bible," one of those controversial papers in which he who looks for simple candor and a perfectly honest statement of the case will look in vain. We are able and glad to commend to our readers "An Italian Girl of Our Day." It is a beautiful picture of a most pathetic death-bed.

A new story is begun in Harper's, "Parole d'Honneur," which reminds one of "Inside: A Story of Secession." It is as true in its local coloring as that remarkable picture of Southern life, and is very well worth attention. The "Easy Chair" is at its easiest this month in its discoursing about Arcadia and the National Institute; the artists have been "Upon the Amoor" and with "John Bull in Abyssinia" and "Among the Andes of Peru and Bolivia"; the American tourist photographing England tells about the English press; another one photographs the French Corps Législatif; "How Fort McAllister was Taken" is for the insatiate patriotism of Harper's readers; "The Woman's Kingdom" is but one of several stories, and, altogether, we do not know why, if we read magazines, we would not rather have the August Harper's than any of the others.

Hours at Home begins, as usual lately, with something from the "Lambeth Casual"—"Music for the Million," of which we need say nothing, as everybody knows Mr. Greenwood's ready writing on vagabondism in all its branches. General John A. Bolles writes some good sense and some very good nonsense, which he calls "Extracts from the Proceedings of the Mutual Admiration Society." There is no particular fault to be found with Mr. G. M. Towle's account of Disraeli, which will be read with interest by persons who have little knowledge of Disraeli's career. Mr. Towle is mistaken in thinking his hero was ever a Jew in religion. "My Acquaintance with the King of Italy," translated from the German of Dr. Xaver Braun, offers a view of Victor Emanuel which is to us quite new—whether true or not could better be told if we knew more of Dr. Braun. The King has been very much belied, or Dr. Braun is very much mistaken in the estimate he gives of his patron's character. He makes him a good man, a lover of his wife, and a cool and wise monarch, instead of the sabreur he is commonly taken to be; yet what the doctor tells does not consort badly with things that d'Azeglio says. "Matthias Claudius" is a posthumous paper by Dr. Harbaugh, who naturally much admired the pious satirist. A fairly good review of "The Spanish Gypsy" closes the magazine, hardly a good enough review to merit special mention of it, were it not that we have previously spoken explicitly and unfavorably of the general run of reviews in Hours at Home. Besides the articles above mentioned, we may call attention to a carefully prepared paper by Colonel Vandenbergh, entitled "The City of New York Ten Years Hence."

---

Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen. (History of the Primitive Religions of America.) Von Prof. J. G. Müller. Zweite unveränderte Auflage. (Basel: 1867. New York: L. W. Schmidt.)—This work was first published in 1855, and the present assurance of its title-page that it is a "second unaltered edition" is calculated to excite suspicion in the scholar; for, in the meantime, many later writings, based, too, for the most part on personal observation, have thoroughly exposed a host of errors blindly copied by Müller after irresponsible authorities, together with much in which no dependence can be placed. A second "revised and improved edition" that should bring light and uniformity to the orthographical chaos prevailing in the first, avoid such blunders as, for example, confounding the Vaudoux religion of the Haytian negro with the worship of Votan in Chiapa, and, finally, adopt the results of the latest investigations, would certainly have been more desirable. A careful comparison of the two editions reveals the fact that the difference between them consists in this, that the unsold copies of 1855 were provided with a new title-page and new covers, and docked a little above and below, for a fresh introduction to the market.

Of course this procedure has no necessary relation to the value or worthlessness of the book, and Prof. Müller may safely lay claim to the honor of having furnished for his time the completest and most orderly presentation of his subject, and, indeed, all that was possible. Especially praiseworthy is his triumph over the manifold obstacles which he encountered in gathering original information in Europe. The chief work which America possessed at that time was a few volumes of the "History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States," of which the editing had been entrusted by Government to Mr. Schoolcraft—the most unfortunate selection for such a purpose that could have been made—who, guided by his prejudices, fell from one preposterous opinion into another, particularly in matters of religion. In his solid work of 707 pages, Müller first treats of the "Savages"—that is to say, the Northern Redskins, the inhabitants of the Greater Antilles, the Caribs, and the inhabitants of eastern South America—and next of the "Civilized Peoples," including the Peruvians, the Muyscas, and the Mexican tribes. The principal theses which he seeks to maintain are: 1st, that the Indians did not derive their religions from the Old World; 2d, that the origin of religion is to be sought in the human spirit; 3d, that the differences of the American primitive religions were due to the varied relations of the American tribes to nature—in which connection it is remarked (pp. 89–90) that in the South nature-worship, with the sun at its head, in the North veneration of spirits, with fetichism, prevailed.

---

In the School-room. Chapters in the Philosophy of Education. By John S. Hart, LL.D., Principal of the New Jersey State Normal School. (Philadelphia: Eldredge & Brother. 1868.)—Three chapters of this book—the second, the fourth, and the twenty-fifth—contain some practical hints on the "art of questioning," "modes of hearing recitations," and "practice teaching," which may be of service to teachers. The other chapters, with the exception of the twenty-sixth, which contains some extremely amusing examples of inattention and misapprehension of the meanings of words on the part of some of Mr. Hart's pupils, are, we suppose, strictly devoted to the "philosophy of education." Things are so much at cross-purposes in this world that the professional teacher, who ought to be one of the most philosophical of men, is very often one of the least so—which is a conclusion we arrived at long before this book was published, and which we are sorry to find strengthened by our reading of it. It is commonplace in thought, and tedious and verbose in style, and betrays a habit of mind which is, we fear, too apt to be induced in persons who spend the whole or a considerable portion of their lives in a school-room with young people, but which needs to be vigorously eschewed—not sanctioned either by precept or example. Outside of the school-room, the teacher who wishes to affect his fellow-creatures not unpleasantly should guard against the wish to make himself intelligible to the meanest capacities, against a trick of reiteration which tells better on infants than on grown people, and against a too-confident self-assertion. All these tendencies war, in this book, against the success of a "philosophy of education" which, at its best, was perhaps not too philosophical.

---

Marietta: A Novel. By T. A. Trollope, author of "Gemma," "A Tuscan Romeo and Juliet," etc. (Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers 1868.)—Marietta is a story of Italian life, the scene of which is laid in Florence. It contains some much elaborated and probably correct descriptions of scenery and manners in that region, and except the fact of its existence, it has no positively bad thing about it. Mr. Trollope has good eyes and a ready pen, and understands well enough the business of novel-making. We do not, however, call him a good observer, nor a good writer, nor a good novelist, for the reason that it appears to us that to observe means more and other than to see—that to write well something more is necessary than a grammatical acquaintance with one's vernacular speech—and that to tell a story acceptably requires discrimination, tact, and subtlety, none of which qualities Mr. Trollope possesses in any such marked degree that he inclines his reader to believe that a spiritual necessity forced him into the profession of literature. This story bears a strong resemblance in many particulars to its forerunner, "Gemma," which was published by the Petersons last winter. We have again a hero who is tacitly engaged to one young woman while he loves and finally marries another. The incident of an attempt at slow poisoning also occurs, and Mr. Trollope displays anew that hearty aversion to popery and priestcraft which forms so marked a feature of the truly British mind. In "Gemma" a renegade priest attempts an act of violence upon a fair penitent at the confessional; in Marietta a priest tries to poison another ecclesiastic in order to gain possession of money which will enable him to prosecute his design of becoming a cardinal—in time, perhaps, a pope. "Marietta" is a novel, but, really, to people in search of light reading for the hot weather we should recommend almost anything—Rollin's Ancient History—in preference.

---

Familiar Quotations; being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in Common Use. By John Bartlett. Fifth edition. (Boston: Little, Brown & Co.)—This work, itself become almost a household word, was born of thorough and conscientious painstaking, joined of course to good scholarship, and was at first perhaps as complete and accurate as any one man could have made it. A not uncommon fate for it would have been to be stereotyped and sold as long as there was a demand for it, the fact that it was the only book of the kind (at least in point of fulness) ensuring a pretty continuous demand, and the labor necessary to make a better discouraging competition. We consider it very honorable to the author, as well as creditable to our literature, that he did not thus abandon the public, for the sake of ease or profit, but has persistently sought to improve his collection by fresh researches, in which he has obtained the aid of many scholars, until now in a fifth edition, wholly new, and of unrivalled typographical beauty, he may be said to have fairly acquitted himself of further exertion. Comparing this with the fourth edition, we find it greatly enlarged and carefully revised, and to a considerable extent rearranged. In one or two instances the saying hitherto ascribed to one author is transferred on better authority to another, but we have not discovered any quotations omitted that have been already stamped familiar. Among the accessions are Chaucer, Fielding, and Whittier, and, what is perhaps most surprising, Dickens. "A Pickwickian sense," for instance, was as sure of immortality in 1866 as it is now. Perhaps, too, we should have expected Mr. Micawber's "waiting for something to turn up" to turn up with the other popular phrases with which Dickens has supplied us. But we imagine that he must be exactly an author to test Mr. Bartlett's judgment severely. Though his works are among those of which people pride themselves on having read every one, we know that there are persons who can see no fun in Pickwick, and that Dickens has a slang currency which must needs be as transitory as all slang; and after all it is the characters far more than their speeches which are familiar. Nor can every one expect to find his pet phrase in a collection like this. If he could, we should have a score of quotations from Mr. Lowell's "Biglow Papers," whereas not one is given.

In the face of experience, à priori assumptions of deficiency are of little worth. The five thousand people who have bought, and the hundred thousand, more or less, who have consulted Mr. Bartlett's store, have, we venture to say, been gratified and enlightened as they wanted to be ninety-nine times to one where they have been disappointed, much more deceived. And if the authors themselves could in all cases be heard, what blessings would they not invoke on the compiler who has determined suum cuique!

---

Celebrated Sanctuaries of the Madonna. By Rev. J. Spencer Northcote, D.D., President of St. Mary's College, Oscott. (London: Longmans. New York: L. Kehoe.)—This book contains a series of essays incorporating the legends connected with different places in Europe where the Virgin Mary receives especial reverence on account of miracles attributed to her. Some of the stories are pretty well known, as the greater part of the story of our Lady of La Salette; others are matter that is always flying about the world of discussion, like the account of the winking-pictures at Rome; others still are new to us. The tendency of some is to show the Madonna as a mediator between her Son and his rebellious people—see the "Lady of La Salette," p. 180, where the apparition, supposed to be the Mother of God in person, says to the two children to whom she appears, brilliant as the sun: "If my people will not submit themselves, I must let the hand of my Son fall upon them; it is so strong, so heavy, that I can keep it up no longer. If I wish my Son not to abandon you, I am obliged to pray to Him without ceasing, and yet you pay no regard to all this. Whatever you may do, you can never recompense all the trouble that I have taken in your behalf." She then goes on to say that if the potatoes are spoiled and the harvest about to fail, it is because the people swear and do not keep Sunday holy, and repeats that her Son will have his way and punish them in spite of her prayer if they do not repent. The result of this apparition is that all that part of France is agitated, and the controversy rages hotly as to whether the children spoke the truth or not. Further result is to be found in the tears and prayers and vows of the innocent and faithful peasantry, who, it seems, were hardly as bad, taken all together, as the apparition represented when such abundance of conversions did incontinently reward her.

Other legends are without point, except as marvels—

> "'Bout churches like balloons conveyed,
> With aeronautic martyrs,
> And wells made warm where holy maid
> Had only dipped her garters."

Such are the story of the "Holy House of Loretto," the veritable cottage, that is to say, which the Virgin inhabited in Nazareth, and in which Gabriel saluted her as the mother of Christ, which cottage the author proves to have been preserved in Nazareth twelve hundred years, to have been conveyed miraculously to Fiume, in Dalmatia, in 1291, and to have been removed thence to Loretto, in Italy, in 1294, where it yet remains. The most completely meaningless of all the legends are those which describe the winking of the pictures of the Madonna.

The gross materialism of many of these tales, their appeals to childish or rustic wonder, and the barbarous way in which a strange story which cannot be disproved is accepted as an instructive and comforting truth, are sad and sickening. But it is not in this way alone that God and his councils are degraded. Listen to the priest at Loretto, who, when the Dalmatians came weeping to the church, praying Mary to return to Fiume, "was obliged to exert his authority to restore order and enforce silence, for their prayers were so earnest that he could not but fear that God would listen to their request"!

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers. | Price |
|---|---|---|
| Bauerman (H.), A Treatise on the Metallurgy of Iron | (Virtue & Yorston) | $2 50 |
| Biddle (Horace P.), Poems | (Hurd & Houghton) | 1 50 |
| Colburn (Z.), The Gas-Works of London | (D. Van Nostrand) | 0 60 |
| Harrison (W. B.), The Mechanic's Tool-Book | (D. Van Nostrand) | 2 50 |
| Henshaw (Mrs. S. E.), Our Branch and its Tributaries | (Alfred L. Sewell) | |
| Holy Bible, illustrated by Doré, Part 29 | (Robert Turner) | 1 00 |
| La Fontaine's Fables, illustrated by Doré, Part 14 | (Robert Turner) | 0 40 |
| Lanman (C.), Dictionary of the U. S. Congress, Fifth ed. | (T. Belknap & H. E. Goodwin) | |
| Moos (H. M.), Hannah; or, A Glimpse of Paradise, a Tale | (H. M. Moos) | |
| Nordhoff (C.), Cape Cod and All Along Shore, Stories | (Harper & Bros.) | |
| Pictorial History of the Rebellion, Parts 33, 34, and last | (Harper & Bros.) | |
| Plympton (G. W.), A System of Instruction in the Practical Use of the Blowpipe. | (D. Van Nostrand) | 2 00 |
| Smith (Dr. Wm.), The New Testament History | (Harper & Bros.) | |

Fine Arts.

THE FINE ARTS OF JAPAN.

IV.

A WRITER in an English weekly, describing some of the Oksai designs, speaks of one picture which represents "a man pelting, with what might seem sugar-plums, an uncouth devil crouching and lamenting; he gives himself up to his fate, but feels it acutely. This fantastic figure appears to us the very idea of a Caliban; no European imagination, as far as we know, has approached so closely to that Shakespearian type. In another design a nearly similar Calibanic devil is bound to a tree."

These two pictures occur in one of the most encyclopædic and miscellaneous in subject-matter of the Oksai series. The first-named design is the opening one, and fills the first page. The particular race of demons of which he is one, figures largely in Japanese pictorial art; they are like stalwart men, with savage and animal faces, and sometimes with short, straight horns—not at all like the curved horns of the god of agriculture; for the rest, they are excessively over-muscular, knotted all over with great bundles of thews; not so very much coarser and uglier than the Hercules Farnese, but, equally with him, caricatures of manly strength. Their other peculiarities are long nails like claws on hands and feet, and a thin growth of long, bristly hairs over the whole body. The artistic conception of the creature is perfect, the characteristics are as accurately marked as in careful studies from life. These and other man-like monsters compare favorably with any similar creations of European art; indeed, the only type which is so complete and so seemingly possible is the classical imagination of satyrs and fauns. And it is as the equivalent in Japanese mythology of that type that this anthropomorphic Sylvan appears; generally he is harmless, and in one large picture we find two of the race carrying fish and other burdens, as if they had earned or killed and were taking home their dinners. But the idea of harmfulness is connected with them, it is evident, for the heroes are often engaged in destroying them. In one case a stern warrior has overcome one of them; the demon is sprawling upon his face, the hero stands upon him, threatening him with a formidable halberd held at his head; the whole design reminds one of the St. Michael of the Louvre. In another case a hero has swept off the head of a gigantic fiend—fiery red he is, with longer horns; in still another, with a direct downward blow of his keen sword the warrior has cut off the left arm of the monster, who has caught the amputated limb in his right hand, and is grinning savagely at his enemy. And again, four or five armed men have attacked a gigantic being of slightly different race, and are cutting at him with their swords.

But, as the great god Pan was in form only another satyr, so there are some of these strange creatures who seem to have rank among the higher divinities. The Oksai print of the thunder-demon spoken of in our last shows one of these; in the ancient drawing the type is different, and on the page opposite to this is another who is probably a wind-god; he carries behind him on both shoulders an immense burden, as of something tied up in a sheet, and from each end of this where it is gathered up in his hand there issues what seems a blast of wind. He may very well be a Boreas or Eurus. In this cut is to be noticed the free flight of the creature, who is wingless, and as mere a satyr, so to speak, as the other, but who seems perfectly at home in the air, while losing nothing of the gross look, as of a lower nature, of the tribe he belongs to.

The power, whatever it ought to be called, whether imagination or creative fancy, which conjures up such non-existent and yet credible seeming beings, as if inhabitants of another planet, like this in its physical conditions, is a rare gift. Simple ugliness and repulsive monstrosity of detail is nothing; the ridiculous fiends of Moritz Retzsch's illustrations to "Faust" are ugly enough, and Gustave Doré's nightmare fancies are sickening enough, to be impressive, if such qualities could make them so; but they remain trifling and feeble. The best designer of fairies and brownies and visions of the night is perhaps George Cruikshank, who has done many such things better than anybody else; but he has never drawn demons au sérieux, as if he believed in them. The devil in human shape he has managed well, as in the "Tales of Other Days" and in "Peter Schlemihl," but otherwise he represents the arch-enemy and his followers, as in the "Ingoldsby Legends," in the most conventional way, like the heading of a penny ballad, with horns, hoofs, and tails complete, neither terrible nor funny. William Blake's fiends in the Dante illustrations are not in his best manner, except in respect to the admirable treatment of the malicious and brutal faces; their furniture of wings and claws is not impressive. His Satan in the Job is a great thought, but—and this remark will apply to most of the better class of modern designing—Milton's Satan sat for the portrait, which is therefore angelic and sublime in evil. As regards the Christian painters and carvers before the fifteenth century, they cared only to display the complete triumph of Christ and of his saints, and to make the evil beings contemptible and ridiculous, as Vice and Satan are the clowns of the monkish drama. The exceptions—as the grand, swift, inevitable Death in the Orcagna fresco at Pisa, and Tintoretto's Evil Angel of the Temptation at Venice—are not numerous enough to change the general law. Such genius as those men's is always hors de règle, the fact in this case being that their genius remained outside of the rule, and did not make new rules for a new race of beings, as the Greeks did for their satyrs, and as the Japs have done, we think, for their "Calibans." The Northern designers were generally contented with ugly conglomeration of parts, swine's snout and goat's horns, and seem to have desired nothing less than dignity and terror. Even Albert Dürer's "Sin," in the engraving of the Knight and Death, is merely an ugly abortion made up of incongruous parts; which is what Dürer meant him to be, as something more than a hint that he considered sin itself as a thing of just the same sort.

The Japanese designer, not a Christian that he should show evil overcome finally and for ever by good, has thought to make the strong and brave man sufficient unto himself in all his contests with inferior powers of evil; and to him, as to the Greek, evil has seemed in its essence inferior to good. In all the designs we find no trace of men tormented or oppressed by superior force. The comic pictures show dreadfully frightened men flying from apparitions; but the warriors are never discomfited; they who fight, it seems, can win.

One wholly inexplicable being is in outward show an ape—not a monkey-like man, but a perfect ape, long-armed and hairy, and of human stature. The strange thing about him is the magical power he seems to have of breathing a vapor from his mouth, or throwing a dust from his hands, which takes the form of little men, armed with staves. In one picture he is discomfiting a Chinese-looking, chimerical monster of no particular shape; the little breath-born pigmies assail the hobgoblin, who flies in dismay.

The nearest approach to the triumph of evil over men that we have found in Japanese art is in the case of some carvings in ivory. A siren is figured with her victims around her. Two skeletons, one playing on a guitar, the other gesticulating with bony arms, kneel or crouch among skulls, as if upon the bed of the ocean; and from the eye of one of the skulls the succuba in question has emerged. She holds a fan, and her hair streams down her back; she stands between the skeletons, and seems desirous to fascinate other victims. Another group, also carved in ivory, has some to us entirely incomprehensible accessories, and in this the siren and one of the skeletons hold jars, covered jars, as if of wine or some luxury. In both of these groups the female seems at first to be fish-tailed, as if a mermaid; but the tapering form is only drapery, which is being drawn slowly through the eye of the skull, and the whole expresses nothing so much as spiritual, disembodied, or bodiless form. The same idea is conveyed in the same way in the picture representing ghosts; they arise from grave-mounds, when some friend of the departed comes to sit beside the tomb, and hover over him, or, as sometimes is the case, they try to inspire terror; and in all the pictures representing them they are fully formed at head and shoulders, and taper off or fade away, flowing hair and garments together, into nothingness.

Here and there is a hint of Christianity, or at least of such Roman Catholic externals of Christianity as a Japanese of the eighteenth century might remember to have heard of in his youth. Two instances occur in which the sudden apparition of a nun-like figure with an aureole has startled a man, in the one case, into headlong flight, and in another case into violent aggressive action. But in general it is remarkable how seldom anything appears to remind us that Christianity had at one time gained a footing upon the Japanese islands, a position recognized and apparently well established.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.
Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, N. Y.

SCHOOL-SPEAKER.

The Advertiser wishes to publish, the coming season, a SCHOOL-SPEAKER adapted to the GRADE of GRAMMAR SCHOOLS, also one for Small Children, and desires to arrange with some Gentleman to compile and arrange one or both books.

Address, until August 20, 1868,
B. B. R., Publisher,
Box 2166, Boston, Mass.

ON TUESDAY:

THE HALF-DOLLAR SERIES
OF

Good Reading for Half Hours.

"Just the books for the steamboat or rail-car, and equally interesting at home."

1. MATHIEU ROPARS. By Wm. Young, Esq. 16mo, 50 cents.
2. FOUND AND LOST, AND OTHER STORIES. 16mo, 50 cents.

To be followed by other popular works, neatly printed in snug pocket volumes.

II.

PUTNAM'S MAGAZINE

FOR AUGUST

Is a number of special interest and ability. It has eighteen articles, all readable, and some of them unusually notable. Price 35 cents.

IN PRESS:

DRAWING WITHOUT A MASTER. From the French of E. Cave.
THE AMAZON: A Novel. From the German.
TOO TRUE: A Story of To-day.
RURAL HOURS. By Miss Cooper.
DE SOTO'S CONQUEST OF FLORIDA. By Theo. Irving, LL.D.
NETTIE RENTON; or, The Ghost: A Christmas Story.
THE CARPENTER: A Christmas Story. With Illustrations by Nast.
THE AMERICAN LIBRARY OF FOREIGN LITERATURE. A series of the best works of modern German and French authors. Copyright editions, with the author's sanction.

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,
661 Broadway.

THE BROADWAY

FOR AUGUST

CONTAINS:

I. BRAKESPEARE; or, The Fortunes of a Free Lance
By the Author of "Guy Livingstone."
Chapter XLV. The Assault.
XLVI. The Dream.
XLVII. The Storm.

II. THE AMERICAN LITERATI AT HOME. By George Makepeace Towle, United States Consul at Nantes.

III. HOW WE STARTED THE "UNICORN."

IV. "A SECRET OF THE CONFESSIONAL." By Hesba Stretton. Chapter II.

V. THE LAST OF LILIAN. By Clement W. Scott.

Frontispiece, Title-page, Index, etc., to Volume.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
PUBLISHERS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Jesus: An Answer to Strauss. By the late Dr. J. F. I. Tafel, Librarian at Tübingen. Price, $1 50.

Letters to a Man of the World. From the French of J. F. E. Le Boys des Guays. Price, $1 50.

Deus-Homo (God-Man.) By Theophilus Parsons, LL.D. Price, $2 50.

The Authenticity of the Gospels. By A Layman. Price, $1.

The Doctrine of Life. From the Latin of Emanuel Swedenborg. Price, 75 cents.

A Commentary on Matthew. By Rev. Wm. Bruce, London. An Exposition of the Internal Sense. Price, $4.

Swedenborg, the Philosopher. By R. L. Tafel, Ph.D. Price, $2 25.

Who was Swedenborg? By Rev. O. P. Hiller, London. Price, 50 cents.

The Temple of Solomon. By Rev. T. O Paine. Plates. Price, $6.

The Growth of the Mind. By Sampson Reed. Price, $1.

C. Scribner & Co. — Nichols & Noyes.
J. B. Lippincott & Co. — Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.—NEW EDITION.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON,

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in common use. By JOHN BARTLETT. FIFTH EDITION, revised and greatly enlarged. 16mo, cloth, pp. 790, $3.

"The fourth edition of 'Familiar Quotations' was published in 1863. The present edition embodies the results of the later researches of its editors, besides the contributions of various friends, and includes many quotations which have long been waiting a favorable verdict on the all-important question of familiarity. A few changes have been made in the arrangement, and the citations from Shakespeare have been adapted to the principal modern editions. The former edition has been freshly compared with the originals, and such errors removed as the revision has disclosed."—From the author's preface.

"The volume, as now improved, is the best and most complete of its kind ever published. As to its use, we should say it was a necessity to everybody. The questions which it answers are put every day in all companies, and most of them puzzle even those best acquainted with English literature to answer unhesitatingly."—Boston Transcript.

"The work before us is the most perfect book of the kind that has ever been produced, and has reached the position of a standard authority in this field."—Chicago Journal.

"The book is chiefly valuable for reference, but as a mental stimulant it is well worth its cost. It is a collection of striking thoughts and marked expressions, and meets a wide want in a convenient and elegant form."—Springfield Republican.

"A more amusing volume for desultory reading, more interesting for study, or more useful for reference, has rarely been issued."—Cleveland Herald.

"The work is well known to students and authors, and is almost as indispensable as a dictionary or encyclopædia."—Boston Journal.

JUST ISSUED.

THE AUGUST NUMBER

OF

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE

OF

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND EDUCATION.

CONTENTS:

1. DALLAS GALBRAITH. An American Novel. Part VIII.
2. ECHO NOTCH.
3. SMOKING.
4. OUR GLOBE IN 1868.
5. IN A MONTH.
6. A MONTH'S HOLIDAY IN GERMANY.
7. PROVIDENCE.
8. A WINTER'S NIGHT IN A WINTRY PLACE.
9. ALAS! POOR GHOST.
10. CLAIMS OF THE BONDHOLDERS.
11. LEATHERN MEN.
12. MADAME LA DUCHESSE.
13. MY ACQUAINTANCE WITH PLANCHETTE.
14. A NOCTURNE BY CHOPIN.
15. GARIBALDI AND ITALY.
16. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
17. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

For Sale by all Periodical Dealers.

Yearly subscription, $4; single number, 35 cents.

Specimen numbers sent to any address on receipt of thirty-five cents by the publishers.

MISS YONGE'S CAMEOS.

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY.

By the Author of "The Heir of Redclyffe."

12mo, tinted paper, vignette title, fine cloth, $1 75.

THE HOLY LAND.

By WM. HEPWORTH DIXON, Author of "New America," etc.

With two Steel Engravings and other illustrations. Crown 8vo, fine cloth, $3.

For sale by booksellers generally, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

Publishers, Philadelphia.

New Books Published this Week

BY

D. APPLETON & CO.,

NEW YORK.

I.

Library Edition of Dickens's Works.

VOLUME II.

This edition of Charles Dickens's works will be the cheapest by far of any before the public. It will be completed in six volumes, illustrated with 34 engravings by Cruikshank, Leech, Browne, and others, and bound in a new and unique style. Two volumes have now been published, and the others will follow at short intervals.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

Pickwick Papers, Barnaby Rudge, Sketches.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

Nicholas Nickleby, Martin Chuzzlewit, American Notes.

Price, $1 75 per Volume, or $10 50 the Set.

II.

THE MONASTERY.

Being the 11th volume of the Cheap Edition of

The Waverley Novels.

Each Volume Illustrated.—Price Twenty-five Cents.

TO BE COMPLETED IN TWENTY-FIVE VOLUMES.

III.

GOETHE AND SCHILLER.

AN HISTORICAL NOVEL.

BY LOUISA MUHLBACH,

Author of "Joseph II. and His Court," "Frederick the Great," "Andreas Hofer," etc.

One vol. 8vo, Illustrated. In paper covers, $1 50; in cloth, $2.

"This is the latest historical novel which Louisa Mühlbach has written. It introduces to us the two great giants of German literature, Goethe and Schiller, and portrays these extraordinary men in so striking and impressive a manner as to enable us to form a very correct idea not only of what they were as poets and romancists, but what they were as men, as friends, as lovers. As usual, Louisa Mühlbach has grouped around the two principal heroes of the novel a large number of other prominent characters of the times, and culled the cream from the vast number of the personal memoirs of that time so skilfully that the volume, besides its merits as an historical novel, is exceedingly valuable as a striking pen-picture of German society, German aspirations, and German ideas, toward the close of the last century. The plot of the novel is interesting from beginning to end; and the volume, which is considered by the German writers one of the most successful productions of the distinguished authoress, will no doubt be well received by her admirers in this country."

Muhlbach Novels Recently Published:

ANDREAS HOFER. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

OLD FRITZ AND THE NEW ERA. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

NAPOLEON AND BLUCHER. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE: An Historical Sketch of the Days of Napoleon. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

NAPOLEON AND THE QUEEN OF PRUSSIA. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

THE DAUGHTER OF AN EMPRESS. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

MARIE ANTOINETTE AND HER SON. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

JOSEPH II. AND HIS COURT. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

FREDERICK THE GREAT AND HIS COURT. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

FREDERICK THE GREAT AND HIS FAMILY. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

BERLIN AND SANS-SOUCI; or, Frederick the Great and His Friends. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

THE MERCHANT OF BERLIN, AND MARIA THERESA AND HER FIREMAN. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

LOUISA OF PRUSSIA AND HER TIMES. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

HENRY VIII. AND CATHARINE PARR. Illustrated. 1 vol. 8vo, paper, $1 50; cloth, $2.

Any work above mailed post-free on receipt of price.

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,

90, 92, and 94 Grand St., New York.

J. S. REDFIELD,

140 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK,

Has in press and will soon publish,

MODERN WOMEN,

AND

What is Said of Them.

A reprint of

A Series of Articles in the Saturday Review.

With an Introduction by

MRS. LUCIA GILBERT CALHOUN.

In one volume 12mo, handsomely printed and bound in cloth, bevelled edges, price $2.

REBELLION RECORD,

PART 73,

Being the Conclusion of Volume II., and the Completion of the Work,

IS THIS DAY ISSUED.

With this number the publication of the REBELLION RECORD closes. Those whose sets are incomplete are earnestly requested to complete them at an early date, as the publishers cannot be expected to keep a stock of odd numbers and volumes on hand perpetually, in order to fill out sets.

The work can now be supplied complete in twelve vols. at the following prices, viz.:

| | |
|---|---|
| 12 volumes, green cloth, | $60 |
| 12 volumes, library sheep, | 72 |
| 12 volumes, half calf, antique, | 78 |
| 12 volumes, half morocco, | 78 |
| 12 volumes, half Russia, | 84 |

In numbers, 60 cents per number; single volumes or parts to complete sets at the same rate.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

192 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,

678 Broadway, New York.

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

REMOVAL.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1868.

ALLEN EBBS,

IMPORTER OF

FINE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Has removed from 183 Broadway to

75 CHAMBERS STREET,

One door west of Broadway.

A. E. has lately received from London a most elegant collection of fine Books.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

The Nation.

VOL. VII—NO. 162. THURSDAY, AUGUST 6, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 101
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Late Session of Congress..... 104
Private Indebtedness & National Debts 105
Mr. Patterson's Foreign Service Bill.. 106
Servia ..... 108
England ..... 109
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Bonds.—The Letter of the Law, 110
The National Decline in Production.. 111
NOTES:
Literary ..... 112
Recent Books on Early English..... 114
Mr. Cracroft's Essays..... 114
Handbuch der vergleichenden Statistik. Für den allgemeinen praktischen Bedarf.—Lilliput Levee.—Burns's Poetical Works Complete..... 116
The Story of a Round Loaf.—Books of the Week ..... 117

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

THE present political condition of the Southern States we think generally favorable. By the promulgation of General Meade's order of July 30, three of the States lately in rebellion, Georgia, Florida, and Alabama, are fully restored to the Union. The order announces that the military power vested by Congress in the district commander has ceased to exist, and that his orders have no force except such as the legislatures of the States may give them by enactment. We believe that every member of Congress from these States, except the two Georgia senators, and Mr. Christy, representative from the same State, have already taken their seats in Congress. Mr. Christy, it is said, is so bitterly hostile to the laws under which he was elected that he thinks of not claiming his seat; and it may be said, too, that he is so bitterly hostile to the laws that it is by no means improbable if he should claim it that he will claim it in vain. The Georgia senators are both respectable men in the prime of life, both "old line Whigs," both South Carolinians by birth, one a consistent Union man and the other, Miller, a strong Secessionist. It is charged that the Democrats who control the Lower House of the Georgia Legislature "sold out" to the Upper House, and agreed that if they might have one senator, they would let the Republicans have the other, and would also ratify the 14th amendment. These things have happened at any rate, however they are to be accounted for. Every other Southern State—except, of course, Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas—is fully represented in Congress, and, on the whole, is well represented. There are men like Deweese, of North Carolina, and Bowen, of South Carolina; but, on the other hand, there is a large majority in the new delegations of honest and sensible men. The North Carolina delegation, for instance, will compare not unfavorably with that from almost any other State in the country. Louisiana is, perhaps, most unfortunate in her representation. In that State affairs are quieter than has been believed, though there is little doubt that General Buchanan—who is to be succeeded in October by General Rousseau—will be expected by the Legislature to lend his services to the administration of the new Governor, Warmouth, and that his services will be needed. Rousseau in October will have at his disposal part of the soldiers which Meade's order relieves from duty in Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, but it is not the intention to denude those States of all United States troops. Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas are indefinitely out of the Union. We may add that the crops in all these States are doing well. On the other hand, since the failure of impeachment and the nomination of Seymour and Blair, some of the most impracticable of the Southern politicians, Hampton, B. H. Hill, old General Huger, and their like, are certainly doing a deal of wild talk, and many editors threaten war if—this or that is done or is n't. If—we should say—the Democrats in the North are ready to begin raising regiments; and whether they are ready or not each of our readers can learn with sufficient accuracy by enquiring of his next Democratic neighbor. The fact is, the Southern orators are, in their usual dignified way, indulging themselves in their old trick of screaming at what they cannot help.

---

Special Commissioner Wells has published a well-meant but we think somewhat injudicious letter on the subject of the national expenditures. It was intended as an answer to the foolish exaggerations of Governor Seymour and other Democratic speakers in regard to our war and navy expenses in times of peace, and the cost of the Freedmen's Bureau. But it has too much the appearance of a white-washing document to have much effect, and in some of its statements it is actually damaging to the administration, as when he shows that the income of the past year exceeds the expenditure by thirty-five millions, without attempting to show what has been done with this sum, since it certainly has not been applied to the reduction of the debt. It seems to us that the proper ground for Republicans to take in relation to the financial management of the past is this: Great errors have undoubtedly been committed, but they were committed in good faith, at a time when public men in this country had only a very limited knowledge of the principles of finance, when the whole people were recklessly impatient of delay, and all but forced upon the administration a number of measures which every one now admits to have been injudicious. The remedy for our financial ailments is not to be found in any violent change of system, but in a firm and persistent reduction of expenses, the most economical management of public affairs, and a steady improvement in our system of taxation. That the Republican party is in earnest in carrying out these reforms recent legislation has abundantly proved, and with all the Democratic license of criticism and freedom from restraint they have not been able to suggest anything better.

---

It has been thought desirable that General Hancock should be made to declare—for himself and the War Democrats, of course—that he is not an enemy nor a lukewarm friend to Mr. Seymour as a candidate. He has, therefore, written a letter of the regulation pattern, and we cannot prove from it that his heart is not in the cause, nor that he would rather see Grant elected than Blair and Seymour. We are free to say, however, that the letter did not compel us to feel that the Democratic ticket was going to have in Hancock a very ardent supporter. But if it were, the fact would remain that it is among Southern rather than Northern soldiers that the ticket arouses enthusiasm. Mr. Sibley's farewell to his fellow-members of the Democratic State Committee of California throws light on the matter. And the press everywhere confirms the opinion that the New York platform and Blair's letter, followed as they have been by the Fourth of July speeches of Wade Hampton and other delegates—speeches that the World is compelled to call silly, and which the Charleston Mercury and the Richmond Whig condemn as "showing our hand too soon"—have drawn the old line of '60 and '61 between the two parties, and made Democratic success impossible. It daily becomes clearer that Mr. Vallandigham ought to have been left out of Democratic national conventions till 1868 at least, and that he is mistaken when he says that the fuel of the war is burnt out of the popular heart. He personally may be satisfied. He is to-day a "far-seeing statesman;" he has got for himself the party endorsement of his course during the war; General Hancock professes to give him the endorsement of the War Democrats; something has been done in behalf of the discredited resolutions of his love—those of Kentucky, of '98. But, gratifying as all this must be to Mr. Vallandigham and his friends, it beats the Democratic candidate in November, and Mr. Vallandigham's prophecies to the contrary prove that he is as bad a prophet as martyr, while the frequency and fervor of them seem to show that he has mournful forebodings.

Mr. Rollins still retains his place at the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau, the President having perhaps made up his mind that the commissioner's tenure of office, as settled by the recent legislation in regard to his particular case, puts him beyond the reach of removal. Perhaps not, however; it seems to be as likely that Mr. Johnson wants very much to fill the place by the appointment of some near friend, which can be done if Mr. Rollins will quietly resign. Mr. Johnson must have known that Mr. Rollins, who has promised, and would be extremely glad, to make way for any honest and efficient man, would not make way for Mr. Perry Fuller. He must have known the same thing in regard to Cummings, a copy of whose indictment before a Colorado court—for dishonest use of public funds—has been in Mr. Rollins's hands for some time. Whether the office can be got for Mr. Cooper appears to be the question that is keeping Mr. Johnson busy, and not improbably the desire to get a favorable answer to it is what prompted him to amuse the Senate with unconfirmable nominations till that body left Washington, and the problem was given over to him, Mr. Rollins, and Mr. McCulloch to work out, undisturbed, in the recess. Mr. McCulloch's attitude in the affair appears to be this: that, to oblige the President, any man whom Mr. Rollins can be induced to accept—or any other man who can get the office—he will accept and support. Mr. Rollins—his most important subordinate, who should have had his hearty support—he has never supported at all. Indeed, there is no want of people to say—and a late letter of Mr. Rollins's does not contradict such a statement—that, next to Mr. Johnson, the man most responsible for the past and present bad condition of the Internal Revenue service is Secretary McCulloch—who likes his secretaryship very much. Mr. Rollins, it is understood, much as all reasons but public considerations urge his retirement, is pledged to keep his place in all events but two—the appointment of a man whom he thinks fit for the place, or, secondly, his forcible ejection by the President. Of this latter, however, there is not much danger; aside from the legal objection already mentioned, whoever should in that event be appointed by Mr. Johnson would certainly be ousted by the Senate, and not impossibly would hold his lucrative office no longer than till next month. To keep so important an office out of the hands of corrupt men would of itself be justification sufficient for the September session.

---

The gentlemen who have "the campaign" in charge have been paying rather more attention to Grant during the past week than to his antagonist. As for Colfax, we hear little about him of late, except that it is well understood by the stalwart Irishman that "Colfax's Know-Nothing oath will prevent the Radicals from giving a single office to any citizen of foreign birth." Grant, it appears, was accustomed after battles to walk over the field among the corpses thrusting his sword into each dead body. "Such a man," said a late Southern orator, "can never get my support for the Presidency"—a sentiment which the chivalrous Southern audience to which it was addressed greeted with cheers. The Democrats of the Twentieth Ward of this city have hung out a transparency which conveys not quite so serious a charge against the general, but still one that ought to be met or he will go out of the city with a heavy majority against him. The inscription reads: "Grant's ingratitude to McClellan makes countless thousands scorn." A partial set-off against this accusation is one that is brought against Seymour. A weak Democratic editor it must have been who set it going. "Mr. Seymour," his treacherous eulogist says, "is descended from the nobility of England, and has bright, aristocratic blood in his veins." A good post-office is none too good for the subtle Republican who concocted that fling at the enemy. Blair, of course, suffers a good deal. It is alleged that he is the man who let his soldiers burn Wade Hampton's house and steal his plate at the taking of Columbia. This specific charge is thought to get confirmation from two facts: when the war was over he addressed a general order to his army corps, in which he told them that the Romans used to give homesteads to their brave warriors, that the United States ought to do the same thing, that the Government had largely increased its means of doing this by the lands of rebels which it had seized, and that the homesteads should be carved out of the South. And when Grant asked him, after some operations of his in Tennessee, if he had taken any prisoners, he said: "No, but he had burned a d—d sight of houses." "Blair as a Confiscationist" this chapter in his history is styled. Finally, a college classmate of Blairs asserts in a letter to the Evangelist, that "poor Blair's only distinction in college was his amputation of a classmate's nose with a carving-knife in a tipsy spree."

---

The Boston Working-men's Institute recently met and passed five resolutions concerning the Congressional Eight-hour Bill. The first one hails the new law as an important contribution "to the cause of labor reform and a more equal distribution of wealth." The second one—much to his gratification, we hope—thanks Senator Wilson for his positive and efficient service in favor of the bill, and denounces Mr. Sumner because he "made the most terrible mistake" of opposing "the coming system." The denunciation will please Mr. Sumner better than the praise. On matters of this kind he is never a demagogue and never wrong. The third resolution asserts that there is a great fallacy—soon to be exploded, although people maintain it who claim to be political economists—in arguing that, if the eight-hour system prevails, there must, in justice to employers, be a corresponding reduction in the rate of wages. This same resolution goes on to predict that all attempts on the part of the Government agents to secure "eight hours'" labor for anything less than "ten hours'" pay, will prove an utter failure. A safe prediction; under the law as it stands, there will be no opportunity of disproving it; the bill was deliberately made for the purpose of daily giving away two hours' pay out of the United States Treasury to every workman in the national yards, and, of course, will effect that purpose excellently well. The resolutions generally afford illustrations of that blind groping after the real point, that falling honestly and helplessly into gross fallacies which are almost painfully and pathetically characteristic of the attempts of untrained working-men to deal with intricate sociological problems. If the working-men of the Boston Institute would establish, for next winter, a course of lectures on co-operation, and listen to them and debate upon them, instead of talking what nobody else can understand, on matters which they do not understand themselves, they would really do something toward settling the vexed question of Capital vs. Labor which now agitates the community. Any mode of settlement that does not involve co-operation does, in the general, involve injustice more or less tyrannical on the one side or the other. Our workmen are slow to turn their attention toward the co-operative system, but we are glad to see that the Tribune seems to be spreading among its readers Eugene Richter's little book on "Co-operative Stores."

---

The English having discovered that there is a "cute dodge" behind the Chinese embassy's mission, and that it is a dodge which is to inure to the benefit of the United States, and that in return for this benefit the United States, in the person of Mr. Burlingame—a Chinese official—stands behind China and threatens all Europe, they will look with interest at the treaty which we have just negotiated with the Emperor. The whole treaty of 1868 is supplementary to the one made in 1858. The first article recognizes the Emperor's right of eminent domain over the lands and waters which he has conceded to foreign communities. For instance, no subject of the Emperor can be made responsible to foreign courts established on conceded territory, and the Emperor reserves the right to try and punish foreigners of nationalities with which he has no treaty relations. Article III. provides that Chinese consuls may be sent to our ports, and that they shall have the rights and privileges of English and Russian consuls. The Chinese in California will find the advantage of consular protection. Article IV. declares that the religious belief of a Chinaman in America, or of an American in China, shall impose no disability whatever. This may yet give us Chinese idolaters as sworn jurymen in San Francisco. Article IV. makes the trade in coolies a punishable offence, and pledges both the high contracting parties to encourage migration and immigration. Already—Mr. Mark Twain says, in an excellent letter in the Tribune—the Chinese immigration into California amounts to one thousand a month. And, by the way, it is worth while for foreign critics of the Burlingame mission to remember that when the United States makes a treaty with China—and of necessity a treaty overrides State laws—we go very far towards receiving as full citizens, with the ruling powers of full American citizens, hundreds of thousands of people of an inferior race. This fact, and the fact that our Pacific railroads, almost finished, will give us so much of the Chinese trade with the rest of the world as to make our material interests in China very important, ought to prevent our attempt to make China a member of the family of nations from being stigmatized as a dodge. Articles VI. and VII. have for their object the same general result—the one sweeping away all the intolerant laws of the Pacific coast in regard to the rights of Chinamen to hold real estate and so forth, and making it possible for a Chinaman to become naturalized; the other asserting that the United States have no wish, and will not permit their citizens, to meddle with the internal improvements of the Empire, but that they will when called on furnish engineers and telegraphers. The effect of this treaty, with its binding power over the courts of the Pacific coast, on the condition of the fifty thousand Chinese already resident there, will be very great, and as honorable to us as beneficial to them.

---

The cable of 1866 breaks down again, but opportunely, so far as public news is concerned, during a general lull in politics, owing to the adjournment or dissolution of the chief legislatures of the world. Parliament and the French Senate were prorogued July 31, the Corps Législatif having finished its business and closed its session a day or two earlier. The telegraphed comments of the London press on the bill protecting American citizens abroad show a reasonable displeasure and wonder that the United States should thus anticipate the friendly advances of Great Britain, but also a right understanding of the measure as a bait for Irish votes at the fall election. It is cause for rejoicing that the intimate connection now established between the two countries by the instantaneous transmission of news tends to prevent absurd mistakes both as to facts and motives, and to make the temper of the two peoples more equable, and to render the conduct of each more intelligible to the other. In short, the Cable is destined to be the death of what we may call (having Messrs. Banks, Conness, and Chandler in mind more particularly) international buncombe. England would undoubtedly have a right to take offence at the bill, which seems to her a truckling to Fenianism, but we believe she will make allowance for the vagaries of Congress in a crisis like the present, and do, when the time comes, all she intended to do before she was menaced.

---

The European papers, like our own, are unusually full of financial discussions. Money continues a drug everywhere, business is stagnant and discontent prevails. Prussia has a good round deficit in her annual budget, France has temporarily suspended the tonnage dues on vessels bringing grain, which looks like a poor harvest, and is about to come upon the market for a new loan; Sweden, Russia, Brazil, Turkey, are all needy and urgent borrowers, and Spain and Italy are prevented from borrowing largely solely by their want of credit. All these applicants for money flock to England, where money indeed seems to be abundant, but where the year just closed has added nearly 77,000 to the number of paupers supported by the state. It is evident that this state of things cannot last long, and it is thought by many that financial rather than political difficulties will yet force the leading nations into war as a desperate means of redemption, or the last chance of covering up their bankruptcy.

---

The passage of the Corrupt Practices Bill occurs simultaneously with some promising symptoms that the old mode of soliciting votes for candidates is to pass away together with bribery. Thomas Hughes has refused to pay out any money towards his own election, unless applied for public meetings, and a Mr. Trevelyan leaves the borough where a personal canvass is expected of him for one in which such a canvass is expressly repudiated. Mr. Hepworth Dixon, who is half invited to stand for Marylebone, does not raise this issue, but declares that he never will seek a place in Parliament, for the rather singular reason that his "mind revolts from the thought of seeking a market for ambition." To some interrogatories put to him by the Marylebone Electoral Association, he answers that he clings with all his might to manhood suffrage, vote by ballot, and compulsory education; and that he will be glad to see the day when members of Parliament are salaried. He is even more American than this—for it is an American doctrine, though by no means universally accepted or gaining ground, that the representative is merely the mouth-piece of his constituents. Mr. Dixon says he thinks that in the House of Commons "no man has the right to substitute his personal opinion for the opinion of his masters"—a harsh word, and not properly the correlative of public servant. Perhaps, however, it is not more offensive than persons of inordinate delicacy of feeling would find all the rest of Mr. Dixon's epistle.

---

The Prussian military staff has been publishing a history of the campaign of 1866, and, as the Italian part of it is not treated too respectfully, General La Marmora has made a third or fourth attempt to justify his conduct at the battle of Custozza by asking leave of the Chamber of Deputies to base an interpellation on the work named. The effect of this would be, or might be, to bring the whole affair under discussion before the Chamber, which is certainly not competent to pass judgment on the merits of the case, while the Government, as it could not of itself undertake to refute the Prussian version, ought not to be dragged into doing so. The Italians, however, are not disposed to whitewash Custozza into a victory, and the general's motion has not met with favor in any quarter. If injustice has been done, posterity, as the Turin correspondent of La Perseveranza well remarks, or the Austrian staff must rectify it. Nor can we quite think that the day of memoirs has gone by, unless for people who cannot wait to be vindicated by posterity.

---

We spoke recently of the Sultan's Grand Council, made in imitation of the representative bodies of Western Europe. The members are appointed by the Porte, and one of those fixed upon for the provinces was a certain Israelite, Abraham, who, according to the Turkish fashion, was known by his patrial "of Salonica," although he had for many years been settled in Monastir, and there held a very influential position. By mistake the authorities at Salonica were telegraphed to return "Abraham" to Constantinople. Abrahams being thicker than hops in that city, and one Jew probably seeming as good as another for the unknown purpose of the Porte, the authorities laid hands on an ignorant fellow of the lowest station and shipped him to Constantinople. The much-frighted Abraham, instead of being collared by the police, as he feared, found himself on arrival made a grand councillor, with 7,000 piastres a month for his support. When he had taken his seat in the council, however, the mistake betrayed itself, and enquiry revealed the truth. But Fuad Pasha settled the difficulty; he declared that to whom God gives office he also gives understanding, and ordered that both Abrahams should be appointed. So the quondam dealer in leeches and produce became a member of the committee on public instruction, and ought, one would say, to be earnest for "practical" education. We hear another comical story from the same quarter, and relating to a kindred subject. In Egypt the Viceroy's deputies had heard that in European parliaments the supporters of the opposition sat upon the left, while the supporters of government sat upon the right; and in their desire to show their loyalty, on entering the hall they pressed with so much eagerness to the right that the left was entirely deserted. These deputies were elected, but it is clear that their ideas of constitutional government are capable of some development.

---

We may remark here that the question of abolishing the Consular Courts in Egypt, which we recently noticed as having been raised by that country, from a proper sense of its growing dignity and independence and a disheartening experience of the foreign tribunals forced upon it by the "capitulations," has been further discussed in the English Parliament. Mr. Layard's statement of the abuses which had grown out of the attempts to provide Christians in a Mohammedan state with the justice of the country to which they belonged, was so convincing that there is every reason to believe that, so far as England is concerned, assent will be given to the system of mixed courts which Egypt proposes. In any reform of this nature the other Great Powers must have a voice, and what is achieved for Egypt will also be for Turkey.

THE LATE SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Congress has adjourned, after an exciting session, which has resulted in comparatively little harm, and in some positive good. It is impossible to bestow very great praise upon a session which has brought no particular reform in the civil service, in which a revenue bill was smothered through absolute laziness, and which has done nothing toward removing the doubt which overclouds our national credit. Yet the reduction of the whiskey tax to a practicable rate, the removal of taxes from cotton and domestic manufactures, the progress made in the work of reconstruction, and the defeat of all the dangerous schemes for an enlargement of paper currency, and of many other plausible but injurious measures, are matters for which our national legislators deserve credit.

The first important subject that was brought before Congress, on the opening of its regular session, was the report of the Committee on Impeachment. The feeling of the House was then so strongly opposed to the measure that it was only by the use of dilatory motions that the minority could obtain a chance to be heard as fully as they believed to be their right. Impeachment was then voted down by a vote of 57 to 108. The House and the country felt relieved at this disposition of the question; and it was generally supposed that the President would endeavor so to conduct himself as to avoid giving any excuse for a revival of the project. But this hope was disappointed. Mr. Johnson's pugnacity and perversity would not let him rest in peace. Whether his proceedings were illegal or not, it is at least perfectly certain that his removal of Mr. Stanton was inspired chiefly by his anxiety to do something offensive to Congress, and to prove that he had still some power to annoy his enemies. Had Congress been able to bear the insult then put upon it, we have little doubt that Mr. Johnson would have been encouraged to proceed to some clear violation of the Tenure-of-Office Act; in which case his conviction and removal would have been certain. We shall not, however, renew here the discussion of all the many questions that arose out of the impeachment. To speak of it from a merely party point of view, although we had become so thoroughly weary of Mr. Johnson's "ugly" disposition, his perverse attempts to defeat reconstruction on any plan except his own, and his suspicious affiliations with corrupt men and women, that our sympathies were at the outset entirely with the prosecution, yet we became satisfied before the close of the trial, and are now more than ever convinced, that the success of the Republican party next fall is far more nearly certain under the acquittal of Mr. Johnson than it could have been if he had been convicted by the casting vote of Senator Wade.

The release of cotton and of manufactures from taxation was, in our opinion, a beneficial measure. We have always been opposed to any system of taxation which undertakes to collect a little tribute from every producer. Although looking fair on its face, it is open to at least two insuperable objections: it cannot be so levied as not to tax any article twice, and it cannot be collected from every one who ought to pay it. The tax on manufactures was a perpetual source of annoyance to honest manufacturers, a constant temptation to fraud, and a much greater burden on the country than it was ever meant to be. The only method of taxation on manufactures which can be fully carried out is one which lays the burden on a few articles of general use, so that the revenue officers may confine their attention to those. Unequal as this mode appears at first sight to be, it is only at first sight that it appears so—the tax thus collected would be drawn from a vast number of persons, paying the enhanced price put upon the goods by the manufacturer; and in this manner the burden is about as equally divided as it would be if all branches of production were taxed. The tax being thus paid to the Government by a few persons in the first instance, the assessors and collectors can keep a strict watch upon them, and need not depend upon their representations, as they generally must where every manufacturer is a taxpayer. The Government thus receives a vastly larger proportion of the taxes due to it, while the people are freed from the oppression of a system which necessitates espionage and official investigation into every man's business, or else leaves honest men to pay the whole tax, and to be undersold by their perjuring competitors. The plan of taxing everything has been permanently abandoned, after a long and thorough trial, in countries where honesty among excise officers is as common as it is rare here; and we thank the Fortieth Congress for putting an end to it.

The reduction of the tax on whiskey was also a wise act, though for very different reasons. The tax ought to be at least one dollar per gallon, because the article is a mere luxury, and the system of taxing a few articles only requires that those articles should be heavily assessed. A tax of one dollar could be borne by whiskey without diminishing the production to an extent which the most ardent opponent of teetotalism could believe to be injurious to the country. But the simple truth is, that a tax of the proper amount furnishes a margin for bribery which it is impossible for our officials to resist. It is not necessary, let it be observed, for the "whiskey ring" to control all, or even one-fourth, of the revenue officers of the country. All that they need to do, or have usually done, is to control the officers of a few districts, and then confine the business to those districts. This plan leaves them millions of dollars, if necessary, with which to influence a hundred petty officers. Millions never were necessary, however. So far, it does not appear that the bribes used attained to the dignity of six figures. The officers were hungry and eager to sell themselves for contemptible sums. Indeed, the friends of one of the persons recently convicted of the most outrageous connivance at forgery allege, and we think truly, that he received no bribe at all, and committed what was practically perjury merely out of good nature. Certain it is that he was too poor to pay his counsel.

Now, when our revenue service has fallen so low that it seems impossible to get an honest man into it, or to keep him honest for one day after he enters it, and when Congress is unwilling or unable to do anything toward its reform, it is obvious that the maintenance of a high duty is a premium upon bribery, and that the next best thing to do is to lower the duty to such a figure as will give the distiller little choice, as a mere question of money, between paying the tax and bribing the tax-collector. After much examination, Commissioner Wells, who is one of the few men in office who have any capacity for their work, reported that a tax of fifty cents could be collected; and Congress has done well in following his advice.

The action of the House upon the Internal Revenue Bill reported by Mr. Schenck, of which the bill finally passed was a mere fragment, was discreditable enough. The passage of such a measure, remodelling the entire internal revenue system, was the most important duty of the whole session. Almost everything else might better have been sacrificed than this. The whole financial system of the nation—involving, as has long been visible to men who understand political economy, and is fast becoming plain to others, the whole prosperity and honor of the country—depends upon the administration of the Internal Revenue Department. Yet the bill was flung aside, when a few days would have sufficed to finish it, because honorable members wanted to go home and make stump speeches. General Butler's well-known personal devotion to and enthusiasm for General Grant may plead his excuse for such a course; but the House cannot expect us to believe that they all feel the same extraordinary zeal in the cause. At all events, if they did, they might have made General Butler their deputy to the people, and have sent him to stump the country for his favorite, while they contributed to the success of the campaign by proving the capacity of the Republican party to reform abuses in the Government.

While referring to this subject, we must call attention to the significant fact that every Democratic representative, except the two or three members who were on the committee which framed the bill, voted to kill it; thus illustrating the truth of the charge which we made against them last week, that they contribute no aid whatever to administrative reform or to the purification of the Government, but are simply a factious, bitter, and selfish minority, who would rather that the country should suffer from the evils of a corrupt and oppressive fiscal system than that their opponents should have the credit of its reform. Let any fair-minded man compare this record with that of the Republican minority in the Congress of 1857–59, under the leadership of John Sherman in the House and of Lyman Trumbull in the Senate, and he will be apt to forgive the Republican party many of its faults rather than entrust the nation to the keeping of a combination of Northern corruptionists and Southern malignants.

Many other topics suggest themselves in reviewing the work of the session, but space fails us. The reconstruction acts of previous sessions have been improved. The admission of the Southern States which have complied with the law has proved the good faith of the Republicans in proposing the terms of restoration. Except Mr. Christy, of Georgia, who has not claimed his seat, and who will very likely claim it in vain, and except the Georgia senators, every Southern representative in either House is admitted. The removal of political disabilities from many Southern men has been one of the good fruits of the Chicago Platform. The ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment is of itself a sufficient theme for a column. But we must leave these subjects untouched. We rejoice that so much has been accomplished. We believe that very few schemes of public plunder have succeeded in this Congress, and that several have been stopped by it. Its faults have been mostly negative. Let us hope that it may yet repair its omissions, and earn for itself a name of permanent honor, as it has now earned the credit of having done better than most of its predecessors.

PRIVATE INDEBTEDNESS AND NATIONAL DEBTS.

In a letter signed "S. C.," which we published last week, there occurs the following passage:

> "It is true, we are liable for our just proportion of the national debt; but in the past seven years we have paid off an immense amount of private indebtedness, while the debt of the State is less than it was before the war. There is no way of ascertaining the precise amount of private liabilities which have been cancelled. I believe, however, that we in Illinois could personally assume our respective shares of the national debt, . . . and still be in a better condition than we were in 1860."

In accordance with the intention expressed in our comments on that letter, we now propose to show wherein lies the fallacy, and, above all, wherein lies the danger of the fallacy, that there is any similarity whatsoever between the debts of individuals and the debts of governments—between private indebtedness and national debts.

Undoubtedly the Western States generally—Illinois in particular—have, during the last seven years, paid off an immense amount of private indebtedness. But the mere payment of a debt does not necessarily prove increased wealth. If a man owns a farm worth ten thousand dollars, with stock and crops on it worth five thousand dollars, and the whole of the property is mortgaged for five thousand dollars, the man is worth ten thousand dollars—no more, no less. If he sells the stock and crops for five thousand dollars and pays off the mortgage, he is no richer. Only when he has saved money enough on his farm to pay off the mortgage without selling his stock and crops, only when he has paid the mortgage and still has the farm and stock and crops, only then is he richer. Our belief is, that the enormously high prices for meat, breadstuffs, and other farm products prevailing during the war induced Illinois farmers to sell out their stock and crops at famine prices, and to pay their debts with the proceeds, and that, if they have to-day less private debts to pay, they also have less stock and crops on hand, and owe their share of the national debt besides. As we stated the other day, the position of Illinois has been throughout most fortunate, yet even in her case the figures of our correspondent bear out our views. We will not ask how much of the individual indebtedness of Illinois was paid by mere cancellation, to the loss and ruin of Eastern creditors, nor in how far the legal-tender act reduced the amount of the debt without the creditors' consent. Nor do we refer to these questions tauntingly, but simply to refute our correspondent's implied assertion, that the reduction of private indebtedness is in itself a proof of increased wealth. But is the private indebtedness of Illinois, or of our people generally, less in 1868 than it was in 1860? We doubt it. The form of indebtedness has changed. The Western merchants may not owe as much to Eastern manufacturers, but they owe far more to Western banks. We have no precise statistics of the amounts due to all the banks of the United States in 1860, but we do know that they were insignificant compared to the amounts due to them at present, and we also know that during the last three years private indebtedness to the banks has increased nearly one hundred and sixty millions of dollars, or over thirty per cent., and that a fair share of this increase no doubt falls to the lot of Illinois.

But whatever may be the position of Illinois in regard to private indebtedness—a subject extremely difficult to investigate—it certainly is not better off in general wealth than it was in 1860. The very reports of the Public Auditor of Illinois quoted by our correspondent show that the taxable valuation of the total property of the State in 1860 was equal to $214 in gold per head of the total population. In 1866 (we have no later figures) the return gives only $183 in currency per head, in spite of the prevailing inflation and high prices. In 1860 the debt of the State of Illinois amounted to about $6 per inhabitant, in 1866 to only about $4 per inhabitant; but though the debt of the State thus appears diminished, it is notorious that the debts of the local organizations—cities, counties, and townships—have increased enormously. If, now, the citizens of Illinois are ready to assume their proportion of the national debt, which (estimating the population of the United States in 1866 at thirty-five millions and the debt at twenty-five hundred millions) amounts to over seventy-one dollars per head, we shall find that, whereas in 1860 every individual in Illinois was worth $208 in coin, he was worth in 1866 precisely $108 in currency. These figures may well be called startling. We publish them in order that they may startle—that they may put an end to the insane glorification over our prosperity while we are poorest, and stop our ignorant idleness and extravagance while we need the utmost industry and economy.

No one need think that these remarkable discrepancies are due to the inaccuracy of assessors or the dishonesty of taxpayers. As our correspondent well said, assessors exercise about the same care and owners of property are about as honest or dishonest one year with the other, and the average correctness will be about the same. Besides, other States show precisely similar results. Iowa shows a decline in property value per head of population from $294 to $285, and an increase in debt from 50 cents to $1. Michigan shows a decline in property from $395 to $383, and an increase in debt from $5 to $7. Wisconsin shows a decline in property from $237 to $186, and an increase in debt from 15 cents to $3. These four States, far removed from the theatre of war, producing mainly articles the value of which has very largely increased during the last six years, have yet undergone a process of impoverishment which reduced the average wealth of each individual of their total population from $285 coin in 1860 to $259 currency in 1866, and increased the average burden of State indebtedness for each individual from three dollars to four. This, be it remembered, is without counting the debts of local organizations—cities, counties, etc.—and without counting one dollar of the national debt.

Of all the States of which we are able to obtain full statistics (and we have them of all the most prosperous) only two showed an increased average wealth—New York and Minnesota, and only one—Minnesota—shows an increase of average wealth and a diminution of State debt. Minnesota's average wealth has increased from $207 to $229, and its State debt decreased from $15 to $10 per head. The increase of average wealth in New York is from $372 to $433, but the State debt shows an almost equal increase from $88 to $135. Of none of the other States are complete statistics obtainable, but with the exception of California, and perhaps Ohio, Pennsylvania, and some of the New England States, they would undoubtedly all show far more unfavorable results than those given above. Connecticut, Massachusetts, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Virginia are known to have increased their State debts very largely, while the total reduction in property value in the Southern States is all but fabulous—70 per cent. in Arkansas, 30 in Kentucky, 45 in Louisiana, 7 in Missouri, 90 in South Carolina, and 50 per cent. in Texas and Virginia.

These are facts, obtained mostly from the annual reports of governors and auditors to their respective State legislatures. They are not mere assertions, to be denied or ridiculed by ignorant pertness, but serious facts to be taken into account by serious men. The natural consequences of these facts are beginning to show themselves everywhere in strikes, dull trade, restiveness under taxation, and the daily increasing talk about repudiation; but these consequences are attributed to every imaginable cause except the true one. So unwilling are people to believe the painful fact of our national impoverishment! So delusive is the semblance of wealth created by our national debt!

It is precisely this delusive semblance of wealth that distinguishes national debts from individual indebtedness, and that makes it important to expose the insidious fallacy of our correspondent, which is indeed most widely current, that the diminution of individual indebtedness is a set-off to the increase of national or State debt.

The debts of individuals, when honestly contracted, always represent some existing property. National debts, with very rare exceptions, represent only property that has ceased to exist, that has been destroyed.

A Western merchant buys from a New England manufacturer goods on credit, and gives the manufacturer his note for the amount. This note or debt to the manufacturer is represented by the goods in the merchant's store, or if he sells the goods, then the debt is represented by the money he receives for them, or by the money due to him from the persons buying them. When the merchant wants to ascertain the amount of his wealth, he counts the goods in his store, counts the money he has in bank, and the money due to him from others, and from the sum of these he deducts the amount that he owes the manufacturer. His goods, his money in bank, and the money due to him amount to fifteen thousand dollars, he owes the manufacturer five; he is, therefore, actually worth ten thousand dollars only. If he owes the debt, he is worth ten thousand; if he pays the debt, he is worth ten thousand.

The New England manufacturer is also worth ten thousand dollars. He has a mill worth five thousand, and has the Western merchant's note for five thousand more. The Western merchant's note represents the manufacturer's property in the hands of the merchant. When the note is paid the manufacturer is no richer and the merchant no poorer.

The people of the United States have bought from New England manufacturers and Western farmers immense quantities of goods on credit, and have given the manufacturers and farmers notes for the amount. What are these notes represented by? They are represented by the money paid to the soldiers, which has been spent, by the food the soldiers have eaten, the clothes they have worn, by the horses that have been killed in battle or by fatigue, by the powder and balls that have been shot away. These notes of the people of the United States are represented by no property now in existence. The people of the United States owe these notes. But when the people of the United States count up their wealth at the end of each year, do they deduct the amount of these notes from their total property? Does each individual, in estimating his wealth, deduct his share of the national debt? He does no such thing.

The New England manufacturer and the Western farmer who hold the notes, count them as part of their property. But the people who owe the notes do not deduct them from theirs. The delusion is evident. The holders of the notes should not count them as part of their property, or else the makers of the notes should deduct them from theirs. Everybody does the former, and nobody does the latter. Hence the whole country believes itself richer than it really is, by the total amount of the national debt. This self-deception might be perfectly harmless if it did not delude every individual into the belief that he is—as our correspondent says of the people of Illinois—far better off than he really is. It is this delusion about our individual wealth that prevents every one from recognizing the fact of our national impoverishment, and that encourages that boastful, reckless extravagance which is rapidly sapping the very foundations of our national productiveness.

If, as suggested by our Illinois correspondent, every individual were to assume his share of the national debt, every man, woman, and child in the United States would be seventy-one dollars poorer than they now think themselves. Taking four women and children as belonging to each male adult, we shall find that every male adult would be three hundred and fifty-five dollars poorer than he now thinks himself. Or, if the amount of debt be distributed in accordance with wealth, and the whole country were as rich to-day as it was in 1860, then every property-holder in the United States would be sixteen per cent. poorer than he deems himself now. Or, again, at the ratio of positive decline in wealth which we assume from all the facts in our possession, every property-holder in the United States, if he deducted from his property his proportionate share of the national debt, would find himself more than twenty per cent. less well off than he now believes himself to be.

If all the people of the United States were to treat the national debt as they treat their private debts, and were to deduct each one his share from the amount of their supposed individual wealth, how many people who are now at Newport would hasten back to town in spite of the heat, how many gilded equipages would be discarded, how many idlers return to labor, how quickly the eight-hour movement would be stopped and the bricklayers resume their work, how carefully the reckless expenditures of city and county and national governments would be scanned and scrutinized, how high financial ability would rise in public esteem, how much honesty would advance in value, and how resolutely, above all, a whole awakened people would sternly vow never to permit one single dollar to be added, on any pretence whatsoever, to that most injurious of all delusions—the national debt!

MR. PATTERSON'S FOREIGN SERVICE BILL.

A GLEAM of light was shed into a very dark corner in our national affairs at the late session of Congress. Mr. Patterson, chairman of the Joint Committee on Retrenchment, introduced a bill designed to effect a radical reform in the whole system—if that word can be applied to our eccentric and ill-regulated habits—of our foreign civil service. The bill went over among the unfinished work; but it was voluntarily and very wisely suffered so to do, because it was read for the first time only on July 2, and time and leisure were desired for a thorough discussion, which should perfect its details, demonstrate its absolute necessity, and thus render it a piece of wise and stable legislation. The retrenchment, happily, is not expected to result from the diminution of the salaries of officials already in the receipt of only starvation wages, but from the organization of the service on a sound basis, and its subjection to a keen and incessant supervision. A system is proposed similar to that long practised by European countries with brilliant success. The foreign service is to be made a specific career—a life-long profession, like the army or the navy. Many times already have we in these columns urgently pressed the need of such legislation, and undertaken to expose the folly of appointments on political grounds of men equally wanting in the natural and artificial acquirements essential to any tolerable performance of their duties, and who can count with certainty upon only one thing, and that is, that they will be superseded as soon as labor and experience have fitted them to continue at their posts to the national advantage; for the cleverest cannot altogether dispense with preliminary study, and no amount of native ability can evolve from itself the arbitrary rules of law or commerce. The requirements of our Consular Manual, fair enough in theory, are practically only "words, words, words." Never being enforced, they are probably regarded by the majority of the consular force as furnishing a sort of bright ideal which it would be presumptuous in the fleeting official to aspire to reach. It has long been recognized that nothing but thorough legislation could reach and cure the mischief.

Not to go over ground which we have already traversed, there is yet one point which ought to be driven home to the public mind by ceaseless iteration. When once it is appreciated, the popular demand for deep-reaching reform will be too strenuous to be longer neglected or opposed. This point is the ruinous influence of our present service upon our commerce. The report dwells on this at great length and with great earnestness. Its facts and figures are startling. In many quarters of the globe British, French, and Dutch commerce has been positively built up by British, French, and Dutch consuls. They have every means carefully placed at their disposal, and then are sharply watched and obliged to push to the utmost every resource to aid the enterprise of the home merchant, to stimulate trade, to discover and open new channels wherever keen observation can discern the promise of success. To this end they are especially held to render frequent and thorough reports concerning the manufactures, products, commerce, laws, and financial condition of the countries of their residence. The value of such reports in cherishing, or even originating, a safe and large commerce it is impossible to estimate too highly. Study and training are requisite to making them valuable, for they cover a wide ground. Before a European consul gets an appointment of the lowest grade his competency in this respect is tested as well as may be, and his subsequent promotion can only be pari passu with the increase of his ability in this respect. It is of primary importance that he should be a fluent master of the language of the country where he sojourns. This enables him to gather his information for himself, and renders his statements reliable and contemporary, so that they can be immediately and safely acted upon by the merchant at home. It is melancholy to compare with this the feeble, incorrect, and antiquated returns irregularly remitted to the United States by most of her consuls. Occasionally a man of quick parts and conscientious industry furnishes a brilliant exception. But he is sure to be promptly replaced by some totally incompetent person, and the momentary flash only makes the darkness blacker. A peculiar talent and a peculiar knowledge are indispensable to making a valuable report, and when that talent does not exist and that knowledge has never been acquired, it is impossible that the report should be evolved from instinct, or other internal source whatsoever. Especially, a consul who is not familiar with the language of the country of his residence is liable to be the dupe of designing natives, and must compile from newspapers, state reports, and such unreliable or stale sources a treatise which will be historical by the time it reaches the eyes of the United States merchant. With English, French, or Dutch consuls busily plying their search after useful facts, and remitting them rapidly home, beside an American consul in the same port who, however willing, does not really know how to do the same thing, it is very evident how unequal is the competition between the home merchant of those countries and our own. It seems impossible to lay too much stress on this most important matter. We have referred to it before, but now that there is a prospect of gaining the needed legislation the hue-and-cry should never be allowed to cease in the ears of the people till they wake to the sense of how much wealth they daily allow to slip by them, solely for want of a properly constructed foreign service.

Mr. Patterson seems to anticipate that the chief opposition to his bill will be in the notion that it conflicts with the spirit of our institutions, with some sort of bastard tradition—if the United States wears any of the European manacles thus named—to the effect that all offices should be open to the free competition of all persons. We cannot conceive that so hollow and meaningless an objection can be allowed to have any substantial influence. To throw open offices which of necessity can be properly filled only by persons carefully and painfully trained to their requirements, to be scrambled for by all the wirepullers and ward-room politicians in the land, is a very brummagem liberality. Further, an examination into the text of the bill itself utterly annihilates the argument, if argument in any shape it be, which is thus anticipated against it. The Constitution itself provides against any possibility of the creation of a close autocratic caste; it has fixed immutably the power of appointment and removal of ministers and consuls. The Foreign Service Board, which is the backbone of the new creation, is in fact only an instrument devised to aid the President and Senate in the exercise of their functions in a very delicate and difficult department—the management of which to the best advantage requires an amount of skilled labor and unremitting attention which it is impossible for them to give. This board consists of the President, Secretary of State, and three Commissioners. Its duties are as large as its powers are small. It is to examine all candidates for admission to the service, and for advancement to higher grades; to settle also by examination the relative ranks of members of equally long standing in the service; though in cases of necessity it may delegate the duties of examining to competent persons at home or abroad. It is to keep itself thoroughly informed of the capacity, character, conduct, and peculiar natural aptitude of each member of the service. It must also be minutely informed on the importance of our diplomatic relations with all the states of the world, conceive the value of our trade with all ports, and the prospects open to us in new or untried quarters. Then, after acquiring and keeping ceaselessly fresh all this knowledge by assiduous labor, its only real functions are those of advisory experts. It can only recommend to the proper departments of government such action as it knows to be desirable. It can advise promotion or degradation, or any species of change in our representation at any foreign court or port. But in no one of these matters can it do more than give advice, which may be followed or rejected. It may be said that there is little practical danger of its rejection; that, in fact, the board will be arbitrary. This may or may not prove to be the case; but it is certain that it can only occur by reason of the great value and efficiency of the board itself in acquiring and imparting correct information. So far as its influence can go upon this basis, it is a clear advantage to the nation to have it go. Wisdom and knowledge in their own peculiar domain ought always to be absolute. If ignorance or partisanship invades the board and destroys its soundness, the fact cannot for a moment escape the vigilant eyes of those senators who must always in the future, as in the past, be the real masters and final judges in the whole foreign service department.

The only actual power of the board it derives indirectly through a clause which declares that no appropriation shall be made for the payment of any official unless he shall have passed satisfactorily the prescribed examination. That this is strictly reasonable and moderate is evident. If we are to have a foreign service organization at all, and any supervisory board to keep it in order, there must be some ligament to bind all the parts into some degree of unity and coherence. A more harmless ligament than that created by this clause does not suggest itself to us. A less quantity of power would bring the board into contempt. Unless the whole system of the bill is a failure, it is difficult to conceive any conjunction of circumstances which should render this clause a fault.

The bill establishes an excellent system of gradation. All the members of each grade receive the same salary. Promotion is made from grade to grade, subject to the ordeal of examination. The relative rank of members in the same grade is determined by seniority. A post at any court or port may be raised or lowered in grade as the increase or decrease of the importance of our political or commercial relations may render expedient. All this seems to be well and wisely ordained. The plan of gradation gives coherence, simplicity, and ease of management. There are grades enough established to find an appro priate one for each ministry or consulate. Payment by salaries is of course the only true principle; and the rate of salaries fixed is certainly not too high. At present we starve most of our officials. They must give their time and thought to their private affairs in order to live, and we get only what fragments of attention they can afford to spare from the care of their own interest. This penny-wisdom is daily costing the nation thousands upon thousands, or rather millions upon millions. European countries pay their consuls in the same ports variously from twice to even four or five times as much as we pay ours. They pay full price for all the time and labor their consuls can give to the public interest, and they then take care to get all that they pay for. Yet the gross sum paid by these countries is vastly less than the gross sum paid by the United States even in cases where the value of their commerce is very many times greater than that of our own. Mr. Patterson's salaries range from $1,000 for a consular clerk to $7,500 for a consul-general of the first grade; from $1,800 for an assistant secretary of legation to $17,500 for an envoy or minister of the highest grade. We should think that in the majority of countries all these might prove to be what are called living salaries, though certainly not more; and in two or three countries (as in Russia) where the expenses of living are exceptionally high, these sums might be rapidly swallowed up, without maintaining the office in that position of social respectability which ought to be ensured to every representative of the United States. To make them too low would be a much more fatal, and with us a much more probable, error than to make them too high.

The system of promotion is also well arranged. Increase in years, wisdom, and experience is a sound ground for increase in responsibility, honor, and emolument. The danger of a rigid system of seniority is averted by the provision that for service of special value, or for unusual ability, or for other good cause, a certain proportion of promotions may be made irregularly or from the number of citizens at large. This opens the door to natural aptitude wheresoever it may be found. On the other hand, ample means are secured for the degradation or total dismissal of incompetent members—a matter of peculiar importance in a service at once so delicate and so limited in the number of its employees, each one of whom must be equal to all the duties of his post, or must otherwise cause serious detriment to the Republic.

The effect of all these regulations must be to attract to the service which promises a decent and a life-long maintenance, with some degree of dignity even in its lower grades, all persons having a natural taste and aptitude for such a profession, and who are willing and able to acquire the varied and difficult learning which it demands; while to the inefficient or to those lacking the inspiration of native fitness a more unpromising field could hardly be presented than this, so thickly studded with ceaseless examinations and haunted by argus-eyed watchers, whose keen gaze penetrates to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Another very important clause provides that so soon as an American school shall be established in China or Japan, to educate young men in the languages, laws, literature, and customs of Oriental peoples, graduates of this school may be appointed to positions in China, Japan, etc. The need for such a school and for such appointments cannot be exaggerated. The want of them has put us at a serious disadvantage in the active competition which has been of late so eagerly waging to secure the lion's share of Chinese commerce. We have been guilty of the inconceivable folly of making clerks in trading houses, and even missionaries, our consuls, who in China are invested with judicial and other great and important powers unknown to consulates in Christian countries, bringing them into close and influential intercourse with the natives, and calling imperatively for attainments of a very high, very difficult, and very peculiar order. The Chinese despise us for this blundering policy. Trade with them is ignoble, and as for missionaries, their capacity to fill such positions is not worth discussing. English consuls understand familiarly the Chinese language, laws, and customs. They are properly officials, and neither tradespeople nor decayed clergymen. The present British minister to Japan has been twenty years in the Eastern service, to which he was first chosen because of his training in a Chinese school. Much more effectual for promoting our commerce with China than many treaties would be a wise selection of our commercial representatives in that country.

The portion of the bill distributing the various posts among the courts and ports of other nations we do not proprose to discuss minutely. It is likely to be eagerly debated and very much changed before the bill becomes an act. In general, it can be said of it that it certainly promises to effect a most substantial retrenchment, and if it really does not react too far in that direction, of which there is naturally some danger, it is a most melancholy reflection to think how much money we have been squandering most absurdly and uselessly in these our days of taxation and financial embarrassment. It is unquestionably an excellent thing to unite diplomatic and consular functions in one and the same man in a great number of states where we do not now do so. Both branches of the service would probably be better attended to to by one efficient agent than they ever would be by two men, neither of whom would have occupation enough to keep him from rusting. As to the feasibility of accrediting one person as minister to two or even three neighboring states, we see no reason why this would not often be in many respects very advantageous. Yet whether it would be best to do so in all the cases proposed by Mr. Patterson we are by no means confident. By uniting into one the missions to Belgium and Holland, those to Spain and Portugal, those to Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, we should certainly save a little money annually. Our work might be, in fact, fully as well done; but we should very probably irritate some of these nations. The custom has prevailed towards some of the South American states, who have readily submitted to it. But European states are seldom too small or too poor to be proud, and would not probably consider South American precedents quite satisfactory. England once haughtily rejected the minister whom Buenos Ayres had accredited jointly to that country and France. We do not assert that in the above-mentioned cases the experiment might not work favorably. But we are well assured that the retrenchment of a few thousands a year would be foolishly bought by exciting the ill-will of any foreign people, especially maritime and commercial, however insignificant we may deem them or their hostility at the immediate present. The principle itself is strictly reasonable. We approve it highly; but its application is a very delicate matter, and in each instance should be made with all possible caution and courtesy, feeling the way gently, and taking all care not to buy a few thousands a year too dearly.

SERVIA.

The bloody drama which began, on the 10th of June last, with the assassination of Prince Michael of Servia, and of his cousin, Anna Constantinovitch, in the Toptchider Park, near Belgrade, is now fairly over. The attempt of Paul Radovanovitch, his three brothers, and their fellow-conspirators once more to revolutionize Servia by the overthrow of the house of Obrenovitch, has proved a total failure, in spite of their easy success in the first act. The old statesman, Garashanin, whose son narrowly escaped death at the hand of the assassins, has fully evinced his energy in this trying emergency, and saved his country from anarchy and intervention. The Servian National Assembly has reconfirmed the right of the Obrenovitch family to the throne of their people. A young nephew of the murdered prince has ascended it as Milan Obrenovitch IV., and his accession, under the guidance of a regency, has been acknowledged, without hesitation, both by the Sultan as suzerain and the great powers of Europe. The chief conspirators and their accomplices, mostly men of broken-down fortune and doubtful reputation, have been tried, found guilty, and executed. The banished ex-Prince Alexander Kara-Georgevitch, and his son Peter, remain in exile, vehemently protesting against the accusation of complicity in the plot, so gravely charged on them by some of the victims of the trial. A brother-in-law of Alexander has suffered the penalty of death.

The marked sensation which these events have created throughout Europe is but partly to be ascribed to their startling and sanguinary character. It is owing chiefly to the particular interest with which every new political movement that occurs on the Lower Danube is now being scanned by the diplomats as well as the people of that continent. And Servia, more, perhaps, than any other part of those regions, is anxiously watched as one of those fated spots from which the first smoke of the great Panslavic conflagration, which is destined to cover Eastern Europe with ruins, is expected to rise one of these days. The prudent hesitation of the rulers of Servia—a strong mountain fastness separating Roumania from Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro—to join in a crusade against Turkey, has more than once contributed to keep Russia's sword in its scabbard. A sudden change of policy in the principality might easily be followed by a signal for a general rising of the Christian subjects of the Sultan. But numerous and sudden as the changes of government in semi-independent Servia have been, none has as yet succeeded in throwing her even momentarily into the arms of the Czar. A glance at her history in this century will not only show the character and bearing of those revulsions, but also throw considerable light upon the last events as well as the present situation.

Servia, whose last king and independence perished on the battlefield of Kosovo, in 1389, having groaned for four hundred years under the crushing yoke of the Turks, found a first deliverer, in 1804, in Kara (or Czerny, Black) George, and another, ten years later, in Milosh Obrenovitch. The former, a semi-barbarian of low descent, but full of vigor and wild devotion to his fatherland, led his warlike countrymen, whom the excesses of the Janizaries had driven to despair, to repeated victories over their oppressors, and, profiting by a Russo-Turkish war, achieved a partial self-rule for his country, and was acknowledged its chief. But having renewed the war, in 1809, in conjunction with his former allies, he after some successes assumed a neutral attitude, and was soon after abandoned by Russia, which, threatened by Napoleon's invasion of 1812, hastened to conclude the peace of Bucharest. Hard pressed from every quarter, Kara George lost his wonted energy, and finally gave up the struggle, fleeing into Austria. It was then that Milosh, a man of equally poor origin, but no less crafty than brave, evinced his higher natural abilities, gallantly maintaining the fight, and soon winning the confidence of both friends and foes to such a degree as to be able to bring about a peace. This, however, was violated by fresh acts of oppression, and on Palm Sunday, 1815, he again raised the standard of revolt. This new struggle was crowned with success, leading to the establishment of that autonomy which Servia has enjoyed for upwards of half a century, and the sphere of which has gradually been widened to the very verge of absolute independence. He was elected by a national assembly Prince of Servia, and confirmed by the Sultan, passing to his dignity over the corpse of his former leader, Kara George, who, secretly returning from exile, had been betrayed by him into the hands of the Turks.

Milosh's reign was firm and able, but often arbitrary and violent. By preserving strict neutrality between Russia and Turkey during the war of 1828-29, he exposed himself to the hostility and intrigues of the former power, which, on one hand, fostered the growth of a national party, inclined to assert the dignity of Servia by a bolder attitude; and, on the other, persuaded the Porte to limit the sway of the Prince by means of a Senate. He was finally compelled, in 1839, to resign in favor of his son, Milan, who, dying after a few weeks, was succeeded by his brother, the lately assassinated Michael, then a boy of fourteen. Unable to govern himself or others, this young Prince was for a time tossed about by violent factions, until overthrown by a revolution in 1842, which sent the house of Obrenovitch into exile, and recalled to the throne that of Kara George, in the person of his son, Alexander.

This revolution, achieved by the national party, and sanctioned by all powers concerned, bore no fruits for Russia. Alexander Kara-Georgevitch, advised by Garashanin, continued the international policy of Milosh while actively engaged in promoting the internal welfare of the country, and in spite of all the temptations held out by the Czar during the Crimean war remained neutral. The eventful years 1848 and 1849, however, during which the Serbs (Rascians) of Hungary, aided by their brethren from the other side of the Save, and in co-operation with the Croats, waged a fierce warfare against the Magyars, had given new power over the minds of the Servian people to the long-cherished dreams of South-Slavic or Panslavic greatness, and it became easy to the combined efforts of the partisans of Russia and of the Obrenovitches, who now openly sided with the Czar, to undermine the position of Alexander, with the aid of the more extreme part of the national opposition. A senatorial conspiracy, in 1857, failed, but another movement in the following year was successful, and the two rival dynastic houses again exchanged places. Old Milosh was re-established, early in 1859, as hereditary Prince of Servia, but died after a short reign, in 1860, and was succeeded by Michael.

The new reign began and was continued successfully, the Porte gradually yielding almost every disputed point, and shortly before his death Michael, who made his former opponent Garashanin his prime minister, had the satisfaction of seeing the last of the Turkish garrisons, including that of the fortress of Belgrade, withdrawn from the country, whose relation to the Porte was thus changed to an almost nominal tributary connection. In every other respect, too, Servia was steadily progressing. But with their return to power the Obrenovitches had also returned to their earlier international policy, while their exiled enemies, settled across the border in Hungary, gradually recommenced agitating and plotting with the opposite factions. Michael was denounced as faithless to the national and Christian interests of the Slavic race, and as a vile tool of Franco-Austro-Hungarian diplomacy in its opposition to Russian hegemony in the East.

It would be presumptuous to judge, from this distance, by the scanty materials made public by the leaders of the trial, how far fanatical sentiments of this kind have contributed to ripen the plot which has so abruptly terminated the reign and life of Michael Obrenovitch III. So much, however, appears certain, that personal motives—reckless ambition, hatred, and a fondness for political adventure—were the chief springs of action with the leading conspirators, and that both national aspirations and foreign money—gained, perhaps, under false pretences—were made use of to procure abettors in an enterprise the real import and aim of which Paul Radovanovitch may have divulged but to few of his associates. That a republican and agrarian movement was contemplated among other eventualities, and perhaps with predilection, by that audacious conspirator, seems almost equally certain. The general outburst of indignation, however, which followed the assassination, and the enthusiastic unanimity with which the Servians have placed young Milan on the throne of his uncle, evidently show how miscalculated the whole scheme was, and have justly been cited by the Emperor of the French, in a conversation held a few weeks ago, and already commented on by us, as confirming the rule that political murders serve only to strengthen the party whose overthrow is aimed at.

Throughout this century, little Servia, whose population even now hardly exceeds 1,200,000—almost all of Slavic race and Greek Orthodox faith—has acted a more conspicuous part in Europe than either its magnitude and resources or the intellectual and moral condition of its people would have led observers to expect. This is owing to a most advantageous geographical position, to the warlike character of the nation, to a favorable combination of political circumstances, and also to the energy and ability of some of the Servian rulers, who, though belonging to two bitterly hostile houses, have, when in power, steadily and firmly maintained one line of policy, and, in spite of constant internal and foreign machinations, uniformly advanced the welfare and promoted the power of the country. For the future, it is encouraging to know that the regency under which the new Prince has been placed is composed of men whose past services offer a guaranty for a consistent continuation of the preceding rule. But it will require a firm hand to steer the little state safely across the shoals and rocks where the stream of South-Slavic history is likely to flow, with increased impetuosity, in the near future.

ENGLAND.

London, July 18, 1868.

One of the beauties of London, or rather of its neighborhood, consists in the extent of still unbroken commons. The most picturesque of those still remaining is Wimbledon, at the distance of some six miles from the heart of the town. Emerging from the long rows of suburban villas, one finds one'sself on the edge of a broad level plateau, with long stretches of turf bounded by gorse and heather, and to all appearance as wild as a moor in Scotland. Beyond this plain the common descends pretty steeply to the edge of a little stream, on the opposite side of which are the picturesque slopes of Combe wood, belonging to the Duke of Cambridge. Several little ravines break the crest of the hill and may stand for very fair miniatures of a Highland glen. Standing at the bottom, one has on each side broken banks of gorse, and the vista is closed by the foliage of Combe wood. For anything that strikes the senses, London might be as distant as it is from Helvellyn or Ben Lomond. Indeed, the extreme seclusion of these glens recommended them in former days as the scene of duels, at the last of which the notorious Lord Cardigan was a performer, and he has bequeathed the name of Glen Cardigan to its scene. How it comes to pass that so much unbroken ground has still been preserved from the universal plague of brick and mortar would be too long a story to tell; only I may say that a vigorous legal battle is raging between the commoners, who maintain their right to keep it open, and Lord Spencer, the lord of the manor, who is anxious to establish his right to enclose it. Threatened by the constant anxiety of annexing so valuable a bit of property, and by the ambition of numerous railways to force a passage through it, it has hitherto held its ground; perhaps, however, its best chance of permanent safety consists in the fact that it has been unanimously chosen as the great meeting-ground of our volunteers. The level plateau does well as a parade-ground, and along the edge of the slope are erected the butts. Missing bullets are supposed occasionally to cross the valley and slaughter some of the game in the recesses of Combe wood; but till the wood is displaced by villas human life will not be endangered.

Hence it comes to pass that Wimbledon Common is at the present moment a great place of resort. The annual shooting matches are going forward, and volunteers from all parts of the kingdom are swarming to this centre. There is the prize of £250 given by the Queen for the distinguished volunteer who will, for a year, be the champion shot of England. There are innumerable supplementary prizes given by all sorts of persons from all sorts of motives, from the Prince of Wales to retail shopkeepers, and from pure patriotism to simple desire of advertising. There are matches between England, Scotland, and Ireland; between the Houses of Lords and Commons; between Oxford and Cambridge; or between Eton and Harrow,

There are prizes to be won in all sorts of competitions, and with all sorts of rifles. There are prizes for firing as many shots as possible in a minute, for firing at a moving object shaped like a stag, for firing whilst running fifty yards between each shot, and for excellence in any other imaginable variety of competition. Now, there is to my mind no stupider sight in this world than a rifle-match. You see a gentleman lying on his stomach for a long time carefully adjusting a rifle; he fires it, and you are informed that he has done something wonderful, or the reverse; but when all is said, there has been nothing to see but a gentleman on his stomach. Moreover, there are so many competitions going on at once that the mind of the ordinary civilian becomes hopelessly bewildered, and he strays vaguely from one butt to another without a guess as to what is going on, till he reads the results in next day's newspaper. In another way the sight is interesting enough. The rifle-shooting has become the centre of attraction for a gigantic picnic. It has become fashionable to camp out on the common, and some three thousand men pass the time under canvas, by way, as I suppose they intended originally, of initiating themselves in the hardships of campaigning. If this was their design, it was laudable, but has been rather a failure. The tents have become as luxurious as tents can be. They are supplied by skilful caterers from London; there is abundance to eat and to drink, and plenty of conviviality for those who do not fear the effect upon the firmness of their nerves. The volunteers seem to be having a very jolly time of it, and they consequently swarm in every variety of uniform. The most popular color, owing to some tradition about riflemen, was a dark green, which, at a small distance, appeared to be positively black. A lighter grey has now become commoner, and some of the volunteers stick to the good old British scarlet. The consequence is, that a brigade of volunteers presents the most singular mixture of colors conceivable, and I fear that the variety of their dress represents only too faithfully the heterogeneous composition of the force in other respects. Indeed, a walk across Wimbledon Common would suggest to the "intelligent foreigner" of newspapers some very obvious reflections as to our volunteer army. In one respect it has certainly succeeded beyond expectation. Rifle-shooting has become a popular amusement, and there are few towns of even moderate size which do not reckon a certain number of enthusiastic shots among their inhabitants. Although it is regarded with some contempt by the devotees of cricket, rowing, and other sports favored by the genuine athlete, it seems to have taken root as a kind of subsidiary amusement. In towns it has supplied a very useful recreation for the tradesmen, who have been very much in want of some open-air exercise; and the number of really good performers steadily increases. Considered as an army, the volunteers are much more open to criticism. Some thirty thousand of them went down the other day to a grand review at Wimbledon, and, provoked by some railway mismanagement, they became dissolved, on their return, into a confused and chaotic mass. Some of their leaders have described them, in consequence, as an utter sham; and they have received some harder language than they have hitherto been accustomed to. To say the truth, they have the faults which are necessarily incident to men merely "playing at soldiers." Their officers, with few exceptions, have not been trained in any way, and know next to nothing about their business. They have no authority over their men, and the discipline is universally of the laxest description. What would be still more fatal to the body considered as an army, they have scarcely any organization; they stand in no particular relation to the regular army or to the militia; and if ten thousand of them were collected together, they could not march a hundred miles for want of commissariat. They would be simply a large body of excursionists. What we have is simply two hundred thousand men possessing a tolerable knowledge of drill, and well skilled in the use of the rifle. They are the raw material, but not the manufactured army.

Talking of military affairs reminds me naturally of Sir R. Napier. We have not yet done throwing up our hats and cheering him to the echo. He has been made a peer, has received a pension of £2,000 a year for two lives, and has been chased up and down from banquet to banquet with that perseverance characteristic of the English lion-hunter. An unpleasant little controversy has meanwhile cropped up in the papers. It is asserted that King Theodore was deceived at the last moment, and was led to understand that the English commander had accepted his present, and thereby, according to Eastern customs, had agreed to peace. The attack upon Magdala, it is asserted, took him by surprise, and was to his understanding a breach of faith. The matter has not been quite explained, nor do we know who was the responsible person, as the messages to Theodore had to pass through more than one interpreter. The discussion has left a rather unpleasant impression, but we are so determined to rejoice over our victory that it is impossible to obtain much hearing for it. Meanwhile, Sir Robert, or Lord Napier of Magdala, seems to receive his worshippers with all due modesty and gives general satisfaction.

Mr. Bright is already off to Ireland, for the laudable purpose of salmon-fishing. He was caught on his road by some obtrusive corporation and made to deliver a speech on the well-worn topics of the Church and the land-laws. Of course he made it, and seems to have spoken well; but I think that the exaction was felt to be a piece of unnecessary cruelty. Our legislators are all eager to be off and to cast away their cares for a time. The election which is hanging over them is a cruel prospect for most. The change in the constituencies leaves everything uncertain except that there will probably be heavier expenses than ever. Direct bribery is perhaps likely to be less common, more because it is past any one's means to bribe sufficiently in a large constituency than because a new and more stringent act has lately been passed against it. But the modes of spending money in a legitimate way are so numerous that the expense is growing heavier in most boroughs. The new candidates who come forward are for the most part men who can afford to spend £1,500 or £2,000 a year for the pleasure of being members of Parliament. They are generally middle-aged merchants who have made a fortune in a large town and are ambitious of the magical letters M.P., and it is becoming daily more difficult for a poor man to enter into that paradise—though still it may be rather easier than for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle. Mr. Thomas Hughes has distinguished himself by declaring that he will spend no money upon his election, and that his constituents may take him or leave him as they choose; and Mr. Mill takes the same position, though in his case the necessary funds are raised by collection amongst his numerous admirers both in and out of the borough. To men so widely known, for different reasons, this is possible. The Liberal press is certain to support both of them, and will spontaneously supply the advertisements so necessary and generally so expensive. The borough of Greenwich proposes to honor itself in a similar way by electing Mr. Gladstone free of expense, although he still stands for Lancashire. Should he fail in the North, he will thus find a refuge in the metropolis. But it certainly grows more difficult for an unknown man to come forward simply on his merits and attract notice in a populous town without very large expenditure.

Candidates threatened by such troubles have a right to long for a little repose, and Parliament is growing languid under the influence of general weariness, increased by the terrible heat and unprecedented drought from which we are suffering. The grass caught fire the other day on Wimbledon close to the ammunition tent and all but blew up some thousands of pounds weight of gunpowder and nobody knows how many volunteers. It was put out by a timely display of energy, but everywhere the fields are all parched and thirsty and capable of getting up on a miniature scale a representation of a prairie on fire.

Correspondence.

THE BONDS.—THE LETTER OF THE LAW.

To the Editor of the Nation:

In your last issue, in reply to Mr. Walker, you appear to admit that, according to the letter of the law, the Government can pay off its five-twenty bonds in greenbacks.

Is this so?

The bond for which I subscribed, to sustain the Government, reads: "It is hereby certified that the United States of America are indebted unto ——, or bearer, in the sum of one hundred dollars."

What is a dollar?

By the law, a dollar is defined to be "a silver coin weighing four hundred and twelve and a half grains, or a gold coin weighing twenty-five and four-fifth grains of nine-tenths pure to one-tenth alloy of each metal."

Your correspondent may say that the Government has made greenbacks "dollars."

Is this so?

On the face of them they read, "The United States promise to pay to bearer one dollar."

These notes promise to pay coins. To say that they are coins is to disregard a distinction they themselves draw, and to make the promise and performance identical.

But this logic drives us to the conclusion that the Government has already repudiated its obligations, for every unredeemed greenback is a swindle on its face. If the Republican party continue these as a legal tender for private debts, will they not soon be made a legal tender for public debts also?

There are but two courses, specie payments or more repudiation. Will you not, then, direct your batteries to the turning-point in the fight?

Yours, C.

MOUNT AIRY, July 27, 1868.

[If the letter of the law were as simple as our correspondent seems to think it, there would be no dispute. Unfortunately the law, like most of our laws, was accidentally or intentionally left imperfect, with just enough of ambiguity in it to admit of a double interpretation. Whatever our own views on the subject may be, and we have frequently and explicitly stated them, candor compels us to acknowledge that "the letter of the law" cannot be appealed to as decisive, since the greenbacks were undoubtedly made a "legal tender" for all claims and demands due to the United States and against the United States, except for interest and duties. That the greenbacks are only promises to pay coin is very true, but it is these very promises which Congress has made a legal tender, without providing the means or stipulating the time of their redemption. The Legal-Tender Act undoubtedly admits of the interpretation that the "sum of one hundred dollars," for which the United States are indebted to our correspondent, is the sum of one hundred legal tender dollars.

The letter of the law admits of two interpretations. The spirit of the law can alone decide. In our own opinion the evidence unquestionably shows that it was the intention of Congress to make the principal of the five-twenty bonds payable in coin; that at the time of their issue, and for some time thereafter, Congress and the people believed that the bonds had been made so payable; that not one person in a hundred once thought that specie payments would be suspended long enough ever to allow this question to arise; and that the question did not arise practically until the gold premium had become so high, and the finances so deranged, that the hope of an early return to specie payments was abandoned. That this view is correct we have not a shadow of doubt. But we are well aware that many good and able men disagree with us entirely. Who is to decide?

As matters stand, the question has ceased to be one of mere legality, and has become a question of equity and statesmanship. The equitable rights of a bondholder are susceptible of most perfect adjustment whenever the financial position of the country justifies it in attempting such an adjustment. Neither our own, nor our correspondent's, nor any one else's interpretation of the law will affect the position of the bondholders in the least. Nothing that any one can suggest in the way of argument can remove the doubt that hangs over the bonds; and until some practical object is to be gained by clearly establishing the country's liability, further discussion seems almost futile.—ED. NATION.]

THE NATIONAL DECLINE IN PRODUCTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with deep interest the article on "The Financial Prospect," in the Nation, No. 156, with the comments of correspondents thereon, and your replies thereto.

I enclose herewith a comparative table, showing the quantity and value of certain agricultural products, at various times, which, although prepared for an entirely different purpose, sustains all that you say in regard to the relative decline of agricultural products. From this it appears that not only has there been no increase in quantity corresponding with that of population, but in some items there was an absolute decline from 1860 to 1866, so that there was actually less per capita than there was in 1860.

The values given for 1866 are in currency, which, if reduced to specie, the average price of gold being 1.41, will show that the money value of the crops was only about $1,780,000,000, thus showing that the increase in this respect did not keep pace with the increase of population. M.

Statement of certain Products of Agriculture, according to the United States Census returns of 1840, 1850, and 1860, with the estimated Products of 1866.

| PRODUCTS. | 1839-40. | | 1849-50. | | 1859-60. | | 1866-67. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | QUANTITY. | VALUE. | QUANTITY. | VALUE. | QUANTITY. | VALUE. | QUANTITY. | VAL., CURRENCY. |
| Indian corn....bush. | 377,531,875 | $132,572,186 | 592,071,104 | $296,035,552 | 838,792,740 | $377,456 733 | 867,946,295 | $591,666,295 |
| Wheat.... " | 84,823,272 | 68,016,156 | 100,485,944 | 100,485,944 | 173,104,924 | 173,104,924 | 175,000,000 | 383,773,646 |
| Oats.... " | 123,071,341 | 37,123,052 | 146,584,179 | 43,975,253 | 172,643,185 | 51,792,955 | 268,141,077 | 135,255,326 |
| Rye.... " | 18,645,567 | 13,984,175 | 14,188,813 | 7,803,847 | 21,101,380 | 13,000,000 | 20,864,944 | 24,661,290 |
| Buckwheat.... " | 7,291,743 | 4,187,205 | 8,956,912 | 6,969,838 | 17,571,818 | 17,571,818 | 22,791,839 | 22,164,121 |
| Barley.... " | 4,161,504 | 3,121,128 | 5,167,015 | 3,616,910 | 15,825,898 | 10,250,000 | 11,283,807 | 11,383,698 |
| Wool....lbs. | 35,802,114 | 11,292,144 | 52,516,959 | 15,755,087 | 60,264,913 | 18,500,000 | 100,000,000 | 50,000,000 |
| Hops.... " | 1,238,502 | 63,491 | 3,497,029 | 1,222,960 | 10,991,996 | 700,000 | 20,000,000 | 5,000,000 |
| Beeswax and honey.... " | 628,303 | 62,830 | 14,853,790 | 2,376,606 | 24,689,144 | 4,860,000 | 24,689,144 | 7,500,000 |
| Potatoes, Irish....bush. | 108,298,060 | 24,014,962 | 65,797,896 | 26,319,158 | 111,148,867 | 55,600,000 | 107,200,976 | 72,939,029 |
| " sweet.... " | | | 38,268,148 | 19,134,074 | 42,095,026 | 25,200,000 | | |
| Hay....tons. | 10,248,108 | 79,843,028 | 13,838,642 | 96,870,494 | 19,083,896 | 240,000,000 | 21,778,627 | 317,561,837 |
| Hemp.... " | 95,251 | 8,504,896 | 34,871 | 5,247,430 | 74,493 | 7,449,300 | 74,493 | 15,000,000 |
| Flax....lbs. | Included with hemp. | | 7,709,676 | 770,967 | 4,720,145 | 300,000 | 4,720,145 | 750,000 |
| Tobacco.... " | 219,163,319 | 10,400,530 | 199,752,655 | 13,982,686 | 434,209,461 | 39,000,000 | 388,128,684 | 53,778,888 |
| Rice.... " | 80,841,422 | 1,955,840 | 215,313,497 | 4,000,000 | 187,167,032 | 5,700,000 | 10,104,000 | 600,000 |
| Cotton.... " | 790,479,275 | 57,130,302 | 978,317,200 | 98,603,720 | 2,154,820,800 | 172,385,664 | 885,790,400 | 225,000,000 |
| Cane Sugar.... " | 155,110,809 | 5,907,882 | 236,814,000 | 12,378,850 | 230,982,000 | 11,500,000 | 40,000,000 | 4,000,000 |
| Maple " .... " | | | 34,253,436 | 1,712,671 | 40,120,205 | 6,000,000 | 40,120,205 | 10,000,000 |
| Butter.... " | Not given. | 33,787,008* | 313,345,306 | 50,135,248 | 459,681,372 | 55,200,000 | 460,000,000 | 115,000,000 |
| Cheese.... " | " " | | 105,535,893 | 5,276,795 | 103,663,927 | 11,300,000 | 200,000,000 | 30,000,000 |
| Wine....gals. | 124,734 | 62,367 | 221,249 | 442,498 | 1,627,242 | 1,627,242 | 4,000,000 | 4,000,000 |
| Silk cocoons....lbs. | 61,523 | 61,523 | 10,843 | 5,421 | 11,944 | 12,000 | 11,944 | 12,000 |
| Orchard products.... | Not given. | 7,256,904 | Not given. | 7,723,186 | Not given. | 19,991,885 | Not given. | 35,000,000 |
| Market-garden products.... | " " | 2,601,196 | " " | 5,280,030 | " " | 16,159,498 | " " | 30,000,000 |
| Peas and beans....bush. | " " | Not given | 9,219,901 | 5,762,436 | 15,061,995 | 7,500,000 | 15,061,995 | 15,000,000 |
| Molasses, cane....gals. | " " | " " | | | 14,963,996 | 4,250,000 | 2,500,000 | 1,000,000 |
| " maple.... " | " " | " " | 12,700,991 | 2,540,179 | 1,597,589 | 600,000 | 2,000,000 | 800,000 |
| " sorghum.... " | " " | " " | | | 6,749,123 | 1,900,000 | 10,000,000 | 3,000,000 |
| Clover-seed....bush. | " " | " " | 468,978 | 2,344,890 | 956,188 | 1,400,000 | 956,188 | 3,000,000 |
| Grass " .... " | " " | " " | 416,831 | 833,662 | 900,040 | 1,400,000 | 900,040 | 2,000,000 |
| Flax " .... " | " " | " " | 562,312 | 843,468 | 566,867 | 800,000 | 566,867 | 1,500,000 |
| Live stock.... | " " | 110,847,879 | Not given. | 136,045,129 | Not given. | 272,332,479 | Not given. | 335,910,935 |
| | | $612,796,684 | | $974,494,989 | | $1,624,844,498 | | $2,507,257,065 |

NOTE.—For the year 1840 the values are those stated by Prof. Tucker. For 1850, with the exception of "live stock," the values are those given on page 176 of De Bow's "Compendium of the Seventh Census." For 1860, with the exception of "live stock," the values are those given by Mr. Delmar ("International Almanac, 1866," page 60). For 1866, the quantities and values of the crops of grain, hops, potatoes, hay, tobacco, butter, and cheese, are those given in the annual and monthly reports of the Department of Agriculture; of wool, that given in the report of the Special Commissioner of the Revenue; of cotton, the quantity (2,214,476 bales, of 400 lbs. each) is that given in "Neill Brothers' Cotton Circular," October 15, 1867; of cane sugar and molasses, the quantities as reported in the New Orleans Price Current, March 9, 1867.

The above table may be found on page 34 of the "Annual Report of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics on the Commerce and Navigation of the United States," for the year ending June 30, 1867; and persons having more precise information concerning special crops than is furnished therein should send it to the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

* Dairy products.

Notes.

LITERARY.

J. B. Lippincott & Co. have in press the "Journal of the Voyage of H.M.S. Galatea Round the World, under the Command of H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh;" "Chambers's Encyclopædian Atlas; comprising a series of Thirty-nine Maps, printed in colors, and a Map of the Annual Revolution of the Earth round the Sun;" "Seekers after God (the Lives of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius)," by Rev. F. W. Farrar, M.A.; "Ab-sa-ra-ka, Home of the Crows; being the Experience of an Officer's Wife on the Plains;" "The Sure Resting-place; being Selected Sayings of Our Lord Jesus Christ, arranged as a Manual of Faith and Practice;" and "A Summer in Iceland," by C. W. Paijkull (translated by M. R. Barnard, B.A.) The same house announces new editions of Aitken's "Science and Practice of Medicine," of Dr. Billings's "First Principles of Medicine," and Dr. Reynolds's "Science of Medicine." These are three works out of many by English and American authors which figure in Lippincott's new catalogue of medical works and works on natural history. Lippincott & Co. are agents for the cheap reprint of Dickens's Household Words.——Mr. James Miller announces the republication of Miss Annie Thomas's "Three Wives."

—The intensity of our American life has been often enough the subject of foreign comment, but the inference which Mme. Dora d'Istria draws from it in the Revue des Deux Mondes for July 15, is, so far as we remember, entirely original. We say inference, because although her remarks have the air of being based on experience, they are better, all things considered, ascribed to the habit of generalization in which the French perhaps excel all other people. The writer is treating of the Bulgarian nationality, and having to consider the relations of the two sexes, she steps aside for illustrations. In Latin countries, she says, women learn the laws of the universe through religious traditions, while men learn them by studying the gigantic discoveries of the human intellect which we call modern science. Hence the latter come to regard the former as an inferior species, with different capacities. In the United States, on the contrary, it is not so. There, "where the men are absorbed in unremitting exertion (par une labeur sans relâche), it is the women who most readily apply themselves to books and science, and at the female university of Vassar Female College one would almost be led to pity the rudeness of men's pursuits (la grossièreté des habitudes viriles)." We trust that Vassar will bind this number of the Revue in the most elegant manner, and cherish it above all her library. The male citizen whose business barely leaves him leisure to keep track of politics will do well also to purchase this number, and when his wife has read Emile Blanchard on the "First Observers with the Microscope" and George Sand's "Letters of a Traveller concerning Botany," he may enjoy M. Auguste Laugel's résumé of Mr. Edmund Quincy's life of his father, the late Josiah Quincy, and the "Last of the American Federalists."

—Y Drych, the oldest and for a long time only Welsh newspaper in the United States, now in its eighteenth year, has recently been enlarged and put into a very handsome new dress. Since it has passed into the hands of its present publisher, Mr. John Mather Jones, Y Drych has given evidence of very decided improvement both in its collection of news interesting to its large and intelligent class of readers, and also in the tone of its miscellaneous articles. Claiming to be and being independent in politics, its influence has been vigorously exerted in favor of the Republican party, while not approving all that that party has done. How far its influence has tended to make the Welsh people what they are, almost unanimously Republican in politics, it would be somewhat difficult to determine, as their intense repugnance to slavery has made them Republicans without the need of outside pressure. But in the elucidation of the principles of the Republican party, the defence of its doctrines, and the presentation of facts bearing upon the political situation, it has done yeoman's service in the Union cause. Though it pays considerable attention to politics it cannot be classed as a political journal. It aims to treat of all subjects of interest to its readers, and shows great ability in its editorial articles and completeness in its collection of Welsh news from all parts of the United States.

—An unknown correspondent, to whom we would here express our obligations, sends us from Geneva a part of the "Bibliothèque Nationale," published in Paris, of which the titles will be found on another page under "Books of the Week." (The latest of them bears date May, 1868.) "I judged," says our correspondent, "from the spirit of your paper, that you would be interested in them, as examples of cheap printing successfully applied to a worthy purpose. They seemed to me a good text from which to hang an appeal, or suggestion, to our American publishers to attempt a similar series of books at once good and popular." We are very glad of the opportunity to make this appeal by bringing into general notice this admirable but little known series. The "library" at present consists of 23 volumes of history, 20 of morals and philosophy, 3 of science, 4 of pedagogy (the whole of Rousseau's "Emile"), 26 of tales, 6 of "Fantaisie" (Sterne's "Sentimental Journey" and "Gulliver," among others), 11 of plays (French and German), 10 of poetry (the whole of Horace, Dante's "Inferno," etc.), 11 of "Polygraphie" (miscellaneous), and 1 of æsthetics—in all, 115 volumes. Each of these is sold for 25 centimes, or a quarter of a franc; and the importing value of the franc being 33 cents gold, any one of the series could be obtained here for 12 cents in currency. The form is a 32mo, most convenient for the pocket, and there are six "signatures," or 192 pages. We may compare this with the Messrs. Appleton's "plum-pudding edition" of Dickens, choosing the "American Notes," which sells for 15 cents, and is a 12mo, with 108 pages. The first noticeable difference after the shape is the type, which in the "Notes" is as small as that employed in the Nation's table of contents (nonpareil), while in the French series it is a trifle larger than the type used in our editorial articles (bourgeois). Of course the odds are greatly in favor of the latter, so far as eyesight is concerned. The French paper is quite as good as the American, and at all events is good enough, a lesson which our publishers can never learn too soon. The matter contained in the "Notes" is about twice that of (say) the "Montesquieu." Here, then, we have the evidence that an American house might imitate the French example, and find its profit in doing so, provided it could be assured of a sufficient sale. But of this, we think, there ought to be no doubt, and if the American classics would not sustain the undertaking, there is no reason why it should not be floated as the French is, by translations from the classics of all countries, ancient and modern. Mr. Longfellow's "Dante" or Mr. Parsons's "Inferno" would certainly find a remunerative market, along with Mr. Brooks's "Faust" and "Titan," and many another translation honorable to American letters. For the rest, all that is wanted is judgment in selecting parts of an author's whole—those parts which have deserved and won a fixed place in literature, and cannot be repeated too often. Will not the Appletons, when they have exhausted the Scott series and the Marryat series—or will not Ticknor & Fields, dropping their "Good Stories"—turn their attention to this more useful mode of supplying the people with good reading? Several of the volumes before us are marked "fifth edition." The series appears to be issued fortnightly.

—Mr. Henry Morley—the author, let us say, of two or three delightful biographical works not so well known as they should be, and best known by his poorest book, "Palissy the Potter"—recently, while working in the British Museum Library, made a "find" which at first view seemed to be of almost the greatest value. He discovered a poem written on the blank leaf of the original edition (1645) of Milton's first collected English and Latin poems, entitled "An Epitaph" and signed J. M., Ober. (October) 1647. The handwriting seemed to Mr. Morley (who, however, does not say that compared it with anything but his recollection of fac-similes of Milton's hand) undoubtedly genuine, and he copied the poem with rejoicing, and sent it to the Times with a letter, to which the Times gave the honor of leaded type. Unfortunately, the authorities of the Museum, finding that the rush of visitors to see the treasure was becoming inconvenient, held a consultation, examined the autograph, and announced in the Pall Mall Gazette that the handwriting was not Milton's and that the signature was not "J. M.," but "P. M." There is no appeal, we suppose, from this decision. The following lines are the best of the poem:

"Think not (reader) me less blest
Sleeping in this narrow cist
Than if my ashes did lie hid
Under some stately pyramid.
If a rich tombe makes happy yn
That Bee was happier far yn men
Who busie in ye thymie wood
Was fettered by ye golden flood
Wch fro ye Amber-weeping Tree
Distilleth downe so plenteously;
Ffor so this little wanton Elfe
Most gloriously enshrind itselfe
A tombe whose beauty might compare
With Cleopatra's sepulcher.

. . . . . .

"Then pass on gently ye yt mourne,
Touch not this mine hollowed Urne
These Ashes wch doe here remaine
A vitall tincture still retaine;
A seminall forme within ye deeps
Of this little chaos sleeps;
The thred of life untwisted is
Into its first existencies;
Infant Nature cradled here
In its principles appeare;
This plant thg [though] entered into dust

In its Ashes rest it must
Until sweet Psyche shall Inspire
A softning and œtifick fire
And in her fost'ring armes enfold
This Heavy and this earthly mould:
Then, as I am He be no more
But bloome and blossome b . . . [as before]
When this cold numnes shall retreate,
By a more yn Chymick heat."

There is nothing in verses such as these (if we except some poor rhyming and the bad grammar, for rhyme's sake, of one couplet) which Milton should have been very much ashamed to write, though certainly nothing of which he could have been proud; and they are much in his manner. Most probably they are the work of some youthful lover of Milton, who knew by heart the "Il Penseroso" and "L'Allegro."

—Another of "the immortals" is dead, M. Viennet having departed this life the other day in Paris. In this country nothing was known of him, but although of late, in his old age, somewhat out of public view, he once was a very busy and prominent man in the literature and politics of the French capital. He once said of himself that not less than five hundred epigrams were published every year on his person, his features, his poems, his speeches in the Chambers, his tuft of hair rebellious to the comb, and his green surtout. That was back in the Orleanist days, when, in consequence of his prosecution of a newspaper editor for libel and his warm support of Louis Philippe's repressive anti-revolutionary measures, he was decidedly the most unpopular man in France. The love of the Bonapartists he never had, nor they his; the Legitimists could not be very fond of a man who went to the barricades against Charles X., and Louis Philippe's friends were not very numerous. But Viennet was proud of his unpopularity and enjoyed it, being a natural born lover of hot water, and having a fine satirical gift to aid in keeping him constantly quarrelling. Moreover, he spared neither friends nor foes, but impartially gave everybody reason to hate him. He was born, says a writer in the London Times who knew him personally, either in 1777 or 1771, and, at the youngest, died at the great age of 91. His place of birth was the little town of Beziers, which is said to have had the honor of producing no less than three academicians. At nineteen he became a lieutenant in the marine artillery; he was captured by the English, served on land in Saxony, and was present at Bautzen and Dresden and at Lützen, where he got the cross of the Legion of Honor from the hand of the Emperor and the rank of captain. But he had voted against the life consulate of Napoleon and against the establishment of the Empire, and his success as a soldier was less than it should have been. Indeed, on one occasion the decree for his transportation to Cayenne was actually signed, and he would have been exiled but for the entreaties of Marshal Gouvion St. Cyr. St. Cyr got him into the royal staff corps when the Bourbons returned, but he satirized the Bourbons, and when he was made a deputy attacked them and their policy violently, and, of course, caustically. He liked monarchy, but Jesuits he abhorred, he said, and he hated despotism. He was not long in losing his staff appointment. As we have said, he was a warm Orleanist, and Louis Philippe raised him to the peerage in 1840 The controversy between romanticism and classicism in literature engaged a good deal of his attention, which he by no means confined to politics, and he vigorously made himself enemies on both sides. In 1830 he was made an academician, beating Benjamin Constant. To name his literary productions would be to make an immense list of tragedies, comedies, poems, epistles, essays, histories, and whatever else is done in prose or verse. His sarcastic "Fables" in polished verse are considered his best work, but his "Memoirs," which are to come, will no doubt do most to keep his name alive. They can hardly fail to be exceedingly readable.

—The French opposition have been defeated in their endeavor to get a little more freedom for the book-press. They proposed to abolish the office, or suppress the salary, of the chief officer of the Colportage or Hawkers' Commission. M. Rouher defended the existing law, of course; it was horrible, he said, to think of the pedlar opening his pack of ribbons and threads at the cottage-door and then slily inducing the innocent cottage-girl to buy immoral books and engravings. In fact, the law creating the commission was made in the republican days just after '48, and doubtless was made in the interests of morality, and not for political purposes at all. M. Jules Simon admitted all that M. Rouher had said to be true; he wished it said more strongly, if possible; but the picture drawn by the minister was already to be seen all over France, he said, and it was most certainly in great part the result of the way in which the Colportage Commission discharged its duties. To works of the greatest obscenity the Government will allow its stamp, and is sure to refuse it to works that in any, the most indirect, way are opposed to the administration—even if so indirectly, as by having the name of a known anti-Imperialist on the title-page; what ever may be the contents of the work, it is wrong, the commission seems to think, to give currency even to the names of the politically evil-disposed. M. Rouher had his majority, however, and did not trouble himself with much argument. The control of the book-press—which in a country, like France, of few bookstores depends for real publication on the hawkers—is a power too valuable for Napoleon to think of giving it up.

—The commission appointed by Napoleon III. to publish the letters of his uncle has got as far as the twenty-third volume, which extends only to June, 1812. That this collection, for state reasons, is not complete, is a matter of course; yet it already embraces nearly 19,000 pieces, while the imperial and war-department archives are known to contain 60,000. Heinrich Kurz has undertaken, for Germany, to follow in the steps of the commission, and to cull from this enormous correspondence whatever would interest the general reader, within reasonable limits. One volume has already been published by the Bibliographical Institute of Hildburgshausen ("Ausgewählte Correspondenz Napoleon's I."). It includes Bonaparte's reports on his military operations, on his diplomatic negotiations, etc., and ends with the Congress at Rastadt (Dec., 1797). A map of the campaign in Italy is added. The value of this condensed autographic history is so manifest that we have little doubt some English or American publisher will make Herr Kurz's abridgment available to us. But the translator ought to borrow (or purchase) the compiler's judgment only, and give us the English immediately from the French original.

—We find in a late number of the Weser-Zeitung—a paper to which we are oftener indebted for useful information than we can always suitably acknowledge—some valuable statistics concerning the growth and industries of Berlin. And first, the city had 547,000 inhabitants in 1861, and it began the present year with upwards of 702,000, a truly gigantic increase. Trade and manufactures have, however, kept pace with it, so that Berlin promises even in these respects to be the leading city of the kingdom. The cost of living has of course increased, and what it is in detail the following table will show for the three classes whose incomes are (1) 3-400 thalers, (2) 6—800 thalers, (3) 1,000–1,500 thalers. (The value of the thaler is about seventy-five cents.) Any given family will then spend for

| | I. | | II. | | III. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Food, | 62 | 95 | 55 | 90 | 50 | 85 |
| Clothing, | 16 | | 18 | | 18 | |
| Rent, | 12 | | 12 | | 12 | |
| Fuel and light, | 5 | | 5 | | 5 | |
| Education and religion, | 2 | 5 | 3½ | 10 | 5½ | 15 |
| Public security, | 1 | | 2 | | 3 | |
| Health, | 1 | | 2 | | 3 | |
| Ease and recreation, | 1 | | 2½ | | 3½ | |
| Per cent., | 100 | | 100 | | 100 | |

These figures are borrowed from Dr. Engel, and in remarking on the constant ratio, for all three classes, of the rent, it is stated that the percentage for this item is probably too low and is constantly tending to become higher. Of the North Germans it is said that they will sacrifice eating to decent living, while the South German and the Austrian German give the preference to eating. The wages of trades-people and mechanics, which we have not space to copy in full, seem astonishingly low; bakers, to cite the first instance, get from one to two and a half thalers a week, and in order to earn three, must work nineteen hours a day, including all the night. The highest wages of all are 13 thalers, earned by some machinists. Returning to rent once more, it is observed that the lower the income, the higher the ratio of the rent, as follows:

| THALERS. | PER CENT. |
|---|---|
| 1,000– 1,500, | 27.54–23.44 |
| 1,600– 2,000, | 22.65–20.56 |
| 2,000– 2,500, | 20.18–18.87 |
| 2,600– 3,000, | 18.50–17.40 |
| 3,100– 3,500, | 17.15–16.25 |
| 3,600– 4,000, | 16.05–15.12 |
| 25,000–55,000, | 5.70– 3.50 |
| 60,000 and upwards, | 3.00– 2.28 |

For the classes below these there are no data. A similar law holds as to food. Lodging rents were worth in Berlin collectively in 1867 about 19 millions of thalers, on which basis the total income of the citizens would be estimated at about 90 millions; but it is undoubtedly higher.

—"German Art and German Politics" (Deutsche Kunst und Deutsche Politik) is the title of a work by Richard Wagner, whose latest opera, "The Master-singers of Nuremberg," is meeting with so much success in its first representations at Munich. The book is published at Leipzig by

J. J. Weber. It discusses the decline and possible recovery of the German theatre, and urges the displacement of the pernicious influences of French civilization by the German spirit which was newly awakened in the last century by Lessing and Winckelmann, and made illustrious by Goethe and Schiller, by Mozart and Beethoven. The suppression of this spirit was attempted by Napoleon with little success, as a conqueror, but was effected by the German governments themselves, subsequent to his fall, by the fashion which they set of encouraging Italian music and the demoralizing drama of the French in the court theatres. To the same, or rather to the present, authorities Wagner looks for the inauguration of reform, and the conclusion of his work indicates on which one of the German states he relies as a leader. Prussia, he says, has, in obedience to Frederic the Great's prescription, made the German vocation to consist in the pursuit of pure utility. It remains for Bavaria to furnish the model German state, organized on the principle that above all utilitarianism there is an ideal.

RECENT BOOKS ON EARLY ENGLISH.*

STUDENTS of the early English language and literature owe a good deal to each of the authors whose names stand below, and may expect to owe them a good deal more. Dr. Stratmann, close upon the appearance of the last seventh of his dictionary—which has but just made its way to America—has published an edition of that remarkable specimen of Saxon English, of equal value to poetry and philology, the "Owl and the Nightingale."

Eduard Mätzner is the author of a scientific English grammar, very elaborate and of high excellence. As for Mr. Morris, his activity has for some years kept spectators in perpetual and increasing astonishment. He has especially devoted himself to the difficult subject of the dialects of the Old English, and has edited, for the Philological Society or the English Text Society, half a dozen works of the first consequence, all hitherto either unknown or inaccessible, and as many more are in the press or in his desk. All this he has done while filling the post of a national schoolmaster, a sort of place from which we in America have seen little come but elementary arithmetics, common-school geographies, and grammars which disgust advanced scholars not less than they do the unhappy children who are compelled by school committees to study them.

Mr. Morris's "Specimens of Early English" forms one of the already favorably known series of works put forth by the University of Oxford in the interest of improved education. The book is perhaps beyond the present range of our high schools; but the want of something like it has been long felt in those of our colleges where an attempt has been made to study the English language. In Yale and Harvard, for instance, the elements of Anglo-Saxon have been taught for many years; but when the Saxon reading-book was finished, classes have been obliged to jump three hundred years of the subject and come down to Chaucer. The gap could be filled only by books not commonly found even in our libraries, some of them bulky and expensive, some exceedingly expensive and exceedingly rare. To speak more exactly, it could not be filled at all, since several most important works till lately existed only in manuscript, and several others are still in that state. Mr. Morris and the directors of the Clarendon Press have now furnished us a book as handy and as pretty as possible, which all but bridges the chasm. The Semi-Saxon period remains unprovided for, the "Specimens" beginning with the year 1250; but this deficiency is partly supplied by Thorpe's "Analecta Anglo-Saxonica," which gives a few extracts from Layamon and the least bit of the "Ormulum." The "Analecta" has this year been reprinted, and had a dozen or twenty pages of Orm been added, that book, with Vernon's or Thorpe's edition of Rask's grammar, would afford a very sufficient introduction to the study of Early English. And here it may as well be said that no satisfactory study of English can be made except in the historical order. Without some acquaintance with Saxon grammar the reader of these "Specimens" will frequently be puzzled, and always be slavishly dependent on the editor; whereas with a knowledge of the original forms, such as can be acquired in a fortnight, and such a stock of words as could be got by reading Thorpe's little book, he would be prepared to surmount many difficulties without any help, and to perceive many more, of which he would otherwise have absolutely no conception.

Mr. Morris has prefixed to his "Selections" an introduction, containing a few useful remarks on the principal dialects of Early English, the northern, midland, and southern, and the outlines of Early English grammar. The grammatical outlines, which are based on the southern dialect (with notices of the more important divergences of the others), are to be received with some caution. We are not ourselves in a position to assert that these outlines do not represent, in a general way, the facts of the grammar of the southern English; but the subject is very difficult, and requires an investigation both patient and wary, which, indeed, Mr. Morris may have made, and which we certainly have not made. Be this only said here—that it is antecedently improbable that the grammar from 1200 to 1400 can be faithfully and profitably exhibited in so brief a synopsis, and that any one may see at a glance that the account given by Mr. Morris of the language of Chaucer, in his "Selections from Chaucer" (published in the same Clarendon Series), differs in many points from the grammar of the "Specimens."

The selections are made with judgment and are very entertaining reading. The notes are on the whole very good, and so is the glossary, though both would be better if less brief. For the editing, so far as concerns literary or historical introductions to the various pieces and the rectification of the texts, there is next to none. Sometimes the texts are printed off from books without attention to punctuation, and in this way the reader is exposed to falling into many a pit. This comes from too much haste, to which cause, without admitting any excuse, we may also attribute the continual acceptance of impossible readings without a word for or against. Now and then, but not often, haste leads to a false gloss, as where y-primisined, p. 126 (from primsigner, præsignare, to make the sign of the cross before or over anything), is explained "dressed, covered." We must, moreover, express an opinion that pieces of Latin original like the metrical English Psalter ought not to be put forward as representing any stage of English, unless they are accompanied by the Latin texts, which they translate with amazing servility.

The "Altenglische Sprachproben," we are both sorry and glad to say, so much as we have of it, is a much better piece of work than Morris's "Specimens." It is also on a large scale. We have only the first half of the reading book as yet, containing verse only. It goes further back than the English book (to Layamon), and comes a little further down. If the second part of the first volume is to be as large as the part we have, the German book will contain twice as much text as the English. Then the editing is simply admirable. The introductions to the selections (by Karl Goldbeck) leave nothing to be desired, neither do the notes, which are copious, learned, and altogether masterly, and show a thorough familiarity with English both old and new. The criticism of the text is properly attended to, and is conducted with due caution but without superstition. There is to be a glossary (in which part Goldbeck is to help), which is not to be limited to the words contained in the selections, but to cover the whole field of Old English, and to take cognizance both of the etymology and of the historical development of the meanings of words.

The editor of the "Sprachproben" expresses a modest hope that English scholars "will pardon a stranger who, disclaiming all title to share their merits, ventures to take part in their labors." This gives us an awkward feeling, but we shall perhaps get used by-and-by to being beaten by Germans in our own line.

Stratmann's dictionary is a conscientious and able work, and cannot well be dispensed with in studying the other two books. The author had insufficient materials, which accounts for many omissions, though it does not explain the neglect of words of the Latin stock. It is a handsome book, and no press sends out handsomer books now than the German. But the author will allow us to regret that he does not set more value on the ordinary typographical expedients; that he has not facilitated the finding of words by printing his vocabulary in full-faced type, after the fashion of that beautiful volume, Burguy's "Glossaire de la Langue d'Œil;" and that he shows some of the indifference to paragraphs and capitals which is so inconvenient in the books of Jacob Grimm of glorious memory.

MR. CRACROFT'S ESSAYS.*

THIS book very well illustrates the strength and pretty well illustrates the weakness of the contemporary newspaper littérateur, or literary journalist, whose journal is of a high class. Read the well-written essay with which the second volume opens, "The Jews of Western Europe," and it is at once made plain that the writer is producing work intended, or at any rate destined, to serve only some momentary purpose. Furthermore, one suspects that he is not so familiar with his subject as to be capable

* "Specimens of Early English, selected from the chief English authors, A.D. 1250—1400, with Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. By R. Morris, Esq." Oxford, 1867. Clarendon Press Series.

"Altenglische Sprachproben, nebst einem Wörterbuche, unter Mitwirkung von Karl Goldbeck, herausgegeben von Eduard Mätzner. Erster Band: Sprachproben. Erste Abtheilung: Poesie." Berlin, 1867. [For sale by L. W. Schmidt, New York.]

"A Dictionary of the Old English Language. Compiled from Writings of the XIIIth, XIVth, and XVth Centuries. By Francis Henry Stratmann." Krefeld, 1864-1867.

* "Essays, Political and Miscellaneous. By Bernard Cracroft, M.A., Trin. Coll. Camb." 2 vols. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

of producing anything in relation to it that shall have any claim to authority or permanence. It is the journalist turning out historical papers, for the preparation of which he has not fitted himself, who talks about Jews brought back from Babylonia to Jerusalem "by Esdras in the time of Cyrus." It most certainly is not the careful historical student who talks so. The Esdras or Ezra whom Mr. Cracroft means was not contemporary with Cyrus; the event referred to took place fully fifty years after the death of Cyrus. In the same way fault is to be found with the author when he tells us of "1,500,000 men—an American army"—as having been lost "in the war against Titus." Where, we wonder, are we to get our due allowance of wounded for all these "dead"? and where in all Palestine are we to look, when "the war against Titus" is over, for one adult Jew? A million and a half of men must have been the entire adult male population of Judea at that time. Somehow or other, too, Mr. Cracroft gets his million and a half of dead men all into the city of Jerusalem. And where, let us ask, would one find the "Cosri" of any Judah Levy? There is the "Cosri," or "Khusari," of Judah Hallevi Ha-Levi (The Levite), which is the book meant by Mr. Cracroft, and, as regards the general description of its contents, accurately enough described by him. From the same source, or one equally untrustworthy, Mr. Cracroft must have got his information that Doctor Jost's great work—"the fullest account, by a modern Jew, both of the modern and ancient history of his nation," "eloquently written, and conceived with considerable historical and political vigor of thought"—is the work entitled "Geschichte des Judenthums und seiner Sekten." The description is well enough, but it applies to another work; that work of Doctor Jost's by reason of which he merits the encomium above quoted, the one which has the undoubted right to be called his "great" work, is not the "Geschichte des Judenthums," but the "Geschichte der Israeliten" (9 vols., 1820–28, and 3 vols., 1846–47). Literary work similar to this as respects accuracy grows more and more common in current literature, the most usual exhibition of it being made in the periodical press. As the periodical press is rapidly supplanting the mere book press, and daily more and more exclusively supplies the literature for the reading public taken by and large, it is of importance that something should be done to hold writers for magazines and newspapers to a sense of their obligation to pretend to no knowledge which is not theirs, and to write not too hastily, true though it is that they write for hasty readers, for the subjects over-boldly taken up are often handled with a carelessness not in consonance with the character of the truly industrious and conscientious worker in literature. This, as we began by saying, happens in the case of men so clever as we know Mr. Cracroft to be, and so honest and honorable as we easily presume him to be, despite the fact that his work is disfigured by the fault which vitiates the whole class of work to which it belongs.

But we have had so much decided pleasure from the reading of these two volumes that we would far rather discharge the duty of praising than the other duty imposed upon us. The essays contained in them are of three general kinds—political articles, in all of which the author appears as a Gladstonian Liberal, and from which a very good view of the state of English parties may be got; secondly, literary criticisms, sometimes very brief, and never long; thirdly, essays, mostly from the Saturday Review, of the kind called "social articles," because minor moralizing is done in them. Some idea of the range of the essays may be got from these titles: "Conington's Æneid," "Tyndall on Sound," "Hiawatha translated into Latin," "Dreamthorp," "Ovid as a Possible Satirist," "Madame de Sévigné," "The Reform Session," "Cruelty," "Landladies and Laundresses," "County Balls," "Englishmen's Arguments."

We do not know that we should set the essays of one of the three classes above-mentioned higher than those of the other two in point of merit. The literary execution is the same throughout. The author's style is of the unaffected, unelaborate sort common in the best English papers. It is a style as different as possible in effect from the Macaulayism of the Times, for instance, and indeed from any deliberately made style whatsoever, whether good or bad; as a general thing, it is most like the unconscious talk of a well-educated man who is tolerably indifferent to the literary graces, so he speaks his mind. And no matter what may be the topic treated of, the pleasure Mr. Cracroft gives the reader will almost invariably be the same in kind and pretty nearly the same in degree; so, at any rate, we find ourselves believing of him after finishing his book, or when we come upon him in the Spectator or the Saturday Review. He is a subtle and acute analyzer of persons and things into their ultimate elements; "insight" is his most marked characteristic as a critic whether of books or manners, and certainly that quality or that combination of qualities that goes by the now almost slang name of insight he has in a very high degree. It has him sometimes, instead of he it, and there are several amusing displays in the volume before us of the over-refining in which he sometimes indulges himself, letting his subtlety of discrimination, his ingenuity in the division of hairs, run away with his judgment, and wanton uncorrected by his imagination or sympathies, and apparently not always kept very tight in hand by his love of truth-seeking. "Man and Bee" illustrates this. We will cite an example of its work when well employed. "The Worldly Wisdom of Bacon" is the theme suggested to him by a new edition of the "Essays," and the problem he sets himself to study is the contrast between the elevation of Bacon's speculative genius and the meanness of his spirit as made manifest in much of his practice and of his writing:

"What we feel very strongly," says Mr. Cracroft, by way of solving this question, "is that until we can place ourselves in the peculiar focus of his own familiar position, and of the personal relations of the great family of statesmen who then lived round the English throne, occupied by an able, crafty, and conceited—a vacillating and dangerous woman, whose word could and did decide the fate of any one or more of them, we cannot rightly judge the exact standard of Bacon's worldly wisdom."

And this remark he makes in development of the same idea:

"At no time probably in English history was the individual personality of the leading men, in contradistinction to the operation of representative class action, so highly developed—statesmen, orators, poets, historians, courtiers, soldiers, and sailors, the very queens, unfolded their separate powers, and acted upon one another with an individuality, an eagerness, an intensity of feeling, which it is almost impossible to contemplate without astonishment. Hence the absorbing interest, the passionate attention of such men as Bacon to details of court influence, which at this distance seem mean, petty, and trivial, but which at the time were, no doubt, felt to be vitally connected with the great interests of the day. Hence, too, perhaps, the heat and turgescence of the Elizabethan style."

With the following application of his principle he closes the case—having done some very good essay writing of the weekly-paper sort—that is to say, worked out nothing very fully, but given in brief space many suggestions of real value:

"So again, although in his 'Essays' it may be impossible to recover in all cases the trace of personal influences on his language and speculation, this personal element is sometimes very observable, as, for instance, in the essay on 'Beauty.' It is true this essay, Mr. Wright tells us, was first published in 1612; but the tone of it is so hampered, and contrasts so strangely with the gaudy and luminous discursiveness of the other essays, that we can hardly resist the feeling that he wrote it in the lifetime of Elizabeth, long before it was published, with her dread before his eyes, equally afraid of writing and of not writing upon the subject, and equally concerned what to say and what to leave unsaid. For instance, he begins most of his other essays with the direct mention of the thing he is about to discuss. His essay on 'Truth' begins, 'What is Truth?' on 'Death,' 'Men fear Death,' and so on; but when he comes to talk of 'Beauty,' he starts on the safer theme of Vertue, or, as we should say, Merit. 'Vertue,' he begins, with Machiavellian caution, 'is like a rich stone, best plane set.' Scowl not, Elizabeth, and fear not, James, most meritorious but plainest fool in Christendom! For Elizabeth, surely, 'vertue is best in a body that is comely, though not of delicate features' (!) And that hath rather 'Dignity of Presence than Beauty . . . of Aspect.' Elizabeth conceived she had both. And be of good comfort, James, for 'neither is it almost seene that very beautifull persons are otherwise of great vertue.' Again, 'in beauty, that of favour (feature) is more than that of colour, and that of decent and gracious motion more than that of favour.' James flattered himself that his motions were very decent and gracious, and, in fact, that he moved right royally. How different is the trimming tone of this essay from the hard, cold, analytic brutal dissection of deformity: 'Deformed persons are commonly even with Nature. For as Nature hath done ill by them, so do they by Nature; being for the most part void of natural affection. And so they have their revenge of Nature.' The essay proceeds with masterly precision and acumen, and we recommend our readers to compare the two for their own edification."

Of the application of this same quality to matters of literature take this example, rather long but well worth reading. He declines to believe Ovid a merely licentious poet:

"If any one supposes that Ovid, a man of the most cultivated and versatile apprehension, the most perfect master of a delicately perfected tongue—that is to say, a man of such exquisite susceptibility that he was more than almost all his contemporaries alive to every breath of human emotion treasured up in a highly artificial language,—that such a man, living in a state of society so civilized that all its thoughts are still in the direct line of our own, could write gravely that Venus had given him as a tutor to her little boy, at a time when Venus was believed in, as a deity, quite as much, to say the least, as the Virgin Mary now is in France or Italy, and yet not see the fun and irony of what he wrote; to suppose, in other words, that he was only heaping up mere conventional imagery, like an Eton boy, is to be dead to the very first conditions of living authorship. Will any one believe that a man like Ovid would think it worth his while to say gravely of the youth Cupid—

'Ætas mollis et apta regi'

—in other words, that Ovid was a Roman Martin Tupper? It may, of course, be quite impossible to recover the exact shade of irony which these and similar lines suggested to Roman readers. We can only reason from analogy, and, judging from our own contemporary experience, arrive at the moral certainty that the irony, whatever it is, is there. What can be more in the very style of ironical exhortation than the lines?

'Nec tibi vitetur, quæ, priscis sparsa tabellis,
Porticus auctoris Livia nomen habet:
Quaque parare necem miseris patruelibus ausæ
Belides, et stricto stat ferus ense pater.
Nec te prætereat Veneri ploratus Adonis
Cultaque Judæo septima sacra Syro,' etc.

"These lines are in the very spirit of one of Mr. Thackeray's ironical admonitions, perfectly pleasant, paternal, and grave, blinking nothing, without a shrug, without a wink, perfectly good-humored, but in substance all the more vitriolic. 'Be sure,' he says, '[in your amatory pursuits] not to neglect the picture gallery. It bears the name of Livia. Livia founded it. There you will see the Danaïds conspiring the death of their wretched cousins' (admirable subject to inspire amatory pursuits!) 'and their barbarous father holding in his hand a naked sword. Nor don't forget the festival of Adonis wept by Venus, nor the Sabbath of the Jews. Don't be too particular and turn up your nose at the temple of the heifer of Memphis. . . . Well (as Mr. Thackeray would have said), she only makes of others what Jupiter made of her,' etc., etc. To suppose that Ovid wrote all this as an Etonian strings nonsense verses together without further meaning, would be a supposition extremely befitting the ordinary run of commentators. No man with the least insight into the literature of his own time would think it even possible. In our time the Latin tongue is dead, with all its allusions and associations as a living language. But in Ovid's time it vibrated all over like our own. But we have no space to pursue the subject beyond the suggestion."

Of course in the discovery and marking of fine distinctions the author is obliged to use a style often different in diction from ordinary talk, and, so far, what we have said of his manner is to be qualified; but this leaves it still very possible to say absolutely what we have said of his general manner.

We have spared ourselves the labor of speaking long in his praise by letting his book speak for itself; but we will close by heartily recommending it to the attention of our readers. It seems to us the least ephemeral of the many similar works that we have recently seen. We have in mind particularly the literary judgments, or literary suggestions, with which it abounds. As for the political matter, much of that is of course of only temporary interest, though again much of it is valuable as being historical information in regard to a troubled time in English politics. And leaving aside the author's scholarship, the display of acumen exercised—exercised as it is here on interesting subjects—ought alone to secure for Mr. Cracroft a good and large American audience. Messrs. Lippincott's proof-reader, we feel compelled to say—or somebody's proof-reader; we have not seen the English edition, of which this may be an unchanged part, made abroad with Lippincott's imprint,—somebody's proof-reader, we say, ought to be dealt with severely.

---

Handbuch der vergleichenden Statistik. Für den allgemeinen praktischen Bedarf. (Hand-book of Comparative Statistics for General Practical Use.) Von G. Fr. Kolb. Fifth edition. (Leipzig: Arthur Felix. New York: L. W. Schmidt.)—Herr Kolb is already well known, both in his own country and in England, as an able essayist upon finance and politico-economical subjects. The value of the present work is best shown by the fact that it has run through five editions since its first appearance in 1856. It contains full and admirably arranged tables upon everything relating to finance, government, trade, education, etc., throughout the globe. Germany receives, of course, the largest share of attention, but the reader will find that Great Britain, France, and the United States are treated with great fidelity and fulness; indeed, with a thoroughness which it would be vain to look for in any other treatise of the same size. The Germany treated of is the new Germany—the creation of the military events of 1866. Part V., entitled "General Surveys," with its inter-European and Asiatic comparisons, its historical résumés and mixed notices, is replete with interesting information. The highest praise that can be paid to any statistical work is to ascribe to it accuracy, completeness, and perspicacity of arrangement. The work before us is deserving of such praise. To those who are conversant with German it will prove a perfect vade mecum in writing upon general topics which involve accuracy in the statement of facts and figures. We can only hope that it will soon be rendered available to the non-German public through the instrumentality of a translation. American statistics, we may also observe in conclusion, are given by the author with many qualifications, which, we suppose, are only too well founded. The science of figures has not yet got much beyond its infancy in this country, and we may well feel some sympathy with the foreign statistician who endeavors to reduce order out of the chaos of Federal and State censuses, and to keep pace with a country where towns grow up over night, as it were, and whose railroads are constructed at railroad speed.

Lilliput Levee. Poems of Childhood, Child-fancy, and Child-like Moods. (New York: Wynkoop & Sherwood. 1868.)—The pretty little poem called "Polly" appeared first, with its illustration by Millais, in Once a Week, some eight years ago.

"Brown eyes,
Straight nose;
Dirt pies,
Rumpled clothes;"

it begins, introducing the little girl to us with pleasant abruptness; and, after a dozen stanzas, it thus bids farewell to her:

"Bedgown white,
Kiss Dolly;
Good night!
That 's Polly.

"Fast asleep,
As you see;
Heaven keep
My girl for me."

And it is the best poem, by far, in the little book which contains it now, "Lilliput Levee," a collection published in London a year or more ago, and recently republished here. Not that it is the best poem for children. The book does not seem to us very well adapted to children's wants or fancies. It would be hard to interest them in any of these verses except "Topsy-Turvy World" and two or three other bits of pure nonsense with a jingle, and now and then a laugh, in them. The rest of it is rather for grown people to trifle with than for ungrown people to enjoy. In the course of it, however, several good stories are told by the clever author. "The Whispering Boy and his Wonderful Toy" is a pleasant fancy; and the well-known tale of the Apostle Peter and the cherries is given in fairly good verse. "Stalky Jack" is really funny, and "Prince Philibert" has good lines and pretty turns of thought. But with all the fondness one may have for children's books, the few pages of interest in this one would not save it when weeding-day comes. To cut out "Polly" and "Stalky Jack," and put them in a scrap-book, is, we believe, what we should advise.

The little square book of Poems Written for a Child by Two Friends (New York: Geo. Routledge & Sons) is very much more to our taste, though still far from the ideal children's book. As children get to be seven years old and to read pretty well, this book will do to give them, with others, and contains much that can be read to them profitably even before that age, if read with explanations. "Little Pat and the Parson" is good, and the petition to the butterfly perhaps better; and there are many of the poems which we have read with a certain pleasure, which, however, children would hardly care for. They lack directness and plain meaning, that is, in their subject-matter and in the sequence of thought, for the style is generally simple. "Old Donald," for instance, is the making of a pleasant poem enough, but its indirect and roundabout course of thought wearies one, and would necessarily drive young folks away. So "The Wives of Brixham" and "Little Pat and the Parson" are tales which ought to be delightful to little people of seven or eight, but they are not well put together, at least for that audience. On the whole, the "Poems Written for a Child" is a pretty good book to get and try; here and there a poem of it may well be found to please a child. But the "Lilliput Levee" is not for children.

---

Burns's Poetical Works Complete. With a Life of the Author. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1868.)—The Appletons have given us in this edition a "Burns" exactly uniform with the "Scott" of which we spoke a week or two ago. There are six hundred and twelve good-looking, large-print pages, containing the complete poetical works, good, bad, and indifferent, from "Tam O'Shanter" and "Willie Brewed a Peck o' Maut," and "Bonnie Leslie," down to the country-side epigrams and the things in Shenstone's English. Besides all this, there is an abridgment of Doctor Currie's life of the poet and several very full indexes, which make it easy to refer to the particular piece wanted. The glossary is scattered along at the foot of the pages, a plan of arranging it which involves repetitions, for which, however, the average reader will not be unthankful. Let us say that some of the "Miscellaneous Pieces lately Collected" would have been all the better for a fuller dictionary. The edition is absolutely unexpurgated, and this we think a mistake. We admit that it is a valid distinction which is drawn between clean dirt and dirty dirt, and that Burns's dirtiness is not of the worse kind. Still, he wrote things that nobody is any the better for reading. This fifty-cent edition will go everywhere, and be read by people of all ages. It is of no consequence that such readers should have given them the materials for making such a study of Burns as to know just what he was, where strong and where weak; they could not and would not use the materials to any purpose. But that they should not be corrupted morally is of vast consequence. To be sure, in the case of Burns, the bane is accompanied by the antidote; we get the love for nature, the hearty fun, the indignation at various forms of meanness, the stout-heartedness, the charity, the beauty offered us for contemplation. But all this we might have had, and had unalloyed, if the publishers had so chosen, and we are compelled to express a wish that they had.

The Story of a Round Loaf. Thirty-two Engravings on Wood from Designs from E. Froment. (London: Seely, Jackson & Halliday.)—A charming little book for children, which one goes through, even when "showing the pictures" to a child, in a quarter of an hour, but which will bear re-reading and much looking at. It is a French book translated into English, but any child who is familiar with those crusty loaves in the shape of rings which the French bakers affect will enjoy it as if in his own vernacular. The story is told by pictures with a legend to each. It shows how little Louis walked from his father's bakehouse to Mr. Froment's dwelling with a round loaf, how the loaf bothered him, and how he tried all sorts of ways of carrying it, and what scrapes it got into, and how it got to its destination, but not uninjured. All this is very pleasant and very well told, and a nicer book to give to bright children of four we have not seen this year.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. | |
|---|---|---|
| Bibliothèque Nationale, swd | (Paris) | $0 12 |
| Condorcet, Vie de Voltaire. | | |
| Fontenelle, Entretiens sur la Pluralité des Mondes. | | |
| Molière, Le Misanthrope, Les Femmes Savantes. | | |
| D'Alembert, Discours préliminaire de l'Encyclopédie. | | |
| Montesquieu, Considérations sur les causes de la Grandeur des Romains et de leur Décadence. | | |
| Burns (R.), Poetical Works, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 50 |
| Dickens (C.), Nicholas Nickleby, Martin Chuzzlewit, and American Notes, one vol. | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 1 75 |
| Knight (C.), Shilling Shakespeare, swd | (Geo. Routledge & Sons) | 0 50 |
| Marryatt (Capt.), Midshipman Easy, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 40 |
| Milton (J.), Poetical Works | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 1 50 |
| Mühlbach (L.), Goethe and Schiller, an historical Romance | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 2 00 |
| Norton (C. B.) and Valentine (W. J.), Report to the U. S. Government on the Munitions of War at the Paris Exposition | (Army & Navy Journal) | |
| Sarmiento (D. F.), Life in the Argentine Republic | (Hurd & Houghton) | 2 00 |
| Scott (Sir W.), The Monastery, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 25 |
| Heart of Mid Lothian, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 25 |

IMPORTANT AND VALUABLE WORKS

JUST RECEIVED BY

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY

(Between Bleecker and Bond Streets).

Humphreys (H. Noel).—A History of the Art of Printing, from its invention to its widespread development in the middle of the sixteenth century. Preceded by a short account of the origin of the alphabet. With 105 fac-simile illustrations, produced in photo-lithography from the early originals. One vol. folio, extra cloth, $31 60.

Wright (Thomas).—Caricature History of the Georges; or, Annals of the House of Hanover. Compiled from the Squibs, Broadsides, Window Pictures, Lampoons, and Political Caricatures of the time. 1 thick vol. small 8vo, with nearly 400 humorous engravings, cloth, $3 75.

Tyrwhitt (Rev. R.)—Hand-book of Pictorial Art. With a chapter on Perspective, by A. MACDONALD. 1 vol. 8vo, engravings, half morocco, $9.

Guillemin (A.)—The Heavens: An illustrated Hand-book of Popular Astronomy. Edited by S. N. LOCKYER. 1 very handsome vol. 8vo, full of fine engravings, extra cloth, $10 50.

Cox (G. W.)—Tales of Ancient Greece. 1 thick vol. 16mo, cloth, $3 25; or in full calf extra, $6.

Percy (Bishop).—Reliques of Ancient English Poetry. New and only complete edition, published from the original manuscripts by the Early English Text Society. Edited by J. W. HALES and F. J. FURNIVALL. With introductions and notes, and a life of the author. 3 handsome vols. large 8vo, half plain morocco, uncut (only a few for sale), $21; or in Roxburghe style, half morocco, gilt tops, elegant, $31 50.

Romanoff (H. C.)—Sketches of the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greco-Russian Church.—1 thick vol. crown 8vo, extra cloth, $3 75.

Scott (Sir Walter).—Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft. 1 vol. 18mo, with 6 engravings by Cruikshank, extra cloth, $2.

Smyth (C. Piazzi).—On the Antiquity of Intellectual Man, from a practical and astronomical point of view. 1 thick vol. crown 8vo, extra cloth, $4 50.

Macray (W. D.)—Annals of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, A. D. 1598 to A. D. 1867. With a preliminary notice of the earlier library founded in the fourteenth century. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $6.

Hamerton (P. G.)—Etching and Etchers. 1 handsome vol. royal 8vo, with numerous fine etchings by Rembrandt, Callot, etc., half morocco, novel style, red gilt edges, $15 75.

Hazlitt.—Memoirs of William Hazlitt, with portions of his Correspondence. By W. CAREW HAZLITT. 2 vols. small 8vo, portraits, cloth, price reduced from $10 50 to $6.

Early English Reprints, carefully edited by EDWARD CORBERT, with introductions and notes.

1. John Milton.—Areopagitica, 1644, 30 cents.
2. Bishop Latimer.—Sermon, The Ploughers, 1549, 30 cents.
3. Stephen Gosson.—The Schoole of Abuse, 1579, 30 cents.
4. Sir Philip Sidney.—An Apologie for Poetrie, 1595, 30 cents.
5. Edward Webbe.—His Wonderful Trauailles, 1590, 30 cents.
6. John Selden.—Table-Talk, 1689, 60 cents.

Stanley (Dean.)—Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey. 1 large vol. 8vo, cloth, $9.

Blackburn (H.)—Artists and Arabs; or, Sketching in Sunshine. With numerous illustrations. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $5 25.

Walcott (Rev. Dr.)—Sacred Archæology. A Popular Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Art and Institutions, from primitive to modern times. 1 large vol. 8vo, cloth, $9.

Quick (R. H.)—Essays on Educational Reformers. 1. Schools of the Jesuits. 2. Ascham, Montaigne, Ratich, Milton. 3. Comines. 4. Locke. 5. Rousseau's Emile. 6. Basedou and the Philanthropin. 7. Pestalozzi. 8. Jacotot. 9. Herbert Spencer. 10. Thoughts and suggestions about teaching children. 11. Some remarks about moral and religious education. 12. Appendix. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth, $3 75.

Robinson (W.)—Gleanings from French Gardens; Comprising an account of such features of French Horticulture as are most worthy of adoption. 1 vol. 12mo, extra cloth, $3.

Blake (W., the Artist — Poetcial Sketches. Now first reprinted from the original edition of 1783. 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $1 75.

——Songs of Innocence and Experience, with other Poems. 1 vol. 16mo, cloth, $2.

Key (T. H.)—Philological Essays. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth, $5 25.

Ousely (Sir F. A.)—Treatise on Harmony. 1 vol. small 4to (Clarendon Press Series), cloth, $5.

Bain (A.)—Mental and Moral Science. A compendium of Psychology and Ethics. 1 very thick vol. 12mo, cloth, $5 25.

 These Books sent to any address upon receipt of the price, and ten per cent. in addition.

SCRIBNER, WELFORD & CO.,

654 BROADWAY.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY. Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction. Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,

678 Broadway, New York.

FLORENCE MARRYAT'S NOVELS.

Favorites with every one.

LORING, Publisher,

BOSTON.

THE LITERARY WONDER OF THE AGE!

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK,

Have now ready

The Cheapest and Most Beautiful One-volume Edition ever published of

SHAKESPEARE'S

COMPLETE WORKS.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

It is printed in a new diamond type, cast expressly for the purpose, upon a rich toned paper, and in the very best style of typography. It is edited by Mr. CHARLES KNIGHT, and possesses the advantage of all the research made by that ripe Shakespearian scholar in his recently completed and beautiful new edition of "Knight's Pictorial Shakspere."

This edition can also be had neatly bound in green cloth, 80 cents; or handsomely bound in half Roxburghe, gilt top, $1, and will be mailed to any address—on receipt of the advertised price and 10 cents additional to defray postage—by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

Critical and Social Essays.

Reprinted from the Nation.

"Would do credit to some of the best of our own journals and magazines. They are lively without flippancy, quiet and moderate in tone, and deal with some of the peculiarities and absurdities of Yankee taste and habits in the best possible spirit; neither defending them nor speaking of them with unworthy self-abasement, but generally endeavoring to trace them to their origin in the social and economical condition of the people."—Saturday Review (London).

"They are generally sensible, well expressed, and, in short, such articles as may be read with pleasure and a fair amount of solid profit. . . . If they are not polished quite up to the Saturday Review pitch, they are, nevertheless, very good reading of the kind, and much in advance of anything that we have seen in other American papers."—Pall Mall Gazette (London).

"All are entertaining, clever, and well written; and some of them deserve the higher praise of being the condensed statement of vigorous thought upon questions of practical importance. . . . We trust that this is but the first of a series of similar volumes."—North American Review.

"All are good, and several are of quite unique merit."—Atlantic Monthly.

"Of the whole twenty-five, there is, perhaps, none which does not contribute something to the reader's information, give him a new idea, or wake up an old one."—Boston Commonwealth.

"They are thoughtful, carefully written, fine in style, and wholly free from partisan or personal prejudice."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 12mo, $1 50.

Copies sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,

451 Broome Street, N. Y.

JUST ISSUED:

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY.

From Rolla to Edward the Second.

By the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." With original index to chapter. Vignette title. Beautifully printed on toned paper and elegantly bound. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 75.

THE VIRGINIANS:

A Tale of Last Century. Vol. I. By W. M. THACKERAY. With 23 illustrations on steel, and 53 on wood by the author. Being Vol. IX. of the New Standard Edition of Thackeray's Works. Extra green cloth, $3 50; extra claret cloth, gilt top, $3 75.

PAUL CLIFFORD.

A Novel. By Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, Bart.

The Globe Edition.

One vol. 16mo, with frontispiece, tinted paper; fine green cloth, $1 50.

A SYSTEM OF MEDICINE.

Edited by J. RUSSELL REYNOLDS, M.D., F.R.C.P., Professor of Medicine in University College, London.

With contributions by the most eminent practitioners in England. New and cheaper edition. Vol. I. Containing general diseases. 1,000 8vo pages, extra cloth, $5. Vol. II., containing local diseases, 1,000 8vo pages, extra cloth, $5.

THE SCIENCE AND PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

By WILLIAM AITKEN, M.D., Edinburgh.

Fifth edition. Enlarged and carefully revised. With a steel plate, a map, and 130 wood-cuts; two thick 8vo vols., 2,166 pages, cloth, $12; sheep, $14.

George Fox, The Friends, and the Early Baptists.

By WILLIAM TALLACK.

With portrait. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

NOW READY:

The First Number of the New California Magazine,

THE OVERLAND MONTHLY.

Subscription price, $4 per year. Single numbers, 35 cents each.

The Trade supplied by the American News Company, 121 Nassau Street.

Subscriptions received by the publishers,

A. ROMAN & CO.,

27 Howard Street, New York.

AMERICAN

MUSICAL CLASS BOOK,

Designed for Female Colleges, Institutes, Seminaries, and Normal and High Schools. Containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises and Solfeggios, and a valuable Collection of Duets, Trios, and Concerted Pieces.

By T. BISSELL. Price 75 cents.

Among the numerous works of the kind this cannot fail of a prominence, since its peculiar features are such as will commend it at once to the patronage of those for whom it is chiefly intended. Principals of Educational Institutions, Music Teachers, and others interested in books of this class will find it advantageous to examine this volume.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers,
277 Washington Street, Boston.

CHAS. H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

TEACHERS

Interested in History, Mythology, Anglo-Saxon, Early English, Hebrew, French, German, Italian, and Spanish are invited to acquaint us with their specialties and send for our catalogue before selecting text-books for the approaching season. Our principal publications in French, German, and Saxon are in use at YALE, HARVARD, WASHINGTON COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, and other leading institutions.

LEOPOLDT & HOLT,

451 Broome Street, New York.

NEW BOOKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED

BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON:

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in common use. By JOHN BARTLETT. FIFTH EDITION, revised. 16mo, vellum cloth, $3.

This edition has been so much enlarged and improved as to be substantially a new book. Fifty per cent. additional matter has been added, and the index alone now contains a hundred and sixty pages closely printed in double column. The Nation says: "We consider it very honorable to the author, as well as creditable to our literature, that he did not thus abandon the public, for the sake of ease and profit, but has persistently sought to improve his collection by fresh researches, in which he has obtained the aid of many scholars, until now in a fifth edition, wholly new and of unrivalled typographical beauty, he may be said to have fairly acquitted himself of further exertion."

THE MODERN REPRESENTATIONS OF THE LIFE OF JESUS. Third American Edition. Four Discourses delivered before the Evangelical Union at Hanover, Germany, by Dr. GERHARD UHLHORN, First Preacher to the Court. Translated from the Third German Edition, by CHARLES E. GRINNELL. 16mo, cloth, $1.

This little work, containing four popular essays of an orthodox divine, translated by a Unitarian clergyman, has met an unexpected welcome from the secular press throughout the country, and from religious papers of all denominations—Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Unitarians, and Universalists, alike. The Round Table remarks in regard to the book:

"It would be difficult to conceive of four sermons which should put in a clearer and stronger light the position of the Church as she stands at the present day, assailed by the great modern rationalists."

THE SPIRIT OF SEVENTY-SIX; or, The Coming Woman. A Prophetic Drama. Fifth edition. 16mo, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1; cloth, gilt, $1 75.

No satire of recent years has won such general favor as this clever jeu d'esprit. Originally produced in private theatricals near Boston, it was published in the present form at the solicitation of those who had witnessed its performance, and at once obtained a wide circulation. It is a telling and good-natured hit at the Woman's Rights movement, depicting the probable state of affairs in 1876, if the female element shall be introduced into politics. "The Spirit of Seventy-six" is an excellent book for summer and vacation reading.

 These books sent by mail, pre-paid, on receipt of the advertised price.

The great success of "Old Mamselle's Secret," has turned the attention of the reading community towards German fiction.

LUCY; or, MARRIED FROM PIQUE,

From the German of E. JUNKER, is a gem every one will enjoy. Price 30 cents.

LORING, Publisher,

BOSTON.

SCHOOL-SPEAKER.

The Advertiser wishes to publish, the coming season, a SCHOOL-SPEAKER adapted to the GRADE of GRAMMAR SCHOOLS, also one for Small Children, and desires to arrange with some Gentleman to compile and arrange one or both books.

Address, until August 20, 1868,

B. B. R., Publisher,
Box 2166, Boston, Mass.

MR. FRANCIS'S BOOKSTORE

Has Removed from Broadway to

ASTOR PLACE,

UNDER THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

An extensive stock of New and Old Books for sale at reasonable prices. Priced Catalogues issued from time to time will be forwarded free to any address.

REMOVAL.

NEW YORK, May 1, 1868.

ALLEN EBBS,

IMPORTER OF

FINE ENGLISH AND FOREIGN BOOKS,

Has removed from 183 Broadway to

75 CHAMBERS STREET,

One door west of Broadway.

A. E. has lately received from London a most elegant collection of fine Books.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

REPUBLICAN

CAMPAIGN ENVELOPES FOR 1868.

Unique, Handsome, Significant, True, Ornamental, Useful, and Historical.

ON THE FRONT—The names of the distinguished candidates, with the latest heart sentiment of each. ON THE REVERSE—A Complete Synopsis of the Republican Platform.

The Political campaign of 1868 is destined to be the most memorable of any since the foundation of the Republic. There can be no more expressive souvenir of the Republican aspect of it than these envelopes.

Every Citizen should have a few, at least, to keep for posterity. Copyright secured. Republicans will, of course, use and circulate them extensively as possible.

100 sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.
400 " " " " " " 3.
1,000 " " " " " " 5.
5,000 sent by express, at $4 per 1,000.
10,000 or more, sent by express, at $3 50 per 1,000.

WM. P. LYON & SON,

Envelope Manufacturers,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

CULBERT & CO.,

24 MAIDEN LANE, NEW YORK.

POCKET BOOKS,
TRAVELLING BAGS,
DRESSING CASES,
CARD CASES,
RUSSIA LEATHER GOODS.
Writing Desks a Specialty.

One Ounce of Gold

Will be given for every ounce of adulteration found in "B. T. BABBITT'S LION COFFEE." This Coffee is roasted ground, and sealed hermetically under letters patent from the United States Government. All the "Aroma" is saved, and the Coffee presents a rich, glossy appearance. Every family should use it, as it is fifteen to twenty per cent. stronger than any other pure "Coffee." One can in every twenty contains a ONE DOLLAR GREENBACK. For sale everywhere. If your grocer does not keep this Coffee, and will not get it for you, send your orders direct to the factory.

B. T. BABBITT,

64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 72, and 74 Washington Street, N. Y

NEW PATENT PIANOS.

RAVEN & BACON

(Established 1829),

Warerooms 644 & 646 Broadway, N. Y.

MANUFACTURERS OF

PIANO-FORTES, WITH THEIR PATENT COMBINATION SOUNDING-BOARDS.

Patented August 14, 1866.

This invention, introduced exclusively into our Pianos, is of the greatest advantage to the tone of the instrument, as it affects the sounding-board, the very soul of the Piano, and produces thereby a pure liquid tone greatly superior in quality and power to that of the ordinary Piano. The sounding-board, released from its connection with the piano-case, and resting upon under sounding-boards, is relieved from the rigidity caused by such connection, and its vibratory quality increased.

Our Pianos are first-class in every respect, and purchasers will have not only our own guarantee as to their quality, but also the guarantee of the reputation of the instrument, obtained from the experience of our patrons who have used them for a generation. All lovers of this eminently household instrument, as well as parties proposing to purchase new Pianos, are invited to call and examine our assortment.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 163. THURSDAY, AUGUST 13, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 121
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
"The Letter of the Law"..... 124
The House of Representatives and the Republican Party ..... 125
The Transformation of Austria ..... 126
French Canada..... 128
France ..... 129
CORRESPONDENCE:
President Woolsey's Reconstruction Policy..... 130
The Spirit of the Contract.—Gold Speculators..... 131
NOTES:
Literary ..... 131
Helps's Spanish Conquest..... 133
A Sister's Story ..... 134
Bishop's Explanations of the Law ... . 135
Several Guide-Books ..... 136
Books of the Week ..... 137

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.
The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.
GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.
ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

NOTHING new affecting the campaign has come to pass during the week. The present indications make it seem probable that Mr. Evarts is exercising a restraining influence on the President, and that he will do nothing impeachable, and perhaps talk less than heretofore. The Southern "war-horses" are supplying much of the fiery material of the canvass, and will probably continue to do so. The immense success of the La Crosse Democrat is forcing the other Democratic papers into lower depths of slander and obscenity than have probably been ever reached in any previous contest; and perhaps nothing marks more strongly the difference in the material of which the two parties are composed than the almost complete abstinence of the Republican press from this sort of thing. No new campaign stories about the candidates worthy of mention have appeared since our last issue. Blair, however, gets gradually drunker and drunker, and according to the last anecdote had to be stretched out full length in a railroad car, we suppose to prevent his legs from falling off. Grant has committed no new crime, but his cotton and other frauds increase in magnitude and variety, and the depravity of his father and brother are gradually being revealed. As described now day by day in the World, he is probably the vilest man on earth; but when one compares these accounts of him with articles published about him in the World before he became a Republican candidate, one becomes exceedingly puzzled about human nature; but it is not human nature as displayed in Grant.

One or two of the Southern legislatures have passed, and more of them probably will pass, a bill authorizing the legislature to cast the vote of the State next November, and thus preventing the people from voting in the Presidential election. Under the national Constitution the legislatures undoubtedly have the right to do this; the traditional way of choosing electors in several of the States was formerly just the way that the Alabama legislature has decided on adopting. The only question to be considered is, whether or not it is expedient for them to do so at this particular time. It is a question much more easily asked than answered. In Alabama, as elsewhere in the South, the Federal troops are few and the polling-places are many; the men disfranchised by the Fourteenth Amendment—officially declared to be the law of the land—openly avow their determination to vote at all risks; Wade Hampton, who is supposed to be not merely a Southern gentleman, but peculiarly such, the Southernmost of gentlemen, urges other high-toned gentlemen to refuse employment and encouragement to every negro that votes the Radical ticket; in various parts of the South there are organized bodies of men which meet for drill and boast of their intention of carrying the election; there is a well-founded belief—any day it may be, let us hope that soon it will be, contradicted—that the President considers every Southern State government a nullity, and his moral support is given to the party of disorder, which lets Toombs speak for it in the words following:

"The grinning skeletons which have been set up in our midst as legislators shall be ousted by Frank Blair, whom the Democratic party has expressly appointed for that purpose. All these things shall be swept from the bosom of the country."

In view of this state of affairs, putting great trust in the soothing effect which the election of Grant and the certainty of a firm Republican administration will have on the minds of these old Confederate war-horses, we do not know that the Alabama and other legislatures have not a perfect justification for their action in regard to the electoral vote. The case may be different in Arkansas, where we imagine the Republican party might be beaten in a fairly conducted election; we should say nothing in favor of Arkansas following Alabama's example; but, on the whole, we think we should have nothing adverse to say if her example were to be followed by North and South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, and Louisiana.

The political outlook in this last mentioned State is, to say the least of it, such that we hope Secretary Schofield may give careful examination to the facts before he decides one way or another in regard to Governor Warmoth's application for troops—if indeed it is true that the matter has been referred to the War Department. Perhaps, since Mr. Reverdy Johnson made his report on General Butler's administration, a perfectly impartial statement touching at all on political affairs has never come out of New Orleans—and Mr. Johnson's report never got into print. The whole State of Louisiana, with all its bitterly hostile elements—even in the old days of the Slidell Democracy party hatred was nowhere bitterer than in Louisiana—is gathered into New Orleans, a city with the most cultivated and high-spirited of colored communities, and, on the other hand, with as large a force of desperadoes, moral and political, among its white inhabitants as any American city is cursed with. It is next to impossible to be there and not take sides and become an ardent partisan. Great allowances, therefore, for party wrath and wildness are to be made in the case of all stories from that quarter. But then, too, danger is always to be apprehended in such a place, and just now the nomination of Seymour and Blair seems to have set the "Conservatives" half crazy, and the Democratic audacity in threatening has given the Republicans perhaps more alarm than was necessary. On Friday, in the State Senate, Mr. Jewell wanted a committee of three appointed to wait on Governor Warmoth and ascertain the time and place of the one hundred and fifty murders which, he says, have been committed within the last six weeks. The New Orleans Republican has since replied with a list of the people killed as alleged. The governor's letter to the President asserts that the State is covered with lodges of a secret society the members of which drill in secret and openly. It is by means of these organizations, it is charged, that Louisiana is to be carried by the Democrats. The counter charge is made that in the Republican headquarters, near the Capitol, there are stored away more than 5,500 stand of arms, and that, according to the threats of the Radicals themselves, three thousand armed men could be assembled in Dryades Street in half an hour. There is some fire under all this smoke, and one thing seems certain—that it would be unsafe to withdraw the United States troops from New Orleans for some three or four months yet.

Mr. Seymour has "defined his position" in a letter addressed to the committee who waited on him with the information that he was the nominee. It is a month since this information was given him, but he has been waiting in hopes that Congress would do some good in the last part of the session—which, however, it did not. On the contrary, it admitted six Southern States to the Union in the persons of representatives who, if not protected by armed force, would be driven out of the country, etc. The letter is necessarily long, being meant for many different sorts of people. For the eight-hour man there is this: "The hours of toil of our laborers are lengthened by the cost of living made by the direct and indirect exactions of the Government." For the man who does not like Frank Blair's revolutionary pronunciamento, there is this: "The election of a Democratic Executive and a majority of Democratic members to the House of Representatives would not give to that party organization the power to make sudden or violent changes," etc., etc. For the man who thinks Blair's letter the true platform, there is this: "No man can rightfully enter on the duties of the Presidential office unless he is not only willing to carry out the wishes of the people expressed in a constitutional way, but is also prepared to stand up for the rights of minorities." This is for the Northern soldier: "Having given nearly sixteen thousand commissions to the officers of that army, I know their views and wishes. They demand the Union for which they fought." And this is for the men who demand the Confederacy for which they fought: "In words instinct with meaning they (John A. McClernand's convention) called on the Government to stop in its policy of hate, discord, and dissension, and in terms of fervid eloquence they demanded the restoration of the rights and liberties of the American people." But there is no end to it. The letter is Governor Seymour at full length and with all his faces. It is this sort of thing the Democrats call statesmanship. But the majority of the people have not been calling it statesmanship since the good old days of Birdofredum Sawin. We must wait for another letter, we presume, before we find out how it is that the unrepudiating Seymour can stand on a repudiating platform (he holds not a single bond, his secretary informs an anxious enquirer, and has never held one), and whether or not he would let South Carolina enact black codes next winter. Neither slavery nor repudiation appears in this crafty document.

General Butler has been giving an account of his stewardship to his constituents at Gloucester, in a long address. He reviewed the work of the majority in Congress, claiming the credit for it of having displayed great magnanimity towards the South, of having considerably reduced the public burdens, of having defeated all "jobbing schemes of public plunder, or for the depletion of the Treasury," and of having stopped the contraction of the currency until the rich harvests promised by a "kind Providence" give us a balance of exports over imports. His views on the financial question and the impeachment business were, however, the most important, owing to his personal position on these matters. The financial question he shirked very dexterously, treating the claims of the bondholders as something on which honest Republicans might fairly differ, and which "still remains open and substantially undiscussed," and on which the party ought not now to be divided. We hope there will be some one found in his district with the courage to follow him up, however, and not let him wriggle out in this way. It is not a small matter. It will be the great question of the next Congress, and his constituents ought to know that the decision involves the public credit and national honor, and ought to find out what use General Butler is going to make of "his fine talents" with respect to it, before they vote for him. This attempt of his to treat it as a trifle is characteristic, but ought not to take anybody in, even amongst those who have the misfortune to stand before the Christian world as his constituents. About impeachment he was fierce and scriptural. He reiterated his charges against the seven senators, and compared them to the seven devils who were cast out of Mary Magdalene, and charged them with having been corrupted by either "money or lust of power." There is one reason why he should not be re-elected to Congress which we commend to the attention of his constituents, and that is, the consideration of the fact that he would make an admirable city missionary, while he makes only an ordinary politician. His respect for "the Sabbath," which he recently testified in the House; his familiarity with Scripture, which he is gradually revealing; his sympathy with the poor, and his tact in dealing with nice moral distinctions; his indifference to riches, and strong reliance on moral suasion, would make him an excellent laborer in the darker and more neglected districts of our great cities. For this work we respectfully claim him, and if the men of Gloucester are made of the right stuff, they will let us have him.

Some time in the middle of July it was telegraphed from Baltimore, we believe, that General Butler had been arrested while on his way North from Washington, and that two suits had been brought against him—one for false imprisonment by "contumacious Woolley," and one for extortion by certain "Kimberley Brothers." A day or two afterwards, Butler published a letter, which appeared in the Tribune, under the heading, "General Butler Strikes Back." In fact, it could hardly be mistaken for any other man's way of striking his opponent. He had not been arrested, he said, and "both suits were brought by John Surratt's counsel." Both suits were not brought by Surratt's counsel. However, one was; and the fact was stated by the general in order that when the Boston Journal took the letter down into the Fifth Massachusetts District the legal voters might say, "See how this ardent patriot finds a natural persecutor in the man who defends the scoundrel who aided Booth to murder Mr. Lincoln." R. T. Merrick is the attorney in question, and he has replied to the letter with a "card," which shows that Mr. Butler is the man who wanted very much to defend the rebel who was concerned with Booth in the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. He twice got word to Miss Annie Surratt that he wished to defend her brother, and was not employed only because Messrs. Bradley and Merrick refused to be associated with him.

The London Spectator calls our recent article entitled the "Financial Prospect" "striking but exaggerated," but it is difficult to see where the "exaggeration" lies. We showed by figures, which have not been upset, that our supply of beef, mutton, and milk, and other agricultural products, is less than it was four or five years ago, though the population has increased in the interval. From this we drew the conclusion that we were, in spite of our gain in machinery and manufactures, poorer than we have been, inasmuch as machinery and manufactures profit us little as long as our supplies of food are scanty, and labor consequently dear. We have never got any answer that would bear examination. The Springfield Republican, which has of late taken to being funny in a sad way, met it by a joke about "the milk in the cocoa-nut," by which we were reasonably amused but not convinced, and one or two other papers have indulged in a naked contradiction. The lesson of it all is, that there is such a thing as stimulating one branch of industry too much, and that it will not do to drag too much of the labor of the country into mills and mines, leaving the fields untilled and the barns empty. What we want now more than aught else, to set manufacturing industry a-going, is cheap bread and meat, and this can only be had by hard work in the open air.

The working-men of Boston, of whom we spoke last week, were too hasty in their prediction that the Government would fail utterly in getting eight hours' work under the new law for less than ten hours wages. At Davenport, Iowa, General Rodman is in charge of the United States Arsenal. Having some doubts as to the proper construction of the law, he telegraphed to General Schofield, who told him that he might keep in Government employ a laborer who had been working ten hours for $1 80 who would work on, for the eight hours that the law ordains, for $1 44. So, also, in the case of all mechanics—20 per cent. was to be struck from the wages of each. The men were allowed some hours for consultation, and finally about one-fourth of them accepted General Rodman's terms. As the ruling will doubtless be accepted by the officers in charge of all the yards and arsenals in the country, it begins to look very much as if the Senate, House, and President had conferred a rather barren gift on the working-man when they made Mr. Banks's bill into a law with such flourishing of trumpets. In this city, the long strike of the bricklayers was not wholly an eight-hour movement, though it was in great part that. Unless all signs fail, it is nearly at an end, and is ending unfavorably for the men. Out of a hundred bricklaying firms, fifty-five get their work done by ten-hour men, ten are doing no work rather than employ eight-hour men, while thirty-five have been obliged to give the ten hours' wages for the eight hours' work. But as bricklayers are coming in from other cities, it is claimed by the masters that very soon there will be no eight-hour man employed in New York. Among the men, on the other hand, it is said by the masters, there are fifteen hundred hands out of employment, and of the other fifteen hundred many are working ten hours, and some have left the city, and, wherever they are, they are probably not working on the eight-hour system. Of the few co-operative jobs that grew out of this strike we hear little.

All efforts to get Mr. Adams to communicate "his views on public affairs" to his fellow-citizens have thus far failed. He resolutely declines to talk politics, and says he wishes to be quiet and attend to his private business, which has suffered during his absence. A few years ago this reticence would have roused darker suspicions about him than it is likely to do now, inasmuch as the right of every human being to fix the time or place in which he shall deliver himself in public, and to select the subject of his discourse, is much more generally recognized than it used to be. In fact, the compatibility of a dislike to making speeches, or of an inability to make them, with the possession of a clear head and a fair moral character, is acknowledged in a way it was not when the venerable Horace Binney refused to subscribe to the funds of one of the Yale College Societies, on the ground that in so doing he would be promoting what he considered the curse of the country—"the gift of the gab" amongst young men.

Mr. Motley has also been offered a public reception and has declined, and in declining bore testimony to the unvarying courtesy, kindness, and good feeling which the Austrian Government had manifested towards him and the Union during the war.

The public mind in England is occupied mainly, since the close of the "heated term," with the canvass preparatory to the coming election, and enough is believed to be known already of the temper of the new constituencies to warrant the belief that the new Parliament will not differ so much from the present one as many of the Radicals had hoped. A curious indication of the state of the public temper has been afforded by the defeat of Mr. Beales, the well-known "war-horse" of the Reform League, in the Radical caucus in that most Radical of boroughs, Birmingham. He got only two votes, and the nomination has been given to Mr. Muntz, who used to be radical, but who without any change on his part is now a moderate. The peers, probably to make amends for their recent inertness in the House of Lords, are taking a somewhat more active part in the canvass, by way of "influence" and intimidation, than they have done for some years. Lord Bute, a young man at college, has undertaken to decide who shall be returned by the great borough of Cardiff which lies on his estate, and the Duke of Portland has written a most comical letter of admonition to his tenantry, showing an extremely defective education and mental powers of the lowest order. The outcry against hereditary peers, and the talk of life peerages, in the meantime grow stronger, and such incidents as these of course stimulate them.

The Irish Church question of course now lies over for decision in the next Parliament. Lord Redesdale, one of the law lords, has been making a funny speech about it, in which he lays it down that, in dealing with it, the peers are to be guided simply by "the will of God" and not mind what the public thinks—reserving to themselves, of course, the privilege of deciding what "the will of God" is—just as the luminaries of the Boston Commonwealth abuse senators for not adhering to the "truth," truth being, of course, whatever the brethren of the Commonwealth themselves produce as such. There is, as we said some weeks ago, a striking resemblance between the mental processes of all raging enthusiasts, whether tories or radicals. They all secrete the elixir of life on short notice, and carry it in their coat-tail pockets, and cherish a half conviction that they can have the use of the thunder and lightning on a pinch for the confusion of the wicked. But their day in politics is over. The world demands that they shall grind out their opinions in the regular way under inspection, and after a rigid examination of their persons, for the detection of amulets, charms, "ponies," and clandestine revelations. The discussion of the Church question elsewhere has, as far as the friends of the Church are concerned, taken an almost purely personal turn, the arguments against its existence being met by impugning Mr. Gladstone's motives in assailing it.

In France the state of affairs continues highly critical. The Pays, a Government organ, whose utterances are all semi-official, has published what purports to be a highly inflammatory manifesto issued by a secret Democratic Committee, denouncing the Emperor in the strongest terms as a "sickly tyrant," and recommending his assassination. Some of the papers affect to believe it the work of the police, intended to justify repressive measures, but the balance of probabilities seems to be in favor of its genuineness. That the Bonapartists are somewhat troubled about the dynasty there seems little doubt. A modification in the mode of electing members of the Corps Législatif is talked of, which would be a virtual restriction of the suffrage, and would deprive the empire of what it has always put forward as one of the strongest proofs of its legitimacy. The next election is looked forward to with a good deal of anxiety, as it will create the legislature which will probably be sitting when the Prince Imperial comes of age, and some extraordinary "act of adhesion" to the dynasty will doubtless on this occasion be expected of it, and any sign of reluctance would be most disastrous.

The La Marmora interpellation has been a principal theme of the Italian press, and has excited no little attention in other parts of Europe, notably at Berlin. Gen. Menabrea parried it by pointing out some discrepancies between the French translation of the Prussian staff account of the campaign of 1866 and the original text, by which a part of the offence was occasioned, and by reciting some official disclaimers, on the part of Prussia, of any ill-feeling towards Italy for her conduct in the attack on Austria; and finally announced that the Italian staff was at work on a history of the campaign, in which all the information in the possession of the Government would be given. Gen. La Marmora withdrew his interpellation after a speech not lacking in dignity, which the Deputies listened to with great willingness and marked attention, though they subsequently sustained the President, Lanza, in ruling debate out of order. But even this did not wholly shut the gate upon scandal. To make good his grievance against Prussia, Gen. La Marmora read openly a despatch from Count d'Usedom, Prussian minister at Florence, dated June 17, 1866, setting forth, in a manner which the general was hardly wrong in considering de haut en bas, the duty assigned by Prussia to her ally; instructions which were partly preposterous—as for instance to outflank the Quadrilateral, or pass through it without reducing the fortresses, and to invade Austria with these in the rear, guarded by corps d'observation—and partly founded on the most mistaken calculations as to the disaffection of Hungary, and the probable assistance that country would lend to the overthrow of Austria. Worse still, perhaps, were insinuations of fear lest the Italians, if they should conquer to the Alps, would rest content with the acquisition of Venetia, and by their very success imperil the advantages of Prussian victories by releasing a large Austrian force from service in Italy. It was therefore insisted on that the goal of the allies should be Vienna, and to tempt the Italians so far, a wild scheme was introduced of landing Garibaldi on the Dalmatian coast and letting him recruit as he went along, shielding the flank of the main army, and furnishing supplies, till the Danube was reached. This is, if we are not mistaken, the first official document belonging to the agreement between Prussia and Italy that has ever been published; and La Marmora has incurred fresh censure for a disclosure as questionable in point of ministerial decency as of political expediency, regard being had to the probable irritation of Prussia.

The Œcumenical Council, which is summoned to meet at Rome next year, is furnishing European publicists with what will probably be, failing a European war, more interesting than any other topic 1869 will have to offer. What is most remarkable about the Pope's call is that he leaves out kings and all other laymen, a departure from the practice hitherto pursued in summoning councils, and which is taken to be an indication that the great object of this one is to make a final break between the Church and the State, and throw the former for its future support on Divine protection in a direct form exclusively. When the Pope receives, as he has just done, a tart reply to an allocution from the Prime Minister of Austria, and that minister a Protestant, it is not surprising that His Holiness should have ceased to put his trust in princes, and have determined to exclude them from the general assembly of the Church.

"THE LETTER OF THE LAW."

THE extent to which words help to confuse thought has rarely been better illustrated than in the history of the discussion now raging about the nature of the obligations of the Government to its creditors. The necessity under which it found itself in the early part of the war of levying a forced loan, by making its promissory notes a "legal tender," not unnaturally caused these notes to be spoken of as "money." They do now, and have for six years past, served the purposes of money, but real "money," in the generally accepted sense of the term, they are not. They are promises to pay money—promises which the Government every day violates by failing to pay—and they owe their value to the belief that some day it will pay; and in the meantime there is a heavy discount on them, as there is on all doubtful paper. But the mere habit of calling them "money," and using them as money for even five years, has caused a large number of people wholly to forget their real nature and origin, and to talk of them as "money" which may be used not as the Government and the public are now using them, as a temporary expedient, but in final settlement of the national obligations. The delusion is, especially when we consider the interval in time, in education, and experience which separates our day and generation from the French Revolution, much more surprising than the delusion which reigned amongst the French republicans about the celebrated assignats. Nobody in France was ever gulled into believing that the assignats were "money." It was distinctly perceived that they were promissory notes. The fallacy which prevailed about them lay in supposing that the Church lands were really pledged, in a practical manner, for their redemption. When it became plain, as it soon did, that the mortgage was not really foreclosable, and that the security was therefore worthless, the bubble burst. Nobody went about preaching that they were as good as gold, or, if anybody did, he met with an unpleasant illustration of the feebleness of his arguments whenever he offered them in payment for a cup of coffee.

The popular habit of talking of the acts of Congress authorizing the loans as "laws" is producing, if possible, effects still more mischievous. For the mere purpose of nomenclature, it is no doubt convenient to call them "laws;" but when they are called "laws" for the purpose of determining the moral obligations of the Government, when "the letter of the law" is spoken of as something by which honest men may safely abide, the evil worked by a loose use of words becomes fully apparent. A law is a command given by a superior to an inferior, and enforced by a sanction—that is, by the infliction of a penalty of some sort, in case the command is not obeyed. A command with no sanction attached is not, properly speaking, a law at all; it is the mere expression of a wish or desire. Now, the acts of Congress authorizing the various public loans have none of the characteristics of a law, and they are not laws, as regards the public. They may be considered laws as regards the Secretary of the Treasury, inasmuch as they direct him to offer bonds for sale on certain terms, and he would, of course, incur the penalty of dismissal in case of neglect or refusal. But as regards the public, they are simply invitations to lend money on certain conditions. They command nobody to do or refrain from doing anything whatever. They bind nobody. Congress might repeal them to-morrow; many members of Congress are constantly trying to have them altered or modified. There is no court in which the nation could be sued under them; no power on earth competent to inflict any penalty for the violation of them. They simply declare that the United States would like to borrow certain sums of money at certain rates of interest, and for certain fixed periods of time, and point out the persons to whom and the modes in which the money shall be paid in. Whatever was not clear in this invitation, the financial agents of the Government undertook to explain. They explained during four long years, through every means of publication known to American civilization, that when the Government in its proposal spoke of repayment it meant repayment in gold. The lenders had to be content with this explanation, because there was and is no court or tribunal of any kind competent to construe the proposal, or enforce any construction of it except what those who made it chose to give it. In other words, it rests with the people who asked for the money to say what the invitation to lenders meant; and in deciding what their obligations under it are they are to be guided not by legal rules of construction, but by the rules of morals in use in the forum of conscience, by the rules by which an honest man when he has in his distress borrowed secretly, and without giving security, governs his conduct when his friend asks him to refund. To call in the aid of a practitioner in the criminal courts to tell us, under such circumstances, where the path of duty lies, would be a confession which we do not care to characterize.

Moreover, the persons, of whatever party, who now call for payment in greenbacks, in defiance of the declarations of the Government agents, are not entitled to hearing, for the simple reason that their failure to speak sooner is presumptive evidence either of their stupidity or dishonesty. If they remained silent during the whole period of the contraction of the loans from inability to perceive the mischief which the declarations of the representatives of the Government were working, they must be too obtuse to make their opinion of the slightest value. If they remained silent wilfully, well knowing that the Government agents were raising expectations which they were not authorized to raise, and that the payment in coin was not intended by Congress, they simply connived at an odious fraud, and their present protests are simply proofs of their monstrous impudence. In fact, their appearance on the scene now, when the money has all been paid in and spent, to put a new interpretation on the contract, before the bonds are payable, is one of the most remarkable exhibitions within our knowledge of moral callousness on a great scale. It is hard to say whether their speaking now or their having previously held their peace is the more discreditable.

There is one other consideration with regard to "the letter of the law" which deserves more consideration than it has yet received. "The letter of the law" is, after all, letter only—so many words, covering so much paper. To make it of any value as a rule of conduct, it has to have an interpretation put on it; and, in fact, the only difference between "the letter" and "the spirit" of a law lies in the mode of interpretation. "The letter of the law" is, in other words, the law strictly construed; "the spirit of the law" is the law broadly construed; but construction you must have in both cases, and construction by some constituted authority. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the acts of Congress creating the loans are real laws, and that "the letter of the law" ought to govern the manner of repaying the loans, the question, What does "the letter of the law" prescribe? remains still undecided. And who is to decide it? There are two parties to the controversy about the terms of the loan—the borrowers and the lenders; and if the acts be laws, there ought to be an indifferent person or persons competent to interpret them. To say that when a creditor and debtor disagree as to the meaning of the law under which they have framed their contract, that one of them which happens to be the stronger may interpret the law to suit himself, and the other is bound by his decision, is simply preposterous; and yet this is precisely what the repudiators, both Republican and Democratic, do say. They proclaim loudly that the very party which made "the law" and borrowed the money under it has alone the right to decide what the law means, and that the creditor is bound to accept their ruling as final. Now, of two things one, as the French say—either the acts authorizing the loans are not "laws," but proposals to borrow money, to be interpreted in the forum of morals only, or they are laws, and the nature and extent of the rights and duties created by them are to be decided not by one of the parties in interest, but by a competent and impartial tribunal, guided in forming its judgment by the great principles of equity. The reference of such a question to a majority either of the House of Representatives or of American citizens at the polls would be, on the repudiators' own theory, a piece of unprecedented absurdity as well as of iniquity.

We have a letter of a correspondent lying before us, asking us to show that repudiation will not "pay" in a pecuniary sense, if we mean to make any impression on the Democrats; that our talk of honor and good faith is all very well, but it does not reach them. To which we reply, that the very strongest argument of this kind we could use is, from its very nature, worthless as far as all Copperheads and secessionists are concerned—the argument that repudiation, in any shape, will leave the Government powerless, or greatly hamper it, if it should again be called on to defend its existence in the field. To say this to them is to put a musket in their hands to use against us. To talk to them of the enormous desolation that would be worked by repudiation, of the shock to the whole framework of society it would cause, is likely to be ineffective for the same reason. They do not particularly care about the framework of society, as we understand it. We have no means of computing the loss to the country that repudiation would cause. The actual sum of which holders of Government securities would find themselves suddenly deprived would represent only a very small portion of it. The shock it would give to industry, the dark cloud it would cast over the future, the fear it would inspire amongst capitalists, would produce an amount of damage the extent and duration of which neither we nor any other man can compute; and the effect of such a prodigious stroke of baseness on the morals of the rising generation would be something worse and more lasting, even from a commercial point of view, than the visible effect on business. We rely mainly, too, on appeals to the popular conscience, because this question is not to be decided by the Democrats, but by the majority of the American people; and whenever appeals of this sort cease to influence the bulk of American society, although the nation may remain tremendous by land, tremendous by sea, and flow with milk and honey, the form of government will change, and the forces which hold society together will change too. The government of the strong hand will be instituted for the government of reason, and the gens-d'arme will do the work of the newspaper. Whenever we believe that day has come, our occupation, and all others like it, will be gone; and, unless we are greatly mistaken, we shall know it, and stop talking. But with the graves of three hundred thousand men still fresh, and with cripples in every village—all sacrified to the popular devotion to an idea, to a remote imagined good—it is impossible not to feel that the arguments addressed to the popular sense of justice, the popular sense of honor, the popular appreciation of the value of distant results, are, after all, the arguments which tell on the greatest number. The immediate loss or gain to each individual taxpayer, in a country as rich and growing as this is, of the payment or repudiation of the national debt, is, after all, so small that the material side of the question looks strangely insignificant beside the moral one. What makes repudiation most dreadful, is the moral condition it would indicate; and when one sees the small wits of "the moral wing" of the Republican party exercised in sneering at the idea of a national conscience, and such people as General Butler offering himself again to the suffrages of a Massachusetts constituency with the air of a Christian martyr, one feels that the question, "Will it pay?" is, after all, not the greatest question of the day, but—Can this Government be conducted successfully on principles of unmitigated rascality?

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

We have received from a valued correspondent, to whom, both in the field and the forum, the Republican party owes much, a communication, which we are sorry we are unable to print owing to its length, in which he seeks to disengage the party from the grievous burden of responsibility imposed on it by the conduct of the majority in the House of Representatives during the late session of Congress. He says that wherever he goes he meets with "discontent" with their performances, which would doubtless affect the prospects of the party most unfavorably were the Democratic nominations and the Democratic platform not so very bad and were not the Republican nominations and platform so very good. In other words, he thinks "the record" of the party, instead of being a help, will, at the next election, prove a hindrance, and that it is the House of Representatives who are to blame for it, and that it is the duty of Republican newspapers to point this out, and thus clear the party skirts. He says that many well-meaning citizens who contemplate the works of the two parties think they "Must soon choose between encroachments upon the legislative privilege of debate, neglect to provide for the honest collection of the public revenues and for the economical administration thereof, a most dangerous intermeddling with the powers and duties of the judiciary, and a shameless attempt to thwart and change the due administration of justice and to bring improper means and influences to bear on those entrusted with it, so as to prevent one judgment and coerce another—that they must, we say, choose between these evils on the one side, and rum, rebellion, and repudiation on the other."

For this embarrassment our correspondent holds the House of Representatives responsible. "Whatever wrong," he says, "has been done by the party has been done in it or by it. There is not a single obnoxious act or measure which has not originated in it, or been so connected with it that it may be held responsible." In fact, the time of the Senate has been largely occupied during the whole session in frustrating foolish or iniquitous schemes concocted in the House. He then presents the following formidable indictment against the latter:

"We have seen a powerful majority denying the minority the poor right of being heard in debate. We have seen the most important statutes forced through without discussion, reflection, or consideration. With mu h blather about the groans of the taxpayer, we have seen these representatives of a party and nation covertly and meanly refuse to reform the civil service, though well knowing that its proper administration would save to the country at least $50,000,000 a year. We have seen them, too, after four years of such power as no other party in the House of Representatives ever held, still without a policy for the great subject of the public debt, or for any other subject reaching far into the future and demanding a settled, defined, and well-kept policy. Their divisions, delays, changes, and hesitancy upon all matters connected with the collection of the revenue, the sale of gold, and the payment of the public debt, have done more injury to every commercial and manufacturing interest of the country than all the rival interests of the world combined could have effected. Their conduct with regard to the whiskey fraud is nothing better than patronage of that horrible, demoralizing, corrupting robbery. Their settled want of a settled policy in all that relates to finance, little better than a partnership with the gold gamblers of Wall Street. If anything is urged upon the doubting voter on their behalf, of their patriotism, of their fidelity to the great interests of freedom, of the magnitude of the matters involved, he will undoubtedly reply that our representatives, nevertheless, have shown themselves to be incapables; that the country cannot wait for ever for these would-be statesmen to concoct remedies; that men who, with more than 'a working majority,' have done nothing, and actually do not yet know what they mean to do, are useless and worthless, and should be supplanted by men of less genius and more practical ability; that the revenue from whiskey and tobacco alone, with the savings from a properly administered civil service, might be made to amount to more than the present entire revenue of the Government; and that these gentlemen in the House have been for three years without a remedy for these abuses, and we must write them down as so many political imbeciles."

"These," he says truly, "are hard facts to deny, hard facts to admit, hard facts to ask the well-meaning citizen to wink at, swallow, or forget;" and he maintains that it is the duty of the press to point out unceasingly that in all these errors the majority in the House acted on their own responsibility, and had neither the support nor connivance of the party at large—witness the attempt to intimidate the Senate in the impeachment trial, which was got up and carried on almost exclusively by members of the House, the country looking on coldly or disapprovingly; witness, too, the disgraceful Cobb-Butler attempt to tax the bonds, in the teeth of the Chicago Platform and of the almost unanimously-expressed disgust of the Republican press.

To a great deal of this, with certain qualifications and exceptions, we can yield our hearty assent. We took the liberty, at the cost of being abused for what is rapidly becoming, in the eyes of some people, almost a crime—what many more call "presumption"—of treating certain principles of political economy and jurisprudence as well established, and applying them to the events of the day with perfect confidence—of pointing out, week by week during the session, the danger of the aberrations in which the House was indulging, such as its needless attacks on the Supreme Court and its incessant multiplication of reconstruction bills, its neglect of financial matters and its stupid indifference to the opinion of experts. But we think it would, nevertheless, be unfair to throw all the blame on it, as our correspondent does. Circumstances and its constituents must take part of it, for reasons which we shall give with all the greater confidence because, after they have been all stated and put in the strongest light, the claims of the Republican party on the vote of every honest man are, as we endeavored to show a fortnight ago, unimpeachable.

In the first place, the Republican majority has been too large. For this nobody is to blame. But with such a majority any body of men in any deliberative assembly in the world would lose their heads and abuse their power. There is something intoxicating about strength, whether it lie in brute force or in votes. Where the minority is so small as not to be worth conciliating, and the circumstances make party fidelity seem of the highest consequence to the state, freedom of debate is sure to suffer, forms to be prostituted, and reckless and precipitate action to be frequently indulged in.

In the second place, even where the doctrine that the legislator is simply the delegate and not the representative of his constituents is as firmly established as it is here, he must have something to guide him in the absence of positive information touching his constituents' will, and that something ought to be familiarity with and confidence in the great principles of political science and the teachings of history. He cannot learn, every time a bill is introduced or a motion made, what his constituency thinks about it. His constituency, in nine cases out of ten, does not know itself what it thinks. On great lines of policy it has made up its mind and expressed it; questions of detail and of means it leaves to legislative discretion and knowledge. We are only saying what every man of sense and intelligence in the country knows and acknowledges to be true, when we say that the majority of the members of the House are very slenderly furnished with the information or the habits of mind necessary for their work. We could put in six lines of the Nation, we are sure, the names of all the men in the House who are fairly equipped for the work of legislation or are worth listening to for five minutes on any subject. This is a hard saying; but the facts justify it. Now, these men do not go to Congress of their own accord. Caucuses select them, and constituencies vote for them.

In the third place, the difficulties they have in getting at public opinion on any given measure are very great. If important measures were fully debated, there would, of course, be time for the public to make up its mind about them, and express it through the press or through petitions. But under "the previous question," and the practice of showing vigor and "fidelity" by "putting things through" in haste, there is no time for the public either to think or speak. It usually hears of a measure and the vote upon it simultaneously. There is a prevalent belief, too, that "people at Washington" know a great deal more about public feeling than people elsewhere know; but this, as any person familiar with Washington will tell us, is a pure delusion. Members of Congress are most of the time in a state of heathen darkness as to what the country is thinking or feeling, and pursue all newly arrived and knowing men from the country districts with an insatiate thirst for information. Their private correspondence is of little use to them, as it generally comes either from their personal friends and admirers, who tell them they are doing splendidly and invite them to "go in and win," or from ardent blatherskites, for whom novel and violent measures have always a horrible fascination.

The press, one would expect in these days of railroads and telegraphy, ought to be able to keep them right by its criticisms. So it would, if it did its duty. But the papers of his own party are not unnaturally the only ones to whose comments a member pays much attention; and the party press has largely given up all attempt to discharge the principal duty of the press—the duty of criticism. The part it has assigned itself is that of a claque. It acts rigidly on the theory that Congressmen are all wise, and that whatever they propose must be "put through," and, consequently, supports all acts of the majority through thick and thin. There was, for instance, not one foolish bill introduced into the House of Representatives last winter which the New York Tribune did not praise to the skies, and declare absolutely necessary to the national salvation. They were one by one dropped, and are now forgotten, but not before they had in a greater or less degree injured the party reputation. But the claque, not in the least ashamed, goes on offering the public advice with the same amusing air of solemnity and sincerity as ever.

Another circumstance which has had an unfortunate influence on the House of Representatives is the inordinate importance which the condition of public affairs has caused the party to attach to universal suffrage. The establishment of universal suffrage became, after the war, not simply a leading feature in the reconstruction process, but a cardinal political doctrine with the more advanced members of the party. With this we have, of course, no fault to find; but the agitation about universal suffrage has had the not unusual effect of throwing a halo around it, and leading great numbers of people to think of it and talk of it as if it were a new means of salvation for all the nations of the earth, and as if to advocate it was a sure means of hastening the reign of righteousness—as if it were a perfect antidote against corruption, lawlessness, ignorance, vice, and all the moral and political ills which afflict humanity. The result has been that candidates for office have, of late, only had to be "sound" on this question to make all else in their character and attainments of little consequence. It is not very long since we read an article in a religious paper, treating the habitual drunkenness of Senator Yates, of Illinois, as a trifling matter, in consideration of the senator having recently delivered a speech against color discrimination in the distribution of the franchise. The qualification being an easy one, of course the country swarms with thoroughly worthless, loud-voiced advocates of "the rights of man," and of course plenty of them find their way into Congress.

Members of Congress being thus left in uncertainty as to the state of public opinion, receiving little or no assistance from the party press, and having but a slender store of principles of their own, and being compelled to vote hastily, not unnaturally follow the leadership of the bolder and more confident members of the House—men who know what they want, and are not particularly scrupulous about the means of attaining it. In a doubting and ill-informed assembly such men are always kings, and have their own way. This alone will account for the position enjoyed by Thaddeus Stevens during the reconstruction process, and the success of Butler in his attacks on the public credit and his "investigation" into the morals of the Senate. The proper counterpoise to such men are men like Messrs. Garfield and Schenck and Jenckes. Mr. Schenck ran wild for a while about impeachment, but we have forgiven him in consideration of his financial services. But a counterpoise they cannot be without a strong and steady support from the press and the public. Well-informed and honorable men, knowing the difficulties of the work of government and fearing the consequences of error, hasten slowly and doubt intelligently at every step. They are, consequently, no match for bold and ready demagogues, unless they have public opinion behind them, like, to use one of the impeachment similes, "a strong wind blowing aft."

THE TRANSFORMATION OF AUSTRIA.

The three great reform laws—on civil marriage, public instruction, and inter-denominational relations—lately passed by the Reichsrath of Vienna, their sanction by the Emperor Francis Joseph, the condemnatory allocution of Pius IX., the indirect reply to the allocution by the imperial chancellor, Von Beust, and the late anti-clerical demonstrations in various parts of the empire, have made patent to the world the radical change which has taken place in the attitude of Austria towards the See of Rome, and her relations to the tendencies of the age. The character and historical meaning of this extraordinary change we took occasion to elucidate at an earlier stage of its development. This is, however, only one side of the transformation of Austria, which, begun by popular movements in 1848, checked by the triumph of monarchical reaction in the following year, and hesitatingly resumed by the Government itself after the disastrous Italian campaign of 1859, was finally precipitated to a rapid consummation by the greater military disasters of 1866. The altered relations of the whole of the empire to its component parts—the various countries and nationalities—and the altered attitude of the latter towards the dynasty, as the upholder of the integrity of the empire, form perhaps the most striking and vital part of the metamorphosis.

A quarter of a century ago the Austrian Empire, as such, was the representative of no nationality whatever. In fact, the house of Hapsburg was the empire. That house, through many centuries of almost uninterrupted growth, had by inheritance and marriage—almost without conquest—agglomerated a large number of heterogeneous countries and provinces into a vast and complex body animated by no common spirit, by no common traditions of the past, and by no common aspirations for the future. Their only community consisted in the ruling dynasty. This dynasty being of German origin, and for centuries wearing the elective crown of the Germanic empire, had made many efforts to consolidate its hereditary possessions by Germanization and centralization, but without success. Its greatest effort in this direction, under the Emperor Joseph II., had not only completely failed, but in various provinces produced a lively national reaction, soon made powerful by the spirit of revolution which the example and the wars of France spread over Europe. To keep down this new centrifugal movement, which threatened the ultimate disruption of the empire, Metternich used an army of half a million men, composed of ignorant peasants of various races, a vast bureaucratic machinery, and the dissensions of the different nationalities among themselves. But, though at the same time playing the foremost part in Germany, which the Congress of Vienna had reconstructed as a confederation without an imperial head, Austria was no more a German than it was a Hungarian, a Slavic, or a Romanic power.

But not only did Austria represent no nationality, it was also the main check on the free development of some of the principal nationalities of Europe. Its mere existence was a negation of a united Germany, a united Italy, an independent Poland, a free Hungary or Bohemia. The two nationalities last named it had absorbed entire, and the preservation of its own power required the curtailment, at least, of their constitutional freedom. Its share in the partitions of Poland—Galicia—bound it to permanent complicity with Russia and Prussia in oppressing that unfortunate nation. From Italy it had torn Lombardy and Venetia, besides heavily pressing upon the rest with the weight of its bayonets and family connections. Still greater possessions and influence in Germany made the consolidation of that country on either a popular or a Prussian basis impossible. And as the general policy of Austria, as developed by Metternich and others, had long been reactionary in the highest degree, tending to the perpetuation of oppression in everything and everywhere, it cannot be wondered at that the political tendency of all patriotic and liberal minds in Austria became more and more hostile to the imperial rule, and subversive of the unity of the empire. The revolutionary storms of 1848 came near dissolving that unity and breaking the empire into fragments. The rivalries of the Slavic and non-Slavic nationalities, however, long fomented and now skilfully used, the victories of Radetzky in Italy, and the intervention of Czar Nicholas, saved the house of Hapsburg from ruin.

Between that period and to-day lies the eventful reign of Francis Joseph. At its beginning the history of these nineteen or twenty years is marked by such names as Novara, Világos, and Olmütz; at its middle are Magenta, Solferino, and Villafranca; at its close are Gastein, Königgrätz, and the coronation at Pesth. And, finally, we see Austria, after terrible catastrophes, reconstructed under promising auspices. But the whole structure of the monarchy and all its relations are changed. It has changed face. Its attitude and character are altered. The throne looks for its support to the attachment of the people; the nationalities, so long agitated by centrifugal tendencies, willingly unite to defend the integrity of the empire. The Transleithan Diet, assembled at Pesth, and representing Hungary and its dependencies—Transylvania, Croatia, Slavonia, etc.—and the Cisleithan Reichsrath of Vienna, representing all other provinces, act in harmony, under the guidance of two separate ministries. Conciliation has replaced coercion. The wranglings of the past, with slight exceptions, are being buried in oblivion. Austria has become almost a confederation composed of voluntary members.

The explanation of this extraordinary change is not to be sought exclusively in the final yielding of the dynasty to the demands of the people, and its more or less compulsory return to constitutional principles. Decisive facts were required and have co-operated to make all this possible. The principal of these are: the cession by Austria of its Italian possessions and the severance of its connections with Germany, after the catastrophe of Königgrätz; the terrible crushing of the Polish subjects of Russia, in consequence of the rising of 1863, and the more and more undisguised Panslavistic threats and plottings of that power. As long as the house of Hapsburg was strong enough and encouraged by its German resources and connections to attempt the Germanization of the whole empire, it was regarded by Hungarians, Poles, Italians, and Bohemians as their common and worst foe. As long as the maintenance of Austria's territorial limits and diplomatic standing abroad demanded the sacrifice of blood and treasure in defence of usurpations and tyranny against nations striving for unity and independence, there could be no real reconciliation, no lasting harmony between the dynasty and the educated and liberal portions of the people. As long as Galicia was the most degraded and oppressed of all Polish provinces, its inhabitants often longingly thought of a common servitude with their brethren under the Slavic sceptre of the Czar.

But all this is no longer so. Austria, shorn of all support abroad, has ceased to be a constant menace to its own nationalities. It must now lean on them exclusively. It demands no sacrifices for the defence of bastiles in Milan or Venice, or of antiquated prerogatives at Frankfort. Shattered and half-bankrupt, it can think as little of re-establishing the Germanic Bund as of reconquering the evacuated Italian quadrilateral. It will no more interfere against foreign Poles, as formerly in Cracow; for a rising of Poles against Russia or Prussia, without the aid of Austria itself, has ceased to be a possibility. Galicia, reorganized on a national basis to form a rampart against Russia, has become the last resort of Polish patriotism, the last sheet-anchor of Polish hope for regeneration. The Hungarians, who, since they learned in 1849 to dread the Russian power, have not ceased to observe its constant machinations among the Slavi on both sides of the Carpathians and on both banks of the Save, willingly sacrifice a small portion of their restored national autonomy in order to secure the existence and freedom of their race by the co-operation of the other half of the empire, the predominance of which they have no longer to fear. Their statesmen —their Francis Deák among the rest—have not forgotten that Hungary, early in the sixteenth century, in consequence of internal dissensions and decay, came near being trampled into servitude by the hosts of Solyman the Magnificent, and that it was with the aid of the House of Hapsburg, which they then called to the throne, that they finally rescued the land of their fathers from the yoke of the Moslems. And Russia is certainly no less threatening now to Hungary, if isolated, than the Ottoman power was before the battle of Mohács. The Cechic and German populations of Bohemia and Moravia have too much to fear, in case of a dissolution of the empire, from their mutual animosities and the intervention of Prussia and Russia respectively, not to be ready—the Cechs, at least, in their sober moments—for sacrifices to support the dynastic union which alone can avert those dangers. The purely or preponderatingly German provinces alone—Austria proper, Salzburg, Tyrol, Styria, etc.—would have least to lose, and perhaps most to gain, by the disruption of Austria; but it is just there that an old and sincere attachment to the ruling house, Catholic zeal, hatred of Prussia, and local interests—like that of the imperial capital, Vienna—most powerfully combine to make the mass of the people dread such a catastrophe.

In one word, since the union represented by the house of Hapsburg has ceased to be a terror to its own members, the advantages of its continuance—at least for a period sufficient to consolidate the strength of each and to mature it for national independence—and the perils connected with a sudden overthrow, have become apparent to all. And it is curious to observe that those nationalities of the empire—besides the now detached Italian populations—whose exertions to shake off the common bonds some twenty years ago were the most violent, would now be the last to rejoice at an accidental realization of their former aims. Were Francis Joseph voluntarily to lay down to-day his rule over Galicia and Hungary, the Poles, placed face to face with the Russian colossus without a natural barrier to shield them, would accept with despair the last hopeless struggle of their nationality, while their more fortunately situated neighbors on the right side of the Carpathians, the Magyars, would see, not without dismay, an untimely crisis precipitated upon them, compared with which the perils of 1848 would sink into insignificance. On the other hand, the Cechs and Croats, who did their best to save Austria twenty years ago, are now the last grumblers at its auspicious reconstruction. The explanation is easy: they dreamed of a Slavic Austria, fought for the realization of that dream, and now see it vanished.

With all this we do not mean to say that the liberal and almost entirely harmonious reconstruction of the Austrian, or, as it is now to be called, the Austro-Hungarian, Empire, under the lead of Beust, has smoothed away all the various difficulties that so recently beset its path. We are far from being so sanguine. The financial difficulty alone is tremendous. All we have endeavored to show is the radically altered condition of Austria's internal relations. Of the details we may in future speak more amply.

FRENCH CANADA.

I.

THE first question which presents itself to an observer on entering Canada is, Why do the Canadians look so fat and chubby compared to Americans? The climate differs but slightly, if at all, from that of Maine or Vermont, and the diet and mode of life, certainly of the town population, are essentially similar. Both people eat about the same quantities of meats and of farinaceous food, and take about the same amount of exercise. The American is certainly more harassed by politics, and is more seriously occupied with the consideration of man's origin and destiny, than the Canadian is; but that any considerable number of persons in any country can ever be so troubled by either of these things as to grow lean over them remains to be proved. It is true, the Canadians drink beer in much larger quantities than Americans. Two rows of bottles of pale ale, or even porter, are an ordinary phenomenon of a Canadian table d'hôte; but to say that ale and porter make Canadians fat only removes the difficulty one degree further back. Why do they drink ale and porter in their climate? Why does it not make them bilious and give them a headache? Why don't they take to whiskey and champagne, or confine themselves to coffee and ice-water? are questions which still remain to be answered.

If it were possible for men to grow fat and rosy in imitation of other people, we should say the Canadians were fat and rosy because the English were, so many other peculiarities in their life and manners are to be accounted for in this way. One has hardly set foot in the country when one is struck by the well-known colonial tendency to out-Herod Herod. They are considerably more English, in all things in which resemblance to the English is possible, than the English themselves. The old Tory of the year 1816 is now no longer found in the fauna of the United Kingdom. His habitat is in the colonies, and especially in Canada, though some stray individuals are to be found in Philadelphia and Baltimore. The animal has a very odd look on the banks of the St. Lawrence; but he thrives, and seems to be thoroughly acclimated, and is a very jolly, very hospitable, but somewhat illogical person, and, though sadly deficient in what the French call lumières, is reasonably good company. The English influence on Canadian externals—perhaps it would be correct to say the influence of the British garrisons—is curiously shown in the great care with which the men of the towns, young and old, dress, and the rigidity with which they preserve the English type of appearance. The shopmen even are fair copies of the military officers in all but a fanatical attachment to canvas shoes in hot weather—a device to which the military men do not seem as yet to have lent themselves, and the value of which, we confess, seemed to us doubtful.

Our observations on Canadian manners being made during a very short visit, we offer them, of course, with proper diffidence, and should not be at all surprised to hear that we had not penetrated the secret of Canadian society; but we came to the conclusion, among others, that in the well-to-do classes in Canada the English custom of late marriages has spread among the men. Anybody fresh from the United States is struck by the age of the Canadian beaux, as seen at watering-places and other places where what Beau Brummel called "well-dressed young people" congregate. The spectacle of men from thirty to forty dancing attendance on girls, flirting with them, ogling them, discussing them, and making the study of them one of the serious duties of life, is one with which we are familiar enough in England and France. In a new country like Canada it looks odd, particularly as, on this side of the border, men of that time of life have usually abandoned all care of their neckcloths and boots, are apt to have an interesting family of their own, to spend a portion of their nights in contention with babies, and to regard unmarried women in the light simply of actual or possible friends of their wives. Seeing an elderly Canadian gentleman, too, of about fifty-five, and tolerably corpulent, dressed, as to his legs, in "knickerbockers," and parading the pier of a watering-place with great satisfaction, we could not help figuring to ourselves with some amusement the effect of the appearance of Moses Taylor or George Law or A. A. Low at a "summer resort" in the United States in a similar costume.

The English respect for aristocracy, and English belief in it, not as the result of convention but as a natural product of human society, not only flourishes in Canada, but is shown in ways singularly English. One of the reasons which was offered us for staying at a hotel—a very good one, on the whole, let us add—was that the Prince of Wales had lodged there, and that the Governor-General and his suite were in the habit of doing the same thing. Now, we would willingly have exchanged our knowledge of this circumstance for a slop-tub in the bed-room—an article in which we found all the hotels we visited deficient, and the want of which occasioned us considerable embarrassment, whereas the selection of another house by the Prince of Wales and the Governor-General would at most have only caused us a momentary pang. So also, asking a young swell, one day whose acquaintance we made on board a boat, what kind of a hotel there was in a certain village, he said a relative of his had stayed there and liked it, and mentioned parenthetically that the relative in question was—to be discreet, we only say, occupied a high military position. The tone in which the information was given, and its perfect gratuitousness, for a moment called up a vision of Pall Mall.

Another illustration of the same thing, and we confess it seemed to us a sad one, is offered by the monument to Wolfe and Montcalm, at Quebec. The structure is, in the first place, inexpressibly shabby, though it stands on one of the noblest sites for such a purpose in the world, and is intended to commemorate one of the most moving episodes in the history of war. An obelisk which not only is not a monolith, but is built of rather small stones, is something which gods and men abhor, or ought to abhor, and this one is rendered doubly odious by the fact that the frosts of forty Canadian winters have made away with the mortar, and the pile looks as if it would tumble down the first windy night. One might overlook these things, however, if the inscriptions breathed real taste and sentiment, but they do not. The first one is fine, and touching for its simplicity:

MORTEM VIRTUS COMMUNEM,
FAMAM HISTORIA,
MONUMENTUM POSTERITAS,
DEDIT.

A word more than this anywhere, except the names of the two heroes, spoils all. Not only is there a word more, however, but a long inscription covering the whole of one face of the monument, and throwing the tribute to Wolfe and Montcalm completely into the shade, telling us how the poor piece of dilapidated masonry was the work of "Georgius Comes de Dalhousie, summarum rerum administrans," undertaken after it had been for many years neglected, and finished during the reign of "Georgius Quartus Britanniarum Rex." The impression left on the mind of the spectator by the monument is, in fact, that it was a far finer thing to build it than to die sword in hand on the Plains of Abraham, and that the "Comes de Dalhousie" had, on the whole, the advantage of Wolfe and Montcalm.

One cannot remain very long in Canada without having the idea very strongly presented ~~to one~~ that even a slight political connection between a colony and "the mother country" is a curse to the colony. As long as they are bound together, even by the light silken tie of allegiance, really healthy political and social life seems to be impossible for the latter. A people whose manners are not the natural result of its own character and culture, but a laborious copy of those of another people, differently situated and in a different stage of development, of course suffers much both morally and mentally, no matter what amount of political freedom it may enjoy. The loyalty of colonies seems almost always to have something morbid about it, as was well illustrated in the recent outburst of folly in Australia touching the attempt to assassinate the Duke of Edinburgh. It does not consist, as it does in England, of devotion to the country through the monarch. In most of the colonies there is in it a strong infusion of disgust with the colony, and eagerness to leave it and get back to the "old country," and this feeling is probably strongest in the most able and energetic of the inhabitants. A more unhappy state of things, as regards sound and healthy progress, can hardly be imagined. To have expatriation constantly present to the flower of the population as the final reward of success in life must, of course, partially paralyze any state. We saw in Canada, in the course of a single week, four reports in the newspapers of the lower Province of dinners given to successful traders on the occasion of their retirement from business and going to England to live. We were told, on enquiry, that it was now very general for men who had made fortunes in Canada to go to England to spend them. There are probably very few who are not haunted, as they find their means increasing, with dreams of a landed estate, a seat in Parliament, and a fair run for wife and daughters during the London season. We were a good deal entertained, too, by observing that at two of the dinners to which we have referred a display of prudent regard for the success of the business he had built up was made by the guest of the evening, in a strong compliment to the extraordinary business ability of the remaining members of the firm.

Lower Canada is not thriving. We suspect the same thing may be said of Upper Canada, but, perhaps, with less certainty. New countries do not thrive much without a steady and rapid increase in their supply of labor, and consequently a steady and rapid addition to the area of their cultivated soil. But Canada now receives no additions to her supply of labor. Immigration there is none, and such immigrants as are cheated into shipping for Quebec, go straight through to the United States, unmindful of the advantages of the British Constitution and of the awful future which awaits democracy. Not only this, but a stream of native Canadians begins to flow over the border. The movement has even reached the French, to whom the United States has been hitherto a land as far off as when the Indians came down from the St. Lawrence to harry the New England heretics. We were assured everywhere that there was a pretty general outward drift of young men from the villages of the lower St. Lawrence. When at Saguenay we heard that the fame of the prairies had reached the north bank too, and the day of our arrival two families had started from that remote and isolated community, weary of a long struggle with the Canadian winter, and anxious for a better chance for their children than the parents had had. Facts of this sort suggest strongly the enquiry what the effect of increasing facility of locomotion and increased diffusion of information is likely to be on all inhabited northern regions? How long will habit and local attachment resist the influence of stories of bright skies, short winters, and teeming soil elsewhere? What, in other words, will be the condition of Canada, Norway, and northern New England one hundred years hence?

But Lower Canada has for the tourist from the United States what is of far more importance to him, quâ tourist, than progress or prosperity—the charm of complete difference of life, manners, ideas, history, and traditions, and of complete indifference to the subjects which most occupy and perplex him at home. The tumult of the campaign not only does not pass the "Province line," but all its sounds die out almost as soon as you have crossed over. A French Canadian watches the whole process of a Presidential election as one watches the movements of cawing crows on a warm summer day, and understands it just as little, and is as little troubled about stocks, bonds, railroads, mines, and the other "big things" of American progress as if he lived in Paraguay, instead of within a few hours of Maine and Vermont. You have, in fact, hardly reached Montreal when Grant's cotton thefts, Seymour's insanity, Blair's bar bills, Colfax's brutal treatment of the one-armed soldier, and "H. G.'s" negotiations with the Niagara Falls rebels fade into remoteness and insignificance. Consequently, an American who is tired out, as Americans are apt to be in summer, and who wants real rest and real refreshment—change not simply of scene, for, in a country in which society is so homogeneous as in this, change of scene merely does little for jaded nerves, but change of people, of currents of thought, and of manners and of social problems—nay, even a clergyman with a sore throat, can hardly do better than spend a month or two on the lower St. Lawrence, provided always he is armed with a respectable knowledge of French. This is necessary to enable him to see more than the outside of things, and to save him from some foolish inferences. The want of it makes Thoreau's account of his Canadian trip as nearly worthless as anything emanating from so close an observer could well be. Going to Europe is, of course, better; but then a month of a short vacation has, in going to Europe, to be spent on the ocean in the company of mariners, and of members of the shoddy circles on their way to astonish the bloated aristocracy, and of dry-goods men going out to prepare for the fall trade—and this is not soothing. It must be remembered that Lower Canada contains the only relic of the state of society which prevailed in France before the Revolution, which in France has completely passed away, and left as few traces of itself as if it had perished five centuries ago, and puzzles the historian almost as much as the Gallo-Roman civilization—yet for a thousand years this ancien régime played the foremost part in moulding Europe into the shape in which we see it. It made a vigorous effort in the seventeenth century to reproduce itself in the New World, and it in a measure succeeded. The Canadian colony came out fully organized. The cadets of good families selected the choice tenantry of the family estate, and brought them over with them, and planted them on an estate of their own in Canada, becoming their "seigneurs," reserving all the feudal rights of the landlord in the old country, endeavoring, in company with the priest, to make society in the new France as exact a reproduction of society in the old France as the wilderness would permit. The success of the experiment, so far as it was an attempt to transplant and preserve a certain social type, was very great. It survived the conquest of the colony by England; the storm of the French Revolution did not reach it; and though seigneurial rights have disappeared very recently under the reformer's axe, and of the seigneur's former social and political influence there is consequently very little left, still society in French Canada even now rests largely on feudal ideas, and is held together by mediæval laws. Hearing one day from a lawyer, himself a seigneur, and bearing a name that most Frenchmen would be proud to follow into a salon, that he practised under the "Coutume de Paris," and used Pothier as a text-book, we told him he must excuse us if we looked at him well, for he was, for those who knew the ancien régime only through books, a real and very interesting curiosity, and would certainly "draw" in Paris, if put into the hands of an enterprising showman. Having never been in France, and evidently regarding French society with a slight touch of horror, he seemed scarcely aware of the depth of the changes which it had undergone. The impiety and immorality of the Revolution were what evidently most impressed him, one of the many evidences one meets with in Lower Canada of the large share the clergy have had in modelling the new society. This gentleman told us, with a slight glow of enthusiasm, that to this day he did not believe there was a single French family in the whole of the thickly-settled parish in which he lived in which man or woman omitted to "faire ses Pâques" every year, or to attend mass with tolerable regularity. He said he hardly ever met with a French peasant who had "lost the faith," unless he had been in the United States. Those who went there even for a short period, he said, came back irreligious men; not Protestants, but indifferents.

FRANCE.

PARIS, July 31, 1868.

IN politics, the capital event of the week is the adjournment of our Corps Législatif, together with the votes and the scenes which have marked the last days of the session. On Tuesday, the 28th, the Speaker of the House read the Imperial decree of prorogation sine die; but, to the great astonishment of all present in the hall, the Speaker, M. Schneider, did not treat his colleagues to the usual farewell speech which he delivers every year on the day of adjournment. "Why does M. le Président hold his tongue?" was the not very polite but very Frenchy expression of some wag in the tribune of the House. Because there was some danger that, in spite of all his caution, M. Schneider's tongue might have betrayed the secret of the Government about the time fixed for the elections of the new Corps Législatif—a question which is the most, and perhaps the only, important one for our legislators. The present House has nearly one year more to run. Its time will be up constitutionally only in 1869, and the majority of the deputies are in great fear of an earlier dissolution. Most of them, indeed, are not certain of being elected again by their constituents, and they would like to have the day of convocation for the new Corps Législatif postponed to the last extremity.

The wind of opposition seems to be blowing all over France, and it may increase to a hurricane which will sweep away not the Imperial Government itself, but its blind supporters, who belong to the majority. Napoleon is acute enough to know the situation, and it is said that he may give up the old, worn-out system of "official candidatures," abandon the policy of patronizing some would-be deputies, and let the people come to the ballot-box without being under the pressure of the prefects, sub prefects, and other functionaries who point out who are the "candidats agréables"—that is to say, the patronized candidates.

It is through this system of managing the elections by the functionaries that the preceding and the actual House of Representatives have been filled by a tremendous majority of members who gave themselves up bound hand and foot to the dictates of the Government. They voted always en masse, upon a sign of the Secretary of the Interior or of the Minister of State. Even had they perceived them, they would never have dared to cry "breakers ahead," for fear of hurting the views of the ministers who had made them deputies through the machinery of the official patronage. Thus are easily explained the numerous blundering votes obtained, almost without any opposition, by the Government during the last sixteen years, on the Mexican expedition, on the increase of our debt, etc.

But the country is getting tired of seeing its representatives more Imperialist than the Emperor, and Napoleon III. is disposed to let the people speak its mind, without being too much influenced; therefore the present deputies are afraid of facing their electors, and they dread an early dissolution of the legislative body. They remember that in the former House the opposition hardly counted five members, which number has risen to twenty in the actual Corps Législatif. They are aware, also, that, thanks to the laws voted by themselves, on the press, and on the right of meeting, their adversaries are not so defenceless as before, so that the députés officiels find themselves in a very dangerous predicament. On one side, they are threatened with losing at the polls the governmental support, and on the other side, they will have to encounter enemies to whom they have themselves given new weapons to fight with; and I want you to notice that the ministerial members charge the Government with treachery. They say, and it is true, that they voted the freedom of the press and of the right of meeting only on the assurance given by the ministers that these liberal concessions would not and could not endanger the political future of the députés agréables, because they should continue to enjoy the all-powerful support of the administration. Presently, if it is not certain that such a support will be withdrawn, it is certain that this withdrawal has been, mis sur le tapis, discussed, and that they can no longer rely on it absolutely.

Such were respectively the situations of the ministerial members and of the Government towards the end of the session—the latter trying to make a show or a reality of liberalism at the expense of its former associates, and the former clinging to the official patronage, as to a plank of safety, until they saw that this plank itself might fail them. They proved, by the last two votes of the session, how much they resented the conduct of the Government. It wanted to fund only three million francs of rentes—French consolidated bonds—as an indemnity to the holders of the Mexican loan. The majority voted four millions francs, knowing that it would conciliate the sympathies of the numerous bondholders at the expense of the Government, who alone would reap the maledictions of the taxpayers. The majority refused also to take into consideration another bill which the Minister had very much at heart. That bill granted to the Préfet de la Seine the authority to contract a loan with the "Crédit Foncier," to pay a part of the expenses of the embellishment of Paris. The deputies refused to abide by the will of the Ministers. They wanted to be able to say to their country electors, when returning home: "You see, we look sharply after your interests; we did not want to have your money expended for the aggrandizement and embellishment of Paris, which sucks the marrow from the bones of France."

You must easily understand, after these explanations, that the members of the majority did not join heartily with their comrades who shouted "Vive l'Empereur" after the reading of the decree of prorogation. The twelve republican deputies of the Opposition answered by cries of "Vive la nation!" "Vive la liberté!" M. Belmontet, a poet, a deputy, and an old companion of Napoleon III., when he was an exile, picked up the cry of the Opposition, and shouted at the top of his voice, "Vive la nation, which has given us the Emperor." M. Belmontet is, with M. de Cassagnac—two old gentlemen—the best type of a genuine Bonapartist; the former fights with verses, especially of the old style of 1810, and the latter is one of our most violent journalists and orators. He is editor of the Pays.

The Government papers will have much to do now in order to answer all the attacks poured down by the numerous journals which have been established in view of the next elections. Not one of these newly started papers is what might be called an Imperialist journal. They belong to our "vieux partis," old parties—Republican, Legitimist, Orleanist, Socialist. All endorse the opinion thus energetically expressed by M. de Girardin, who, whilst reviewing the history of France from 1848 to 1868, and asking what is the actual state of our country, prints these four sentences:

Is France more free?

No. It is less free.

Is France less indebted?

No. It is more!

There is evidently a great amount of truth in that, and it is to be hoped that the swarm of new journals which have just sprung up will devote themselves to the study of the great national questions, and abandon the personalities into which so many have fallen recently. We used to boast in France of our gentlemanlike manners, of our fair and honorable way of fighting in newspapers. We used to scorn American manners, when we heard that Mr. Bennett had been kicked, or that Mr. Greeley had been accused of wearing ragged trousers. But we have come down even below that. The editorial offices of the Paris and Lyons newspapers resound daily with blows and fights; writers are spit upon, revolvers are drawn, and duels are of daily occurrence. The dirtiest slanders fill whole columns of the newly created papers, which are half-and-half—that is to say, more literary, or rather they pretend to be, than political. Two days ago some writers who had, for a whole month, dragged in the mud some editors of the Figaro, who had poured upon them the most cruel personal abuses, were fined simply one franc. No wonder, then, that some people say that the Government and the magistrates encourage such low habits in the newspapers, in order to have the people ask for a reconsideration of the law which has recently granted to us the freedom of the press.

In the artist world there is little to say but that we seem going down. At the last annual competition of the Conservatoire de Musique no first prize was granted to singers, and out of twenty models of a statue to be erected to our late great painter, Ingres, not a single one could bear the first examination of the jury. We have already borrowed for our theatres the singers of Italy, of America, of Norway, the Patti, Nilsson, etc. Shall we have also to order our statues and paintings from European or American artists? A FRENCHMAN.

Correspondence.

PRESIDENT WOOLSEY'S RECONSTRUCTION POLICY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Your paper is the only organ of educated men through which attention can be called to President Woolsey's reconstruction policy. For twenty years Yale College has flourished under the presidency of one who deserves to a singular degree the old-fashioned eulogy of being a gentleman, a Christian, and a scholar. He tempers the somewhat loud and gaudy tendencies of young America by showing the elegance of quietness and simplicity. His occasional sermons, devout and thoughtful, clear and pure in style, are listened to with respect and attention by all intelligent students. And the tone of scholarship has risen, until those who know the college are satisfied that nowhere else in America are the elements of Latin, Greek, and mathematics so thoroughly and so generally acquired. Nor is the college far behind any other in the new-fashioned branches of learning.

Not content with his proper glory, however, Mr. Woolsey seems to share the Haussmann mania for demolition. Having found the college brick, he wishes to leave it sandstone. The college stands on a green parallelogram, in the midst of the elm-shaded town of New Haven. The buildings, toned down with age to a warm and sober brown, stand in a long row running through the parallelogram, and far enough back from College Street to leave a handsome and shady lawn the whole length of the grounds. These buildings, associated with the history of the college, admirably suited to the customs of the place, and nearly adequate to every want, are now condemned to demolition; and the lawn is to be sacrificed to a new row of stone buildings close to the street. On the rear of the college parallelogram, three stone edifices have already been erected—a library in the centre, an alumni-hall in the right-hand corner, and an art-building in the left. These edifices are in the Gothic style, two being of the most debased type, and one by Mr. Wight. If the new plans are carried out, there will be an interior green between these edifices and the new row.

The question arises, Is it worth while, in the present low state of architecture, and high price of building, to destroy the ancient convenience and beauty of the college arrangements? A thorough renovation of the old buildings, with the introduction of modern improvements, and the erection of a single new hall in keeping with the rest, to fill the gap between North College and Divinity, would not cost a quarter of the proposed expenditure, and would leave a generous fund to endow the library and pay first-rate instructors. The proposed site of the new divinity school, at the northwest corner of College Street and Elm, is much better suited to the Peabody Museum of Natural History, and the divinity school might be transplanted to Temple Street, which is a kind of ecclesiastical thoroughfare.

The truth is, the constitution of the college is too autocratic. The Faculty are merely the cabinet of the President; and the "corporation" registers the edicts of the sovereign, like the old parlement of Paris. When the college was founded, church and state were virtually united in the colony of Connecticut, and the corporation still consists of the President and ten other clergymen of the Congregational Church, together with eight magistrates of the State of Connecticut. Mr. Woolsey is understood to desire to cut loose from the state. The graduates might not object, if at the same time the college cut loose from the church; otherwise they would prefer to retain the political element as a counterpoise to the clerical. The bane of American colleges has been their excessively clerical character. Especially in provincial colleges, we have too often seen superannuated clergymen for professors, and dyspeptic students of divinity for tutors; while generous culture and modern learning are sacrificed to the safe training of commonplace candidates for "the ministry." The national character of Yale has checked this tendency at New Haven; but any aggravation of it would be a serious evil.

It is safest, then, to let the corporation retain its time-honored constitu tion, and to endeavor to arouse a little life and independence by giving it real duties. Let it assemble some time before commencement, and act as a senate to devise measures, on the President's recommendation, for the general welfare of the college. At commencement, let these measures be laid before a convocation, in which every Yale master of art shall have a vote, either in person or by proxy. Let convocation be free to discuss, propose amendments, adopt, or reject. Let its consent be requisite for appropriations, and it may not be found impossible to devise a scheme of taxation. Thus the whole body of graduates would keep their interest fresh; and the judgment, energy, and wealth of all parts of the country would be felt in university affairs at New Haven as they are now felt in business affairs at New York.

ACADEMIA.

NEWPORT, August 7.

THE SPIRIT OF THE CONTRACT.

[WANT of space compels us to omit a portion of the letter from which the following is an extract, and which contains a new point well put:]

All reasonable pretexts for refusing to pay the obligations known as greenbacks have ceased to exist. The holders of them are public creditors, having the legal obligations of the Government, which, by the letter and the spirit of the contract, i. e., according to its correct legal construction, are payable in coin. To withhold payment when we possess the means to make it is barefaced and shameless repudiation.

A great many vigorous blows are being struck at some shadowy, prospective repudiation, which is going to take place when the Democratic party gets into power; but that actual repudiation which really exists and furnishes the foundation for all our apprehensions is connived at and justified by nearly every one.

The amount of these repudiated obligations is less than four hundred millions. Since the close of the war we have expended much more than that sum in subsidies and grants. For more than two years the Government has allowed the Secretary of the Treasury to go into Wall Street with its money and buy up its overdue paper at a heavy discount, and then instead of cancelling has put it in circulation again. And now some good people propose to use this doubly dishonored paper to pay the principal of the five-twenty bonds, because the persons taking these bonds did not have the villanous foresight to stipulate to the contrary.

After this battle has been fought out, and our creditors have been frightened and bullied into exchanging their six per cent. bonds for four per cent. bonds, the principal and interest both expressly payable in coin, how long will it take Messrs. Butler and Pendleton to discover that a dollar is an arbitrary thing, depending for its intrinsic value upon the law-making power? They will say, "It is true that we agreed to pay so many dollars in coin, but we did not agree that it should be the coin then in use, or coin of any particular weight or fineness; we will therefore establish a standard which will pay our obligations according to the letter of the contract, without impoverishing our people, and in doing this we are but following the example of every other civilized nation."

It would be well, in this connection, to correct some crude notions concerning the consideration received for these bonds. The United States received dollar for dollar in hard coin, or its equivalent. For every hundred dollar bond which was issued, the party receiving it was required to surrender a Government obligation for a like amount, then overdue and payable in coin. The United States is certainly estopped from asserting that such an obligation was not worth its face.

A merchant who should take up his overdue paper by giving a bond and mortgage, and when the bond fell due should whine about his note having been at a heavy discount in the market when he executed the new security, and ask for a corresponding deduction on the bond, would be a fit companion for the man who refuses to pay his notes, evades the sheriff, and then sends an agent into the market to buy up his paper at a discount; or of the other man who borrows all the money his friends can lend him, under a plea of great distress, and having put all property out of his hands, wriggles his fingers from the end of his nose at the confiding creditors, and calls them bloated aristocrats.

It is of no use to discuss how the bonds shall be paid; the real question is, as Gen. Garfield said the other day, How shall the greenbacks be paid?

Yours very truly,

AN OLD-FASHIONED MAN.

GOLD SPECULATORS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I beg leave to propose a problem to some of our political (and financial) economists.

The depreciation of our currency being caused by an over-supply of a particular kind (paper) as compared with another kind (gold), what amount of the former would it be necessary to withdraw from circulation to establish the balance?

Supposing the relative values to represent inversely the relative quantities, would not the destruction of the surplus paper simply restore the equality of value, and leave the holders of paper just where they were before with reference to the gold standard? If not, how much paper must be cancelled to restore the balance? and would not the country be the gainer by the destruction of the surplus greenbacks?

For instance, I have $130 dollars in greenbacks, gold standing at 130, consequently $100 dollars gold. Now, if by some general measure of taxation or other the Government recalls $30 dollars of that paper, and thereby restores the balance of paper and gold, I have still $100 gold, and have really lost nothing. If to restore the balance it has only to cancel $20, I shall have gained $10; if $40, I shall only have lost $10.

Would not, under these circumstances, the best plan for the Government be to issue a new currency redeemable in gold, and call in at its gold value that now in circulation? This would necessarily occupy some time, and would, in effect, only establish a new currency of definite value without at once abolishing that which now is of indefinite value, but so involved in the commerce of the country as only to be extricated in time. The holders of the new currency, having the option of turning it into gold, will not be in haste to do so, and the Treasury will have no sudden over-strain, while those who hold the old have still a value become definite without being diminished.

This would not affect the bonds, which, not being circulating medium, would be paid when redeemable in the new currency (or in gold).

Yours truly,

W. J. STILLMAN.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM & SON add two more to the crowd of translations of German novels which have been called down on us by the success of Madame Mühlbach and the deserved success of Auerbach's "On the Heights." Of this last-named story, by the way, there is a new Tauchnitz edition, with many revisions and alterations for the better in its English. The new novels of Putnam & Son are Amely Bölte's "Madame de Staël," and "The Countess Gloisela," by D. (?) Marlitt. E. Marlitt is the name of the writer of "The Old Mam'selle's Secret," a pleasant novel which the Lippincotts published, and is probably the writer referred to. One novel which Putnam & Son announce will be warmly welcomed. It is "Anne Severin," by Mrs. Augustus Craven, the author of "A Sister's Story."——Leypoldt & Holt announce "Free Soil," a novel, translated from the German of Karl Fränzel. —Beadle & Co. will publish a new story by Capt. Mayne Reid. "The White Squaw" is the suggestive title.——Mr. D. G. Croly, of the World, has written, and Messrs. Richardson & Co. will publish, "Seymour and Blair: Their Lives and Services."——Gould & Lincoln announce "Seeds and Sheaves," by the Rev. Dr. A. C. Thompson, and "The Alphabet of Geology; or, First Lessons in Mineralogy and Geology," by S. R. Hall, LL.D. — T. B. Peterson & Brothers announce the third of their edition of Adolphus Trollope's novels—"Beppo, the Conscript." They will publish also "a new book of travels, by Dr. Charles H. Haeseler, of Pottsville, Pa."——The Catholic Publication Society announce: "A New Course of Meditations for the Clergy and Laity," by the late Cardinal Wiseman, edited by Dr. Anderdon; "Gropings After Truth: A Life Journey from New England Congregationalism to the One Catholic and Apostolic Church;" and "An Illustrated History of Ireland," brought down to the present time, with a chapter on "The Irish in America."——Robert Carter & Brother announce the ninth volume of Sprague's "Annals of the American Pulpit." It will treat of Lutheran, Dutch Reformed, and United Presbyterian ministers. Other books to be issued by the same firm are: "The Pivot Words of Scripture," by the Rev. P. B. Powers; "Yesterday, To-day, and Forever," by the Rev. E. H. Bickersteth; "Our Life in China," by a Mrs. Nevins; a "Memoir of Elizabeth Fry;" six volumes of "the Agate Series" of books for good children; the New Testament Series of "Bible Thoughts and Themes," by Dr. Horatio Bonar; and "Jacob's Well," by a Dr. McDuff.——The Boston Commonwealth says that the prayers offered by the Rev. Dr. Alger during the recent session of the Massachusetts Legislature are now passing through the press of Messrs. Roberts Brothers. It fits very well with what is generally believed of the recent legislature of Massachusetts that the members of that body should have subscribed to defray the expenses of publishing such a work.——Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co. make announcement of a large list of works to be published during the coming season. Some of them we have already mentioned; others are translations of the Erckmann-Chatrian novels; an edition, to be called the Brightwood Edition, of Timothy Titcomb's select works, including "Bitter-Sweet," "Lessons in Life," "Gold-Foil," "Kathrina," "Titcomb's Letters to Young People," and "Plain Words;" Archbishop Trench's "Household Book of English Poetry," in an American reprint, and a new edition of his "English, Past and Present;" an "Introduction to the Study of English Literature," by Prof. H. N. Day, who also puts forth this fall a new "Speller;" Dr. Bushnell's Hours at Home papers, "The Moral Uses of Dark Things;" an American edition of Max Müller's "Chips from a German Workshop;" "The Human Intellect, with an Introduction upon Psychology and the Human Soul," by Prof. Noah Porter; "Love as a Law," a book on moral science, by President Hopkins, of Williams College; "Travels and Adventures in South and Central America," by Don Ramon Paez; Comfort's series of text-books in German, French, Italian, and Spanish; Mrs. C. M. Kirkland's "Garland of Poetry for the Young;" "The Land, and Its Story," being lectures on the sacred historical geography of Palestine, by Dr. N. C. Burt; and, finally, "A Text-book of Natural Philosophy," by Le Roy C. Cooley, of the New York State Normal School.

—Messrs. Kelly & Piet, of Baltimore, have made arrangements with the proprietors of the London Lancet under which an edition of that journal is printed on thin paper for circulation in America. It can thus be supplied to subscribers at a considerably less price than it could heretofore be obtained for. Twelve dollars a year in currency is to be the cost of it. Messrs. Kelly & Piet announce their intention of not only giving their subscribers the Lancet complete, but of giving in addition several pages of original matter, which is to be contributed by leading physicians of the United States.

—"R. C."—Mr. Robert Clarke, we suppose, the Cincinnati publisher—having some eleven years since seen advertised a "MS. Court Sermon" of the year 1674, and having in his possession no specimen of English writing of so early a date, ordered it from an agent, who succeeded in making the purchase. "R. C." found no clue to its authorship except this, that in place of a signature there is entered, "in a contemporary hand," the abbreviated name "Gl. Burtt.," and Mr. Clarke would of course like to believe that the sermon is the production of Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, but then, 1673–4, for a few months one of Charles the Second's chaplains. The manuscript is not in Burnet's handwriting, to be sure; but "R. C." hypothesizes "a fair copy," and so disposes of that difficulty. He, however, brings nothing at all in the nature of evidence to support his views on that point. There is, by way of preface to the sermon, a letter dedicating it to the Duke of Ormond, as "chancellour of that universitie where I was bred." As "R. C." admits, Burnet was bred at Aberdeen, and could have no right to speak of Oxford as his Alma Mater on the strength of having spent some few months in studying mathematics there. Then, too, the dedication speaks of the writer's long residence abroad. But before 1674, the time of writing, Burnet had not been abroad more than six months, which is hardly "much." This sentence alone is conclusive against the notion that Burnet wrote the sermon: "Before it pleased god to call me to the profession wherein I now serve him, I have lived much abroad, And There been honour'd with good accesse to Men Knowing in the chief Courts of Christendome." Burnet was licensed to preach when he was only eighteen, and probably had not visited England even—certainly not the Continent—when he began serving God by preaching. The sermon before us, by whomsoever written, is now beautifully printed by Mr. Clarke—who is doing excellent service to Western typography—and is worth reading as a vigorous reprobation of a very bad sort of fool—namely, "the presumptuous incorrigible," or "ouerweening ffool"—an attack on flatterers, and an argument that no man deserves the name of fool who discharges the duty of his particular calling rightly and faithfully. "A Court Sermon" would be a fitter title for the book than "The Court Sermon."

—It is seldom that a great city is able to say "The Printer" is dead. But that is what Boston could not refrain from feeling when it learned of the death of Mr. John Wilson, whose press had been but recently removed to Cambridge beside those which it had long rivalled in accuracy and finish. We remember well his School Street establishment—the most orderly composing-room we have ever seen, and the best lighted; one, in fact, which made the nearest approach to the ideal seat of the typographic art, and was as far as possible removed from the obscure and dirty dens out of which faultless book and newspaper work is expected to issue, and, in not a few instances, does issue—by daily miracle almost. Mr. Wilson sat in a small room adjoining the relatively spacious and absolutely cheerful composing-room, with which he had close communication by means of bells and speaking-tubes. He was the impersonation of gentleness and modesty, and his attainments were of the most extensive and solid character. A slight acquaintance with a good printing-office will lead to the conviction that, as with critics in any branch of knowledge, so with printers, it is impossible to know too much or too many things; and there are few tests of good scholarship to compare with proof-reading. Mr. Wilson's abilities in this direction were almost or quite unrivalled. We once heard a hospital nurse from Boston (unconscious of Plutarch) say that the soldiers whom she tended always named the Massachusetts troops as second best after those from their own State in every case, from which she concluded that Massachusetts, by common consent, ranked first. Boston printers, however, always named themselves second after John Wilson, and looked up to him as the head of the profession. The deceased was a native of Scotland, the home of good printers, and followed his calling in Belfast and Manchester before coming over to this country. He was an ardent and incessant student of theology, and a list of his published works, as given in the Boston Advertiser, comprises "The Concessions of Trinitarians" (Manchester, 1842), "Scripture Proofs and Scripture Illustrations of Unitarianism" (London, 1846), and "Unitarian Principles Confirmed by Trinitarian Testimonies" (Boston, 1855). But his standard work on punctuation is that by which he will be longest remembered. It had passed through fourteen editions in 1862.

—The American is supposed to be the man of all men of modern times who in the course of his life goes through the most varied experience. Foreigners are apt to think that the Yankee is not the typical Yankee unless he has "taught school," peddled eight-day clocks, been selectman, gone in a Gloucester-built fishing schooner to George's Banks, served a term in the State Legislature, emigrated to the West and made stump speeches, failed twice or three times in business, founded a new sect and preached the doctrines thereto appertaining, travelled with a "daguerreotype saloon," held a commission in the Union army, been a member of Congress, and edited a paper. But we do not know that the typical Yankee has any advantage in point of versatility over a well-known class of clever Irishmen. Charles Graham Halpine, just deceased, is a fair specimen of the class to which we refer, and any American of whom we have any knowledge might safely be challenged to present a personal history marked by more vicissitudes, and greater adaptability to them, than that of "Miles O'Reilly." Mr. Halpine came to the United States in 1849. He had not attained his majority when he was in full communion with the "Young Ireland" party—a set of men who proposed to themselves nothing less than the dismemberment of the British Empire. Halpine, son of a clergyman of the Establishment, himself a Protestant so far as he was anything, as little as any man in the world likely to be moved by sentimental motives, was probably made a rebel and conspirator merely by the fervor of youthful blood, by a heedless and unthinking willingness to connect himself with any cause that gave scope to his mental and physical energy. He was already married when he landed, poor and without friends, at Boston, in 1849, and there was need of his at once finding work. He first found it—if our recollection of his own talk is not at fault—in the office of the Boston Post. Either after he left the Post or while he was still at work for that paper, he joined "Mrs. Partington"—B. P. Shillaber, one of the most weakly of our many weakly humorous writers—in publishing the Carpet Bag, a journal which soon died, and richly deserved death from the beginning. Mr. Halpine immediately thereafter came to New York—his proper field—and engaged with great ardor in journalism and politics. It was while he was in Boston, we think, that he sent to the Atlantic one or two articles which good judges pronounced fully equal, as specimens of good magazine literature, to anything the Atlantic has ever published; but he himself afterwards said that they were written not by him, but by his father or brother—we do not now remember which—both of whom were more than fair classical scholars of the old-time British pattern, and endowed with the literary knack common to all the members of the family. General Halpine himself was a ready if not a good Latinist, and, in Latin as in everything else, all he knew he utilized. In New York he soon made himself very well known as an extremely ready writer for several papers. It is said of him that he would write for this paper on one day, and the next morning would answer in another paper his own arguments of the day before. It may well be believed that nothing that he said on either day was very valuable, except from the Bohemian's or the managing editor's point of view. Meantime, while he was doing Democratic work for the Herald, and was writing for the Tribune things in harmony with the song, "Tear down the flaunting lie"—the Stars and Stripes, which covered slaves while it symbolized freedom—he was deep in the wire-pulling mysteries of Tammany Hall, making the acquaintance of every leading politician, and making himself a man of much consideration in local politics. In this he was helped by his editorship and part-ownership of the Leader, a lively paper, whose success was very largely due to him. About this time was his fight with Fernando Wood—a squabble not, we imagine, of great interest to the philosophical student of politics, though it did shift the municipal patronage from one set of Democrats to another. Soon came the war, and he at once offered his services, and was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the Sixty-ninth New York Volunteers. He was not long allowed to remain in the line, but was made a staff officer by General Halleck, and by-and-by was transferred to the military family of General Hunter. Hunter went to Hilton Head to command the Department of the South, and it was there that Halpine, now made a major, laid the foundations of his best literary fame. He had written some trifles for a little Hilton Head paper called the New South, and had made for himself that easily made thing, a garrison and mess-room reputation for literary ability, when one day there appeared a song of his, in which "Miles O'Reilly," supposed to be a private soldier in a New York regiment, argues in favor of "Sambo's equal right to be kilt," and professes a willingness to give Sambo the larger half of that right. At once the name of "Miles O'Reilly" became known all over the Union, and though nothing that "the boy Miles" did afterwards was nearly so good as this first expression of his opinion in regard to General Hunter's scheme of arming the negroes, still his success in this instance gave him vogue, and his songs written afterwards—songs which sometimes narrowly escaped being at least second-rate poetry of the Irish-song sort, and were always clever versifying—met with general acceptance. His reputation as "Miles O'Reilly," his old-time knowledge of our municipal politics, and his journalistic tact, enabled him to succeed in his enterprise of publishing the Citizen, and were equally influential in procuring for him his election as Registrar. As journalist, politician, editor, song-writer, soldier, he was always successful, in a certain sense of that word, and he deserves, in the first place, what credit belongs to a man who, beginning life alone and unaided in a new country, makes himself a power and dies regretted before he is forty years old; and in the second place, he deserves what credit belongs to the clever writer of songs which are songs of the day, or of the evening, though they may not be songs for all time. His literary character is all with which we have any concern. As regards that, he is to be described as filling a place between the conscienceless, uneducated, ready-witted Bohemian of the daily press, and the educated, very talented, very ready Maginns and Father Prouts whom he emulated. A book, sure of a generation of life, might be made up out of selections from his prose and verse.

—In the State of Vermont, for six years after 1860, there was on an average one divorce annually to every twenty-one and a half marriages. In Massachusetts, during four years of the same period, one divorce to about forty-four and a half (44·4) marriages was the ratio. In Ohio, it was one divorce to twenty-five marriages. In Prussia—among the Protestant population—the ratio of the divorces of 1855 to the marriages of that year was as one to nineteen. At the foot of this bad-looking list, Connecticut must be placed; there in the period between 1860 and 1867, the ratio was as one to eleven and four-tenths. Deduct from the whole number of marriages of persons of foreign birth 800 as being marriages of Catholics, who rarely or never petition for a divorce, and this ratio becomes still more unsatisfactory; we have one divorce to eight and a half marriages. Tried by other measures the result is the same; Connecticut makes a worse show than any other State of the Union or of Christendom—unless possibly we are to except Indiana, which seems to be afraid to collect the statistics of the subject. In that other Connecticut, the Western Reserve of Ohio, the case is about as bad; the counties constituting the district so-called furnish much more than their due proportion of the divorced, while the southern counties, in which, by the way, Catholics abound, fall below the average in the number of petitions. In the Judicial District of Berlin in 1838–40 there were fifty-seven divorces to every 100,000 inhabitants; in that of Frankfort there were thirty; in that of Magdeburg there were thirty-five; in Rhenish Prussia, under the less lax Code Napoleon, there were but four divorces to each hundred thousand people. Now, in Vermont, out of the same number of inhabitants (100,000) there are annually 33 divorces; in Massachusetts—we speak of the present decade—there are $20\frac{4}{10}$; in Ohio there are about $33\frac{3}{10}$, and in Connecticut, even if we do not count out the Catholic population, every hundred thousand of the people have amongst them yearly 80 newly divorced couples! There can be no doubt—the statistics, though they may prove a good deal less than Catholic controvertists would infer from them, conclusively prove it—that society in Connecticut is in a dangerously corrupt condition; and these figures ought to make Connecticut legislators look to their divorce laws and study the history of the effect which such relaxation of the law has had on the permanence of Connecticut marriages. The "omnibus clause" of the present law—the clause that relates to incompatibility of temper, and seems to suppose that one human being can make another perennially happy—could never have good results in so hasty and ill-tempered a world as this one even if everybody were perfectly honest; to the dishonest it affords every facility for unclean living. To aid them in their studies we refer them to President Woolsey in the New Englander, and to Doctor John M. Leavitt in the American Church Quarterly.

HELPS'S SPANISH CONQUEST.*

With this volume Mr. Helps has completed his work, and may well congratulate himself on the successful termination of a task so arduous. As he says in the preface to the first volume, it is not so much a history of conquest as of the results of conquest, and of the government of the subjugated tribes and colonies by the mother country.

It was not written to add another to the many brilliant and interesting narratives of the Spanish conquest in Mexico and Peru; these, it is true, form a large part of the work, but are mostly preparatory narration. The thread binding the work together must be clearly perceived in order to bring a series of otherwise disconnected narratives into one harmonious whole; this thread is the history of the growth of slavery and of colonial administration, and it is by the success with which Mr. Helps has traced this growth that he is to be judged.

He has done students of history great service by gathering into one work the scattered accounts of the numerous Spanish expeditions and conquests, and in making a most valuable and interesting work, although not always well digested, and by its unsystematic chronological arrangement often puzzling the reader.

Mr. Helps has many valuable qualifications as a historian, he has great patience for tedious research, and great personal interest in his subject, his statements are well weighed and accurate, and when he abandons himself to the quick current of events he is a forcible and picturesque writer. The fictitious narrative of the voyage of the Santa Flor in the second volume abounds in beautiful pictures, and the work is filled with striking, animated descriptions. But too often Mr. Helps retards the course of his history by wearisome reflections and speculations, and shows a lack of skill in weaving the various portions of his narrative together, leaving too many disconnected events standing in confusing groups. In his dread of being considered partial he becomes vague and undecided, seldom even attempting to refute charges, but meeting them with a host of palliative circumstances which leave the reader bewildered. His style is loose and too colloquial, abounding in "asides," generalizing remarks, and trite sayings, of which the reader very speedily gets enough.

As may be imagined, the work is extensive in its scope; after a preliminary view of Portuguese discovery in Africa it begins with Columbus's discovery and administration of the West India islands, passing in due time to the discoveries of Balboa and the wonderful deeds of Cortez and Pizarro, the history terminating with the middle of the sixteenth century, when conquest was nearly completed, and colonial organization settled or in the way of settlement. As Mr. Helps remarks, "There is a singular fascination in the account of such a deed as the discovery of America, which cannot be done any more, nor anything like it—which stands alone in the doings of the world;" but there is a still greater fascination in the account of the unknown country and how it was influenced by its discovery.

This influence, the administration of the country, and the events following its conquest, form the most interesting portion of Mr. Helps's work.

We can yet feel with much of its original interest the great question that three hundred years ago was anxiously asked in Spain, What is to be done with all these millions of newly-found vassals? The first thing to be done was to convert them to Christianity; to this end expeditions being fitted out, and the country explored and settled that the natives might be brought into contact with the Christians. A secondary consideration (with the mother country) was the tribute to be derived from the country, and the development of its resources. The discovery of the new world happened at an inopportune juncture in Spanish history, and in one respect, in the history of the world. The long-continued contest against the Moors had impoverished the country; the funds to equip expeditions could with difficulty be provided; and Columbus was indebted to the jewels of Isabella for his paltry outfit. This poverty of Spain had a most important and evil influence on the destiny of America; it prevented laws being enforced, and led to the institution of modern slavery; for the only way in which Spain could pay her soldiers was by granting them the natives or their services.

* "The Spanish Conquest in America and its Relation to the History of Slavery and to the Government of Colonies. By Arthur Helps." 4 vols. London: Parker & Son. New York: Harper & Bros. 4th vol. just issued.

The inopportune juncture in the world's history for America was the African discoveries made under the supervision of Prince Henry of Portugal. Mr. Helps has devoted a large space to a most interesting subject, and one heretofore little noticed by the early historians of America—the encomienda system, or division of the discovered lands among the discoverers. It was perfectly novel and unlike anything in the Old World; it was the germ of modern slavery, and made the Spanish conquest a huge failure. In the early part of 1495, during the administration of Columbus in Hispaniola, after sundry affairs with the natives, whom the lawlessness of the Spaniards had exasperated, he imposed a tribute on the whole island which seems to have been most severe, and in the next year service was demanded in the place of tribute. This was the beginning of the system of encomiendas which afterwards brought forth such bitter fruit. The first form of the encomienda or repartimento was simply so much land granted by Columbus to the colonists—in the royal letters authorizing him to make such grants there was no mention of the natives. Afterwards, without authority, he allowed the colonists to use the services of the natives for a year or two in building and tilling their lands. This was the second phase of the encomienda, land and tillage. Bobadilla, who superseded Columbus, allowed the Indians to be taken to work anywhere and without any restriction. In 1503 Ferdinand and Isabella directed Ovando (the governor who succeeded Bobadilla) to make the Indians have dealings with the Spaniards, and to settle the subject of wages as he should see fit. Ovando's method was this—he distributed Indians among the Spaniards with deeds which ran thus: "To you, such a one, is given an encomienda of so many Indians with such a cacique, and you are to teach them the things of our holy Catholic faith."

Henceforth there is a miserable succession of treacheries and horrid cruelties on the part of the Spaniards, and despairing revolts by the Indians. After seven years of Ovando's administration, out of some twelve hundred thousand souls which had inhabited Hispaniola there were "but few left," and it seemed good to Ferdinand to order that others should be brought from the other islands. The system of encomiendas with its frightful abuses, the additional iniquity of urging the ignorant natives into war, and selling the captives for work at the mines, had at last so much reduced the Indians that in a few years they would have been utterly exterminated in the islands.

But a protector was to be given them, a tireless man was to traverse the ocean twelve times for them, to spend sixty years of toil and sleepless effort, to be exposed to obloquy and denunciation such as no other man perhaps has ever endured. The central figure in the Spanish conquest, and in all histories of Spanish rule in America, is not Cortez, or Pizarro, but the tireless Clerigo (as he calls himself), the self-sacrificing Bishop of Chiapa, Bartolomé Las Casas. The obstacles he had to encounter in his schemes of benevolence were enormous. He had to persuade men to give up their hard-earned property in slaves, to ask Spain to relinquish the immense profits she made from her unjust oppression of her vassals; he had to expose the most shameless corruption on the part of officials; he was doomed to weary voyages, to long waiting in the ante-rooms of princes, and when, at last, after months of toil, a beneficent law had been framed, he saw those charged with its execution seduced by his enemies, and after all his labors and waiting the law not enforceed.

His interest in the Indians was very personal; he had, with his own eyes, seen such inhuman cruelties that his heart bled for their victims; he saw multitudes of weak natives torn from their homes, transported to distant settlements, used as beasts of burden, dying by thousands in the mines, and he literally groaned and agonized for them. Any means of relief, anything to save his poor Indians! And he found what he thought was a means of relief, and again he was doomed in his very benevolence to do an act that should increase the load of calumny heaped upon him—an act which should cause him most pathetically to say, "This advice, that license should be given to bring negro slaves to these lands, the Clerigo Casas first gave, not considering the injustice with which the Portuguese take them and make them slaves: which advice, after he had seen what happened therefrom (que cayó en ello),* he would not have given for all he had in the world. For he always held that they had been made slaves unjustly and tyrannically, for the same right is of them as of the Indians."

The direct result was that the privilege of importing a limited number of negroes was granted in monopoly to De Bresa; in consequence of this the supply was scanty, and to obtain labor the Indians were captured and enslaved. It is difficult to estimate the degree of blame which attaches to Las Casas for this advice. Some have savagely accused him of introducing the slave-trade into America, an accusation easily refuted; others have tried to excuse him entirely on the ground that at that time the slave-trade was not considered immoral, as it is now. These are extremes. The fact is that Las Casas of two evils chose what seemed to him the least. He saw the weak natives torn from their homes, subjected to labor for which they were totally unfitted, and perishing frightfully from change of residence and cruelty The negroes were hardy and well adapted to labor in the Indies—here was a chance to save his beloved Indians, this chance he embraced, and failed. He nobly repented of his error of haste and lack of investigation, and stands out on the page of history a figure almost unequalled in self-sacrificing benevolence.

The evils which occurred in the islands were partially averted in Mexico by the wise administration of Cortez, and by this time legislation in Spain had taken cognizance of the colonial evils, and was sending out a body of laws hardly equalled in the annals of any country for justice and benevolence. These just and equitable laws were foreshadowed by the command of Isabella that the captured Indians sent to Spain by Columbus should be returned to their homes. In solemn junta the Indians were pronounced freemen.

Cardinal Ximenes carried legislation for the Indians still further. In 1530, Charles issued an order declaring that no slaves were to be made even in a just war, and in 1538 a royal order forbade any Spaniard buying any Indian slave, or any cacique selling them. It was also ordered that no Indian should carry any burden against his will, or be removed from his own district. The new laws in 1542 made all encomiendas lapse to the crown on the death of the owner, and were the climax of the protective legislation of Spain. Personal services were abolished in 1549, regulations were made concerning the care of Indians in the unhealthy districts, weight of the burdens they were to carry, and at last, lest the Spaniards should impose on the Indians, the latter were to be regarded and treated as minors. As Mr. Helps remarks, "it is hardly possible to carry legislation further in favor of any race or class."

Unfortunately, these wise laws were not always carried out; their execution was hindered by the great distance between Spain and her colonies, by dishonest governors who evaded them, and by the impoverished condition of the mother country, who had to pay her rapacious soldiery in the spoils of the conquered country. All these things made the conquest in its material results a failure. With every opportunity to found a grand empire on this continent, with a territory equal in length to the whole of Africa, and wider than the empire of Russia, what did Spain accomplish? By rapacity and misrule the islands were depopulated, and if on the continent Cortez and De la Gasca preserved a remnant of the natives, they were feeble, ambitionless, and submissive, a distinct race from their conquerors and neighbors. But from this history there are lessons of infinite value to be learned by all colonizing nations; and speaking of it from that point of view, Mr. Helps has written one of the most valuable and instructive books of the time.

* Mr. Helps, II, 18, translates this incorrectly, "After he had apprehended the nature of the thing."

A SISTER'S STORY.*

This volume is principally composed of extracts from the letters and journals of different members of the family of the Count de la Ferronnays, who, in 1819, was French Ambassador at St. Petersburg, and in 1829 served his country in the same capacity at Rome. At St. Petersburg, Mrs. Craven, then Pauline de la Ferronnays, first met Alexandrine, the daughter of Count d'Alopeus, Russian Minister at Berlin. This acquaintance was renewed at Rome, where Alexandrine saw for the first time Pauline's brothert Albert, whom she afterwards married. The story of their courtship and marriag was told in a little volume entitled "Histoire d'un Amour Chrétien," printed for private circulation in Paris in 1866, and which was noticed, as a "French Love Story," in the Nation of June 1 of that year. Alexandrine is the central figure of this book—the loveliest of a group, every member of which, as far as one can judge of them from their correspondence and the minute daily record of the inner life of sentiment and religious emotion which each of them kept, appears to have been faultless, unless too absolute a perfection may partake of the nature of a fault. Throughout the entire family the sentiment of filial and fraternal affection became a passion which apparently combined great intensity with singular unreserve—two elements not ordinarily compatible. The publication of this book, with its minute details of actions, its close analyses of sentiment, gives one striking proof of what we mean by unreserve. But what seems to us a still more forcible one is the fact, that while the journals from which it is compiled were yet in daily use, they were handed about not only from one member of the family to another, but intimate friends also were taken into confidence. Alexandrine's account of her love, and her married life, filled three thick manuscript volumes, of which Mrs. Craven says that "the morbid truthfulness, which was Alexandrine's peculiar characteristic, her anxiety to note down every action, word, and even thought with scrupulous exactness, her horror of exaggeration, her desire to relate the evil as well as the good with equal sincerity, made her indulge in an abundance of superfluous details which prolong her narrative to a tedious extent." Mrs. Craven seems to have made her selections with great good taste and judgment. We have a love story of the most delightful kind, told with the same fulness which a novelist would accord to it, and told by its principal actors—a love at once innocent and passionate, and yet a love which, while it lasted, apparently never felt the need of any sacred privacy, and of which the indifferent world of readers is now invited to become a spectator.

* "A Sister's Story. By Mrs. Augustus Craven. Translated from the French by Emily Bowles." New York: The Catholic Publication Society. 1868.

Shortly after Alexandrine's record was finished we find one of the sisters, then recently married, writing to Mrs. Craven:

"My mother-in-law is reading part of Alexandrine's story, and is much touched by it. She is very much surprised at some of the things in the journal, and in Albert's letters. She says, 'Why really, this makes one believe in novels; I had no idea that such feelings existed.'"

Count Charles de Montalembert, who was an intimate friend of the family, wrote to Alexandrine a year after her husband's death:

"I have thought of including in my series of works on the Catholic ages a special book upon 'Christian Love and Marriage.' Albert's fragment has very much confirmed me in this plan, and has suggested the idea of embodying in it the story of your lives by way of epilogue, to show that even in our degenerate age some privileged souls know how to be faithful to the holy traditions of which the middle ages have left us such numerous examples. Tell me if this idea smiles upon you."

She replied:

"What I am now writing will be of great use to you. It is a full journal of our life, in which you will find all that Albert wrote. Unfortunately I have as yet only finished one year of it, which I showed to Rio, who thought it interesting; but for some time past I have been longing for an opportunity to show it to you. All Albert's letters to you are copied in it. Oh yes! dear friend, it would be indeed a work worthy of you, as well as a great satisfaction to me, whom God made so happy in my marriage, if you were to show the world how good and desirable that kind of happiness is; that there is nothing so sweet on earth as a love which we are not afraid of owning before God and men, and that two human beings can never so fully enjoy their mutual affection as when they both serve with one mind the God who created them."

The literary and artistic sentiment predominates over the purely religious one in what follows:

"Oh! Montal, if you could contrive, by writing the story of your best friend, to make the cold and dull world understand all this, how glorious it would be for you, for Albert, and for me! I hope I should not wish to enjoy that glory in this world, for it would make me too proud, though it was all owing to Albert. I know there are in our story a number of details which make it as interesting as some old chronicle. That first meeting at Rome, and the words we exchanged at the doors of the church, when he rebuked me for human respect. The offering he made of his life, and of every earthly blessing, to obtain my conversion; then the little fact you remember, of the strip of paper torn off my note-book; the fright I had about the duel at Pompeii, and the tears I could not conceal; Albert's exile to Rome, and Fernand's little artifice to get me to write to him; that happy life the following winter, under the same roof as his family; Mamma beginning to revolve in her mind the possibility of our marriage, and our both being aware of it, but not venturing to speak to one another on the subject, yet still feeling secure in the strength of our mutual attachment; then our departure for Germany, and his for France; our being delayed at Rome while he was dying at Civita Vecchia; my despair, which made me exclaim, 'Oh! if only I were his wife!' I am sure that God heard that cry, as my mother also did, and at last (after seven months' absence) we met again at Naples, with every obstacle removed. And then I found him an angel of whom I was not worthy, and in our marriage such peace and happiness as I never believed could exist."

We may add that when one recovers from the first feeling of surprise that a history of sentiments so sacred in their very nature should for any reason have been given to the public, there is no longer anything in the book to repel one. No love story could be more delicately pure—and notwithstanding an impression which we found was not to be easily shaken off, that most of these letters and journals were written not only with a consciousness of the actual presence of God, but the possible presence of almost any uninterested third party, yet the note of affectation is never struck throughout. Moreover, the love story forms but a small portion of a volume whose primary intention was to show that the Catholic Church not only has power to make utterly pure and innocent the strongest of human passions, but that it can console its children under the bitterest sorrows, convert their despair into calmness and their grief into joy.

Mrs. Craven certainly offers very abundant and convincing testimony on this point—a point which probably no one ever dreams of controverting. Given natures like these, in which the emotional element entirely predominates, to which the pursuit of truth as an ultimate object is totally incomprehensible, which craves happiness and repose with a passionate longing, and the Church certainly offers a satisfactory and comprehensive solution of all their difficulties. We should all be Catholics were it not that the Church sets too high a price upon her opiates. One generally pays for extreme wealth of emotional power by a corresponding poverty of judgment, and though, if we had our choice, we might all be willing to be born blind that we might never feel afraid in the dark, the settlement of the matter is certainly not optional with us. It is a congenital impossibility for some people to conceive of their natural passions, of their judgment, will, and reason, as mere counters with which they can purchase eternal rest, and a tardy but complete gratification of the wants which are here unsupplied. Such people do not, in rejecting Catholicism, necessarily disavow the yearning for this rest, nor the belief that it will be attained. The craving is universal, the Church's answer only partial—it allows the claims of the emotions, but it disallows those of the intellect. There is no doubt that she does her legitimate work well and thoroughly, that she gives hope to the despairing, comfort to the sorrowing, and sometimes mends the morals of the vicious—we quarrel with her only because in virtue of doing this she claims the right to outrage or ignore wants yet profounder than those which she supplies.

BISHOP'S EXPLANATIONS OF THE LAW.*

THE first three chapters of this work leave one a little doubtful whether the author has not forgotten his statement in the preface, that he does not presuppose the reader to be "destitute either of natural capacity or preparatory training." But we get a pretty clear and convincing view of his own dense ignorance of the distinction between ethics and law, and of his confused perception of what he himself means by such phrases as "moral conformation," "moral and intellectual element," as constituents of the legal mind. The last section of the chapter on "moral aptitude" contains the substance of the author's conclusions on this branch of his subject. We present them without unnecessary comment. "A man with a contracted moral part," says Mr. Bishop, "may sometimes make a good physician or even a good minister of the gospel, but he can never become a good lawyer. Sometimes one who practises immoralities is found endowed with a good capacity for the law, but such a man is always unhappy, for he must have a strong moral nature, and it remonstrates against his evil courses."

Of "preparatory studies and training" the author says: "There is no system of education esteemed by any considerate persons valuable which may not, in some aspect of it, present advantages for him who intends to follow it up by law studies. Perhaps that which is least useful in an ordinary collegiate course is Greek." (He means to say, we take it, that the college-bred lawyer will find his Greek of rather less value to him professionally than any other of his acquisitions.) And again he says: "The kind of preparatory education, therefore, if of any kind usually deemed useful among men, is of less consequence than the amount." We suppose it will be difficult to adduce a parallel for these two quotations in the naïve ignorance which they manifest on the part of our author, and in their curious phraseology. But we can go on and see.

In the second book, on the nature of the law in general and of the common law in particular, Mr. Bishop is more at his ease than in his introductory labor. His uncontracted intellectual part invades the realms of universal science, and demands tribute from every form of existence in which any law or anything else "pervading and constraining" can be found. "The law of nature," he tells us, "is the order which pervades and constrains all physical existence," meaning by "order," as he shows below, not system, but command. "The law of the human mind, which is taught in the system called mental philosophy, is the order which pervades and constrains the existence and action of the mind of man on our earth; and the law of the land, as taught in what are termed law-books, is the order which pervades and constrains our national and municipal associations." His singular use of the word "order" in the foregoing passages is indicated further on when he says that his definition, "by employing the term 'order,' carries the mind to the consequences of obedience and disobedience."

* "The First Book of the Law, Explaining the Nature, Sources, Books, and Practical Applications of Legal Science, and Methods of Study and Practice." By Joel Prentiss Bishop, Author of "Commentaries on the Criminal Law," on "The Law of Marriage and Divorce," and on "Criminal Procedure." Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1868.

The mixed condition of his ideas as to the meaning of the word "law" is further illustrated by the following passages, the remarkable character of whose reasoning is equalled by the gravity with which they are propounded: "The views stated in the last chapter suggest to us that in the nature of things there can be no existence of any kind destitute of law. If from anything we separate all which may be termed the law of the thing, then the thing itself, so far as we can comprehend it, ceases to be." . . . . "If, for example, each individual should insist upon occupying one certain space, one greater than is sufficient to contain a single person, and should carry his determination into effect, the life of every one would be instantly ended. It must, therefore, be a law that no two shall occupy at the same time one and the same space." Other passages follow which are equally astonishing, but which it would be beside our purpose to quote. We cannot, however, avoid calling attention to the author's almost wonderful want of what one would suppose quite as essential for a lawyer as an uncontracted moral part; we mean a capacity for drawing with certainty a correct inference from premises, a defect of which section 43 will furnish any one who likes such things with two remarkably fine specimens.

We were in some doubt, after finishing the first six chapters of the book and meditating on the author's remarks on that subject, as to what class of intellects it might be to which his own properly belonged, but the beginning of chapter seven opened our eyes.

His conception of the Deity (section 60) standing over a stream of running water and subverting by his simple volition the law of gravitation is daring, and is by no means the less perfect as an imaginative effort because it illustrates the ordinary everyday mind of the author, in that the definition of law which it implies is flatly contradictory of the one given in section 44. This, with its mysticism, some readers will like better:

"There are some religionists who believe that great truths can be gathered from the Scriptures by means of what is called the science of correspondences. Be this as it may, there does sometimes appear, to the casual view at least—perhaps also to the more scientific observation—a correspondence between external things and things of an intangible nature. We hear of the 'threefold cord not easily broken;' of the triangle, which is a sort of power in mathematical science; and, in theology, of the Trinity. We might go where the milkmaid plies her vocation, and find the three-legged stool;" . . . .

'On such a stool immortal Alfred sat,
And swayed the sceptre of his infant realms.'

In the last two of these quoted lines, Cowper, whether he meant it or not, conveyed a great legal truth. It is that the law, of which King Alfred was one of the most illustrious patrons and founders, constitutes a trinity not unlike the three-legged stool. There are three, there are three in one, the three are equal the one to the other; we use the name of the one as almost a synonym of the other; we may put a legal case on the one, or the other, or the other, at pleasure, it being rather a choice of words than ideas; and, when we contemplate the three as combined, we have that whereon rests all judicial decision, all rightful governmental action and power, everything, in short, which is comprehended under the phrase law of the land. In the last three chapters we have contemplated each of these three things—each leg of the milkmaid's stool—separately; they are legal principle, legal reason, legal authority—three in one, the superstructure being all rightful judicial and other governmental action; just as, in this universe of which we are a part, all things rest on God, whom the theology of most of the civilized world contemplates as three in one, while he is in himself all and in all."

With something of that haughty consciousness of an inner sight which belongs to poets and philosophers of the mystical school, Mr. Bishop does not assign any reasons for the dogmas above set forth; and, with a charming consistency to his newly developed theological bias, demands of his readers faith or its equivalent as a prerequisite to their intelligent apprehension of them.

"But the writer may be asked, On what authority he states that the law has this triple nature? If so, his answer may be found scattered through the last three chapters. If these do not satisfy the enquirer, then let him read through all the books of the law from the beginning to the end; and, if he reads understandingly, he will see that the law has the triple nature thus assigned to it. But there are persons who will still press the writer thus: 'Nay, show us a place in the books where it is said, the law is a trinity.' Now, this sort of demand, by whomsoever made, is conclusive of one fact, and only one—namely, that the person making it needs still to be taught the fundamentals of legal truth"—after which, if the pressing seeker has anything more to say, he is not wise.

It is a sad enough fact, though a familiar one, that the highest degree of poetic genius is not always found allied with reverence for sacred things; and that the speculations of mystical philosophy sometimes clothe themselves in forms which in humbler utterances would be unmistakably sacrilegious. To such minds much is to be pardoned; still, when one of them comes out as a professed teacher and guide of the young, it is the duty of every right-minded critic to show him in his true light. In the following passage Mr. Bishop horrifies us; he declares that judge-made law is inspired! (section 63):

"When, therefore, there is a concurrence of all the circumstances essential to a sound administration of justice, namely, the court sitting with unbiassed understanding to hear the argument, the presentation of argument on both sides by counsel learned in the law, such a constitution of the tribunal as will render its judgment valid and effectual, the aspiration in the mind of the judges after justice and right, and the existence in their minds of that reasonable amount of legal aptitude and learning, without which they never ought to have been appointed judges, 'Almighty God' appears in the midst of the tribunal where it sits, and reveals the right way to the understanding of the judges as surely as he appears in the tempest on the ocean, and teaches each water-drop where to be when the wind goes down, so as to produce in the deep the same calm which has gone before in the sky; and as the ocean drops do not know the philosophy of this, so oftentimes the judges do not apprehend the true reason of their decisions."

This is shown conclusively in the case of a decision rendered under the requisite conditions, but which is subsequently overruled:

"Now, if the judges travel out of the record, and undertake to lay down doctrines not necessary to the decision of the cause, 'Almighty God' does not go with them there; their words are what are called in the law-books 'obiter dicta,' and being both uninspired and impertinent, they are of no effect as a guide in future causes."

When, in an earlier chapter, Mr. Bishop represented the Deity as standing by a brook and amusing himself by reversing the law of gravitation, we might have forgotten the irreverence, which we could not deny, in the boldness and originality of the conception; but this last we find too strong.

We have found it impossible to speak seriously of a book of which it would hardly be too much to say that all that is not utterly absurd is utterly commonplace. Occasionally, it is true, a piece of sound advice may be found in the volume, but it is generally very trite. It contains at the end a useful list of the principal law-books now in use, together with some observations on their merits, and except for this list the book seems to be of little value for the class for whom it is especially written, and of still less to any one else, and we sincerely wish, for the author's reputation, that it might have been suppressed. His reputation as the author of two treatises, very well known to the profession and generally accepted, is considerable and honorable, and he ought to have been a better friend to it.

*Several Guide Books.—It is not, perhaps, too late in the season to speak of the books named below. Mr. De Costa's is more than a mere guide-book; is, in fact, a critical account of Lake George and the region round about, the historical portion based on careful and some original researches, which in not a few instances throw new light on Revolutionary traditions, and either alter or diminish them. The descriptions of scenery are written with the moderation of a practised writer, and not in the manner of a tourist who exhausts his adjectives long before he has reached the climax of sublimity.

Mr. Morford has laid hold of a good idea, and in all practical particulars has carried it out very well; that is, he maps out a number of short excursions for those who cannot visit Europe except in haste and for a brief period, and provides for the largest amount of sight-seeing with the utmost economy of time and money. Some latitude is allowed, however, and the book will be of use even to persons with long purses and plenty of leisure. We only fear that the average respectable American citizen who purchases it will feel inclined to resent some of the general directions about good manners and prudent behavior while abroad. The class that needs instruction of this sort is more likely to be capable of making long trips, and is vulgarly known as "shoddy." The man who stints himself that he may set foot on the other shore of the Atlantic, if only for a month, will hardly be in danger of arrest at Dublin as a Fenian sympathizer, or as a scoffer at Catholicism in one of the cathedrals. The "few useful phrases" of the appendix would be considerably more useful if the French portion especially had been edited with any care. But there are numerous mistakes in accent and spelling—e. g. "Cocher, ète vous

* "Lake George: Its Scenes and Characteristics, with Glimpses of the Olden Times. To which is added some account of Ticonderoga, with a description of the route to Schroon Lake and the Adirondacks. With an Appendix, containing Notes on Lake Champlain. With Illustrations. By B. F. De Costa." New York: A. D. F. Randolph. 1868.
"Appleton's Short Trip Guide to Europe. 1868. By Henry Morford." With a Map. New York: D. Appleton & Co.
"Book of Summer Resorts. Compiled by Charles H. Sweetser." New York. 1868.

libre?"—and fatal confusion and error in the pronunciation, for which compare: "Une pair de bottes (oon piar day boat)"! and "Un habit (oon abbee)." For the unlettered American, too, what could be more disastrous advice than this, culled from "a few simple rules worth remembering"?

"10th. The French idiom, or arrangement of sentences, is generally the exact reverse of the English (!); so that when any doubt exists as to which of two adjoining words to place first, it is generally nearest safe to remember what the English would be, and reverse it."

"15th. The more that words are chopped up, mangled, swallowed, and ejected through the nose (like tobacco-smoke by old smokers), the more possibility will exist of their being understood by a Frenchman."

This strikes us as rather costly pleasantry, and likely to convert a short trip to France into a very long one, if the tourist depends on his French either for staying or for getting away. Finally, what place in a foreign guide-book have the true reporter's puffs of various New York establishments, advertised in the back part, on condition, we presume, of "editorial mention?" None, unless the helter-skelter tourist is in danger of bringing back with him a hotel, or a billiard-table, or a railway of foreign make.

If Mr. Sweetser's compilation gives as much trouble to those who are anxious to learn from it where to go for the summer, as it has done to us in trying to discover what its merits are, it will not become a favorite guide-book. It is, in short, badly arranged, and it covers so much ground that in condensing his material the compiler has rejected almost everything but the names of places and the descriptions of routes. It is not in such a catalogue that the indifferent tourist will seek for light and suggestion. With "Appleton's Railway Guide" and "Lippincott's Gazetteer" he could do as well for himself. The "complete topical index" will not relieve him of embarrassment; it is exceedingly imperfect. "Mountains" form one of the divisions of this book, but we do not find (observe our caution) Wachusett, the pride of Central Massachusetts, nor Kearsarge—the Conway Kearsarge—the view from which is, perhaps, more satisfactory than that from Mount Washington, while it is obtained with much less fatigue. Monadnock receives decent mention, but as it is one of the most beautiful of mountain shapes, a person who had ever looked upon it would have thought that of quite as much consequence as looking from it. The want of local color is the inevitable fault of a compilation like this. Once in a while there is an attempt to supply it without borrowing (from Mr. Beecher or Starr King), as in speaking of Lake Umbagog, in the introductory chapter, it is stated that "there are no hotels here, but you can live with the farmers, and have glorious bread and milk." Now, this is true of hotels in an urban or a fashionable sense, but no other, even if the name hotel is insisted on, for which see p. 166, in another mention of the lake. The milk, as we remember it, was good, but we never saw glorious bread in that region, and do not believe it has any necessary connection with glorious milk, there or anywhere else. On p. 59, "young men" are advised "to go to the source of the Connecticut River and catch trout in beautiful Lake Umbagog." This would require rather a long rod, and the young sportsmen would be advised to drop their lines rather in the Megalloway, or in some one of the half-dozen lakes north, which drain into the Androscoggin through Umbagog; for the lowest lake is too muddy and shallow for the best fishing, but commanding, as it does, a superb view of the White Mountains, is, on the whole, more picturesque than the larger and purer bodies of water with which it is connected. The compiler also reports an Androscoggin "Lake" near by, of which he should take possession at once by right of discovery. Among omitted "summer resorts," Conway, already alluded to, is conspicuous, and Philadelphians will miss Mauch Chunk. Mr. Sweetser's "Tourist's and Invalid's Guide to the North-west" is a much inferior piece of scissors-work, and is really reprehensible for advising invalids to seek restoration to health in Minnesota. The testimonials which are printed in support of this advice are hardly better than those which make the fortune of patent medicines. Moreover, that Minnesota has experienced a significant and probably permanent change of climate, unfavorable to invalids, has been asserted by residents of the State, and is not unlikely to be the case.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. | |
|---|---|---|
| Barnes (Rev. A.), Notes on the Book of Psalms, Vol. I | (Harper & Bros.) | $1 50 |
| Bulwer Lytton (Sir E.), Paul Clifford | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | 1 50 |
| Bunsen (F. Baroness), Memoir of Baron Bunsen, 2 vols. | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | |
| Burnet (Rev. G.), The Court Sermon, 1674 | (Robert Clarke & Co.) | |
| Clarke (Rev. J. F.), Sermons | (Wm. V. Spencer) | 1 50 |
| Collins (W.), The Moonstone: a Tale | (Harper & Bros.) | 1 50 |
| Dickens (C.), Little Dorrit | (Ticknor & Fields) | 1 50 |
| Hillhouse (J.), The Annunciation: a Poem | (Pott & Amery) | 1 50 |
| Houk (G. W.), Puritan: a Poem | (Robert Clarke & Co.) | |
| Junker (E.), Lucy; or Married from Pique: a Tale, swd | (Loring) | 0 30 |
| Leakin (Rev. G. A.), The Periodic Law, swd | (Pott & Amery) | 0 50 |
| Smith (Dr. Wm.), Dictionary of the Bible, Am. ed., part xii | (Hurd & Houghton) | 0 75 |
| Williams (F.), Lives of the English Cardinals, 2 vols. | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | |

JUST ISSUED:

CAMEOS FROM ENGLISH HISTORY.

From Rolla to Edward the Second.

By the author of "The Heir of Redclyffe." With original index to chapter. Vignette title. Beautifully printed on toned paper and elegantly bound. 12mo, extra cloth, $1 75.

THE VIRGINIANS:

A Tale of Last Century. Vol. I. By W. M. THACKERAY. With 23 illustrations on steel, and 53 on wood by the author. Being Vol. IX. of the New Standard Edition of Thackeray's Works. Extra green cloth, $3 50; extra claret cloth, gilt top, $3 75.

PAUL CLIFFORD.

A Novel. By Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, Bart.

The Globe Edition.

One vol. 16mo, with frontispiece, tinted paper; fine green cloth, $1 50.

A SYSTEM OF MEDICINE.

Edited by J. RUSSELL REYNOLDS, M.D., F.R.C.P., Professor of Medicine in University College, London.

With contributions by the most eminent practitioners in England. New and cheaper edition. Vol. I. Containing general diseases. 1,000 8vo pages, extra cloth, $5. Vol. II., containing local diseases, 1,000 8vo pages, extra cloth, $5.

THE SCIENCE AND PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

By WILLIAM AITKEN, M.D., Edinburgh.

Fifth edition. Enlarged and carefully revised. With a steel plate, a map, and 130 wood-cuts; two thick 8vo vols., 2,166 pages, cloth, $12; sheep, $14.

George Fox, The Friends, and the Early Baptists.

By WILLIAM TALLACK.

With portrait. 12mo, cloth, $1 25.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,

715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

NEW YORK,

WILL PUBLISH, AUGUST 15,

1. LIFE IN THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC IN THE DAYS OF THE TYRANTS; or, Civilization and Barbarism. From the Spanish of D. F. SARMIENTO, LL.D., Minister Plenipotentiary from the Argentine Republic to the United States. With a Biographical Sketch by MRS. HORACE MANN, and a Portrait. In one volume crown 8vo, price $2.

 A book pronounced by the Revue des Deux Mondes "instructive as history, interesting as a romance, brilliant with imagery and coloring." The work is now for the first time published in English, and supplies a needed place in literature as an exposition of Government and society in South America. The sketch is drawn mainly from Senor Sarmiento's papers, and is a lively narrative of the romantic life led by one who is now regarded as among the foremost statesmen of South America.

SEPTEMBER FIFTH.

2. REMINISCENCES OF EUROPEAN TRAVEL. By ANDREW P. PEABODY, D.D., LL.D., Preacher to Harvard University, and Plummer Professor of Christian Morals. In one volume 16mo, price $1 50.

 Dr. Peabody carried to Europe a mind trained to just observation, and the material which he brought back is consequently valuable, and is presented in a most pleasant fashion. The book is never dull, and is especially free from the guide-book flavor.

3. FIOR D'ALIZA. By ALPHONSE DE LAMARTINE. Translated from the French by GEORGE PERRY. In one volume 16mo, price $1 25.

A pretty story of Italian peasant life, which Lamartine apologizes for not having cast in poetry, so poetic is it in character.

LATELY PUBLISHED.

4. LIFE, LETTERS, AND POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF FREDRIKA BREMER. Edited by her Sister, CHARLOTTE BREMER. Translated from the Swedish by FREDA MILOW. In one volume crown 8vo, price $2.

Nothing we have ever read has so carried us into the heart of the Northland. . . . . You live in the Swedish family. You make the acquaintance of the Swedish peasantry. You sit down at their feasts. You look on their Christmas festivities. . . . . In short, the whole of their life passes before you, in pleasant panorama, from the cradle to the grave. On the whole, we have rarely read a more charming story than the biography.—New York Independent.

5. THE GAME OF CROQUET: Its Appointments and Laws. With descriptive illustrations. By R. FELLOW. A new edition, enlarged and corrected. In one volume crown 8vo, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

A new edition, improved and enlarged, presenting the mode of playing the game most in vogue in England.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,

678 Broadway, New York.

A New Novel by the Author of

"A WEEK IN A FRENCH COUNTRY HOUSE."

MEDUSA, AND OTHER TALES.

BY MRS. ADELAIDE (KEMBLE) SARTORIS.

Price 35 cents.

IN LORING'S "TALES OF THE DAY."

NEW BOOKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED

BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street,

BOSTON:

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS. Being an attempt to trace to their source Passages and Phrases in common use. By JOHN BARTLETT. FIFTH EDITION, revised. 16mo, vellum cloth, $3.

This edition has been so much enlarged and improved as to be substantially a new book. Fifty per cent. additional matter has been added, and the index alone now contains a hundred and sixty pages closely printed in double column. The Nation says: "We consider it very honorable to the author, as well as creditable to our literature, that he did not thus abandon the public, for the sake of ease and profit, but has persistently sought to improve his collection by fresh researches, in which he has obtained the aid of many scholars, until now in a fifth edition, wholly new and of unrivalled typographical beauty, he may be said to have fairly acquitted himself of further exertion."

THE MODERN REPRESENTATIONS OF THE LIFE OF JESUS. Third American Edition. Four Discourses delivered before the Evangelical Union at Hanover, Germany, by Dr. GERHARD UHLHORN, First Preacher to the Court. Translated from the Third German Edition, by CHARLES E. GRINNELL. 16mo, cloth, $1.

This little work, containing four popular essays of an orthodox divine, translated by a Unitarian clergyman, has met an unexpected welcome from the secular press throughout the country, and from religious papers of all denominations—Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Unitarians, and Universalists, alike. The Round Table remarks in regard to the book:

"It would be difficult to conceive of four sermons which should put in a clearer and stronger light the position of the Church as she stands at the present day, assailed by the great modern rationalists."

THE SPIRIT OF SEVENTY-SIX; or, The Coming Woman. A Prophetic Drama. Fifth edition. 16mo, paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1; cloth, gilt, $1 75.

No satire of recent years has won such general favor as this clever jeu d'esprit. Originally produced in private theatricals near Boston, it was published in the present form at the solicitation of those who had witnessed its performance, and at once obtained a wide circulation. It is a telling and good-natured hit at the Woman's Rights movement, depicting the probable state of affairs in 1876, if the female element shall be introduced into politics. "The Spirit of Seventy-six" is an excellent book for summer and vacation reading.

 These books sent by mail, pre-paid, on receipt of the advertised price.

THE LITERARY WONDER OF THE AGE!

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK,

Have now ready

The Cheapest and Most Beautiful One-volume Edition ever published of

SHAKSPERE'S

COMPLETE WORKS.

PRICE FIFTY CENTS.

It is printed in a new diamond type, cast expressly for the purpose, upon a rich toned paper, and in the very best style of typography. It is edited by

Mr. CHARLES KNIGHT, and possesses the advantage of all the research made by that ripe Shaksperian scholar in his recently completed and beautiful new edition of "Knight's Pictorial Shakspere."

This edition can also be had neatly bound in green cloth, 80 cents; or handsomely bound in half Roxburghe, gilt top, $1, and will be mailed to any address—on receipt of the advertised price and 10 cents additional to defray postage—by the Publishers,

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

ADELE DUBOIS.

A STORY OF THE LOVELY MIRAMICHI VALLEY IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Price 75 cents.

IN LORING'S "RAILWAY LIBRARY."

ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR AUGUST.

D. APPLETON & CO.,

90, 92, and 94 Grand Street, New York,

WILL PUBLISH, AUGUST 7,

THE ABBOT,

Being the Twelfth Volume of the Cheap Edition of the Waverley Novels.

Each volume illustrated.

Price 25 cents each.

To be completed in Twenty-five Volumes.

On the same date, the Globe Edition of the

POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN MILTON.

To which is prefixed a Biography of the Author, by his Nephew, EDWARD PHILIPS.

One volume 16mo, cloth, $1 50.

On August 14,

PETER SIMPLE.

By Captain MARRYAT.

Handsomely printed, from large clear type, on good paper, and of convenient size. With an illustrated cover.

One volume 12mo, 513 pages, large type, 40 cents.

This is the second issue of a People's Edition of Captain Marryat's delightful Novels. It will be followed at regular and rapid intervals by others of the series.

MIDSHIPMAN EASY,

being the first volume of the series, just published.

On the same date, the Cheap Edition of the

COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN MILTON.

To which is prefixed a Biography of the Author, by his Nephew, EDWARD PHILIPS.

Well printed, from large type, on good paper.

One volume 16mo, 50 cents.

Being the Third Volume of Appleton's Popular Fifty-Cent Edition of the Poets.

On the same date,

AN ATTIC PHILOSOPHER IN PARIS;

Or, A PEEP AT THE WORLD FROM A GARRET.

Being the Journal of a Happy Man.

A New Edition, in French.

One volume 12mo, half-bound, 75 cents.

On August 21, the Globe Edition of the

COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BURNS.

With Explanatory and Glossarial Notes, and a Life of the Author, by JAMES CURRIE, M.D.

Handsomely printed, from large clear type, on fine tinted paper.

One volume 16mo, cloth, price $1 50.

Volumes of this series already issued:

DANTE, TASSO, BUTLER, SCOTT, CAMPBELL, AND MILTON.

On the same date,

VOL. III. OF LIBRARY EDITION

OF THE

WORKS OF CHARLES DICKENS,

Complete in Six Volumes.

Illustrated with Original Designs by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK, JOHN LEECH, and H. K. BROWNE,

AND WITH AN

ELEGANT PORTRAIT ON STEEL OF THE AUTHOR.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

Pickwick Papers, Barnaby Rudge, Sketches by Boz.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

Nicholas Nickleby, Martin Chuzzlewit, American Notes.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME III.

Dombey and Son, Old Curiosity Shop, Hard Times.

Price, $1 75 per Volume, or $10 50 per Set.

On the same date,

THE PIRATE,

Being the 13th Volume of the Cheap Edition of

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS,

EACH VOLUME ILLUSTRATED.

Price 25 cents each.

To be completed in 25 Volumes.

On the same date,

FIGUIER'S NEW WORK,

THE INSECT WORLD,

Being a Popular Account of the Orders of Insects, together with a Description of the Habits and Economy of some of the most interesting Species. From the French of LOUIS FIGUIER.

Illustrated with Eleven fine full-page Engravings, and 553 beautifully-printed Woodcuts.

BY MM. E. BLANCHARD, DELAHAYE, AFTER RÉAMUR, ETC.

Handsomely printed, from large bold type, on fine heavy tinted paper.

One vol. 8vo, cloth, $6; half calf, extra, $8 50; full calf, extra, $10 50.

Already Published, by the same Author,

THE OCEAN WORLD:

A Descriptive History of the Sea and its Inhabitants. By LOUIS FIGUIER.

Illustrated with 427 Engravings,

Chiefly designed under the direction of M. Ch. Bévalet, from specimens in the Museums of Paris.

One vol. 8vo. Beautifully printed in large clear type, on fine paper. Price, cloth, $6; half calf, extra, $8 50; full calf, extra, $10 50.

THE WORLD BEFORE THE DELUGE.

BY LOUIS FIGUIER.

A NEW EDITION.

The Geological Portion carefully revised, and much Original Matter added. By HENRY W. BRISTOW, F.R.S., of the Geological Survey of Great Britain. Containing thirty-four full-page Illustrations of Extinct Animals and Ideal Landscapes of the Ancient World, designed by RIOU, and two hundred and two Figures of Animals, Plants, and other Fossil Remains and Restorations.

One vol. 8vo, 437 pages. Beautifully printed. Cloth, $6; half calf, extra, $8 50; full calf, extra, $10 50.

THE VEGETABLE WORLD.

Being a History of Plants, with their Botanical Descriptions and Peculiar Properties. By LOUIS FIGUIER.

Illustrated with four hundred and forty-six Engravings, interspersed through the text, and twenty-four full-page Illustrations.

One volume 8vo, cloth, $6; half calf, $8 50; full calf, extra, $10 50.

NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Jesus: An Answer to Strauss. By the late Dr. J. F. I. TAFEL, Librarian at Tübingen. Price, $1 50.

Letters to a Man of the World. From the French of J. F. E. LE BOYS DES GUAYS. Price, $1 50.

Deus-Homo (God-Man.) By THEOPHILUS PARSONS, LL.D. Price, $2 50.

The Authenticity of the Gospels. By A LAYMAN. Price, $1.

The Doctrine of Life. From the Latin of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. Price, 75 cents.

A Commentary on Matthew. By REV. WM. BRUCE, London. An Exposition of the Internal Sense. Price, $4.

Swedenborg, the Philosopher. By R. L. TAFEL, Ph.D. Price, $2 25.

Who was Swedenborg? By REV. O. P. HILLER, London. Price, 50 cents.

The Temple of Solomon. By REV. T. O PAINE. Plates. Price, $6.

The Growth of the Mind. By SAMPSON REED. Price, $1.

C. SCRIBNER & CO. NICHOLS & NOYES.
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO. CLAXTON, REMSEN & HAFFELFINGER.

TEACHERS

Interested in History, Mythology, Anglo-Saxon, Early English, Hebrew, French, German, Italian, and Spanish are invited to acquaint us with their specialties and send for our catalogue before selecting text-books for the approaching season. Our principal publications in French, German, and Saxon are in use at YALE, HARVARD, WASHINGTON COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, and other leading institutions.

LEOPOLDT & HOLT,

451 Broome Street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 164. THURSDAY, AUGUST 20, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 141
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Next Step in Reconstruction .... 144
The Probable Solution of the Greenback Controversy ..... 145
Thaddeus Stevens ..... 145
French Canada ..... 146
England ..... 148
CORRESPONDENCE:
The South and Democratic Success .. 149
NOTES: Literary ..... 149
Mr. Bronson Alcott's Essays ..... 151
Chapman's Travels in South Africa .... 153
Uhlhorn's Discourses. — Old Deccan Days ..... 154
The Opium Habit. — A Handbook of Gymnastics and Athletics. — The Lost Cause Regained ..... 155
Hannah. — Folly as it Flies. — Books of the Week ..... 156
FINE ARTS:
Portraits of Grant ..... 156

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.
The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

IT is hard to say whether it would be better or worse for the Republicans to carry Maine in the September election by the usual majority. It is of considerable importance that Pennsylvania should be carried in October, and it is not to be denied that Pennsylvania is to-day a doubtful State. On the one hand, a decided Republican gain in Maine would make some needed Republican votes in Pennsylvania. On the other hand, a loss of some hundreds would set the Republicans of that State hard at work, and it is doubtless apathy, springing from confidence in the result, which is at present hurting their campaign. Nearly as bad a thing as a heavy Republican loss in Maine would be an average majority tending to confirm the Pennsylvanians in their sluggishness. In the two other great States of the middle tier which hold elections on the same day with Pennsylvania—Ohio and Indiana, namely—the prospect is decidedly better, reliable accounts from the latter State in particular making it seem sure that Mr. Hendricks is to be beaten as Governor, and that he will not get the legislature he wants to send him again to the Senate. Of course, if elected with a favorable legislature, he would not retain the governorship. Ohio is confidently claimed by the Democrats, but with little or no reason, and may be set down as certain to go for the Republicans. As to another point in the Fall campaign which is of general interest—the question whether or not the Massachusetts Republicans of the Fifth District will feel themselves strong enough to punish General Butler as the better sort of them wish—the prospect is apparently not favorable. General Butler, with what almost seems like a display of a military quality, when he removed from Lowell, hunting office, shrewdly selected out of all the Massachusetts Districts the one where the party happens to be the weakest in able men. Dr. Loring, an old fellow-democrat of Butler's—who may be described as a miniature copy of the old politicians of national reputation who made politics a trade, and a mean one, for the thirty years before the war, and who only became a Republican, if we are not mistaken, in 1864—is perhaps the most influential Republican in the District. With him it is rumored that Butler has made arrangements whereby Loring is to be governor and Butler is to keep his seat in the House. The Tribune's correspondents begin, we see, to speak of the fondness with which the "young and active Republicans" regard Loring, and of the certainty that Butler, whom the Commonwealth praises, will be triumphantly nominated and re-elected. It will, in fact, be necessary to beat him in caucus, we fear, if he is to be beaten at all. The thing has evidently been all arranged, and anybody who enjoys seeing the internal workings of the political machine will do well to read the papers mentioned above.

---

One of the latest reports about the campaign is that Mr. Seymour, who a month ago was very despondent, is now quite confident of his election, and that there prevails a similar buoyancy of spirit at the Manhattan Club. We suspect, however, that there is little foundation for these pleasing anticipations to be found outside this city and Brooklyn, where the Republican prospects are certainly of the bluest—most of the old workers, being in despair, looking on with folded arms. In the West the Republican enthusiasm seems to be slowly boiling up; in the East there is a little too much confidence, and occasionally a rather alarming tendency to apathy. There is little of the usual bidding for votes. The Fenians have as yet had no offer made them. The discussion, as far as the Republicans are concerned, runs generally on the real points at issue. The success of the La Crosse Democrat is, on the other hand, a terrible indication of the amount of ignorance and lewdness which is still to be found in the Democratic ranks. The greenback controversy has during the week received a contribution from Vallandigham, who has indulged in a good deal of characteristic looseness and sophistry about it. Whether he "lies" and is a "villain," we are unable to say, but the New York Tribune makes both charges against him.

---

Mr. Evarts, contrary to the hopes of his enemies, and apparently to the chagrin of the ultra-Radicals, and certainly to Mr. Johnson's, has sent in an opinion deciding Mr. Rollins's resignation to be conditional, and therefore invalid, and that he is consequently still the lawful incumbent of the office. Mr. Rollins's retention of his place is a great gain for the service, whatever the merits of his complaints against his superiors may be, for he is unquestionably a worse foe of the ring than anybody who would be likely to succeed him.

---

Mr. T. W. Conway may not be in intention one of the most mischievous of the new residents of the South, but he would do well, we think, to let somebody else draft school-bills for the State of Louisiana. He, being now the State Superintendent of Education, has formed a new law, which it is supposed will pass, but which certainly, if the Republican majority in the Legislature has any sense left, will be defeated. One of the sections provides for the election of a State Superintendent, who is to appoint all his deputies and is to decide, without appeal, all controversies or disputes arising under the law. "It also invests him with other extraordinary powers." Another section provides for the compulsory attendance at school of every child between the ages of eight and fourteen years. The funds for supporting the system are to be drawn from a poll-tax and a special tax of one-fourth of one per cent. on all taxable property in the State. There is little fault, perhaps, to be found with any of these provisions—impoverished as Louisiana is—except those which give so much power to the Superintendent and leave none at all to the Board. But the section that makes the association of white and black children in the school-room a necessary prerequisite to any child's getting an education of any sort is mere folly, and will only result in keeping Louisiana longer in ignorance and making her class-prejudices more and more bitter. The new bill shows Mr. Conway to be an excellent friend to himself, perhaps, but no friend to Louisiana or to the colored people.

---

The World has come to richly-deserved grief in the matter of Grant's cotton stealing. The Brothers Mack have made affidavit to the effect that, in 1862, Grant's father gave them a letter introducing them to his son, then in command in Mississippi, and asking him to show the firm special favors. Grant, of course, refused, and expressed surprise that his father should have made such a request, gave the Macks a permit—the same as that given to other traders—and dismissed them with the remark that he should be glad to hear of their success. There is another story, however, which has not as yet called out any affidavits, and the World might employ the same hand on it that has so long been kept so busy with Grant as a Cotton Thief. Once, not long after the corrupt bargain with the Macks had been made, and while the principal criminal of that affair was still in Mississippi, he and his staff paid a visit to the house of a Mrs. Cox. They directed her to prepare dinner for the party. Flattered by the presence of so distinguished a guest, the lady had her silver, which she had buried in the garden, dug up and put on the table in the General's honor. He stole a great part of it. Mrs. Grant and himself habitually use it in their house in Washington. The La Crosse Democrat is our authority for this story. As for the other candidates, not much is just now heard of their private life. Blair has reached a lower stage of drunkenness than we chronicled in our last week's paper. Once, when he was descending some river in a steamboat, he drank so hard that his friends were obliged to lay him out on the deck. One of them placed a lobster on his breast as he lay extended. When he awoke his terror was extreme. "Tremens!" says he; "my father always told me what it would come to." Most of the Republican stories, it is as well to note, either relate to the public life of the enemy, or are simple fun-making and chaff, as in the case of Blair's lobster. The Democrats, on the other hand, are disgracing journalism, and show very plainly that the South is once again open to journalistic enterprise and retains its old liking for scurrility and puerility.

---

The Brooklyn Union, which is usually a perspicacious paper, fell into a strange mistake last week in attributing the silence of the Nation about Thaddeus Stevens's death to our dislike of him. The real reason of our failure to mention him was the fact that the Nation was on the press when the news of his death came. We might, by straining a point, have announced that he was dead; but as the announcement would have reached our readers four days after the event, our making it would, in the present state of science, have been a sorry tribute to his memory. Let us take this opportunity of saying once more that our criticism of public men does not indicate personal hostility. It ought to be absurd for us to have to affirm this so often, but it seems that it is not. We do not conclude that a man whose political utterances we dislike is a bad man, and deserves, as a man, the hatred or contempt of good people. This kind of criticism is as common as it is ridiculous; but we beg the Brooklyn Union to take notice that nobody has reprobated it more strongly than we have. If John Howard were to appear on earth again, and maintain that a tax of two dollars a gallon could be collected on whiskey, or that you could keep inconvertible paper at par by penal legislation, we should at first modestly argue against him, and if he became obstreperous, moved the "previous question," called his opponents "copperheads" and "traitors," and we found that his labors in the prisons and his nursing the young lady in Crim Tartary were helping to spread his erroneous opinions on taxation and currency, we should use against him every honorable weapon within our reach, ridicule included; and we should, if he propounded his views nearly every day in the week, make a slighting reference to them as often as possible—that is to say, every Thursday morning. But if in the midst of all this, or after this, anybody should ask us what we thought of John Howard, we should speak of him in the highest terms within our reach, and should subscribe to a monument to him as freely as our means would permit.

---

The distinction we here make is, however, not one which many of Mr. Stevens's most ardent admirers recognize in their dealings with other public men. They first of all do what everybody has a right to do—fix on some measure or doctrine as essential to the national salvation—impeachment, for instance, or the bill making the agreement of two-thirds of the judges of the Supreme Court necessary to a decision. Concurrence with them on this point they then make an infallible test, not of a public man's learning, or clear-headedness, or sagacity, but of his moral worth, and, if he dissents, begin to denounce him, not simply as a blockhead or ignoramus, but as a villain. Trumbull and Fessenden were villains because they did not agree with the Tribune about impeachment; Evarts was a villain because he did not agree with the Independent touching the duties of counsel; he was a double-dyed villain because the Anti-Slavery Standard thought he was going to give an opinion agreeable to the President (which he did not) on the Rollins case, and so on. On this plan of dealing with public men—which we heartily detest and abhor—we, having the same right as the Tribune and the Independent to choose our test of righteousness, might have treated Mr. Stevens as a perjured monster, steeped in iniquity, enriched by bribes, and playing the hypocrite in his old age. We, however, confined ourselves to occasionally denouncing his political economy, and to doing what we could, within the limits of decent discussion, to diminish the influence of opinions that we thought mischievous. Nevertheless, hardly a week passes that we do not find somebody dissolved in tears by the wayside over the Nation's treatment of Thaddeus Stevens; and in nine cases out of ten we find he is a person who rather enjoyed seeing Mr. Grimes compared to a "sick hedgehog in a travelling menagerie," or was not at all shocked when he read that one of the foremost Republican lawyers in America is a base and dishonored man because he defended "the greatest criminal of the age" before the "High Court," etc.

---

The South Carolinian Legislature has passed a bill putting the negroes of the State on a footing of equality, as regards admission to steamboats, railroad cars, and hotels. There is, no doubt, reason in this, as regards public convenience. Nobody who chooses to set up as a common carrier has any right to select the persons whom he will carry, as long as they are well-behaved and pay their fare; but when we get to hotels, and look at the matter as "practical men," we find ourselves on delicate ground. There is probably no State in the Union in which whites, if left free to choose, would go to a hotel frequented by negroes. We are not now passing judgment on this matter—we are stating a fact. Now, it is not this fact itself that is regrettable, but the reason of it. A negro can get as good board and lodging in a house patronized only by persons of his own color as in a house patronized by whites; but as long as whites will not go to the same house with him, because they hate and despise him for his color, he suffers a real wrong and injustice. In seeking to remove this prejudice, the first thing to be done is not, it seems to us, to give the negro the right to force himself into every hostelry he finds open, no matter what may be the wishes of its inmates, because after he had got in, in this way, he and his race would not be better off, but worse—that is, more hated by the strongest portion of the population. The question for the legislature, therefore, is, not, How shall we get colored men into all taverns? but, How shall we abate the prejudice which now keeps them out of them? At the same time, it must be admitted that legislation may be necessary to prevent cases of real hardship, such as the denial of lodging to colored travellers in places in which there is only one inn, or in inns usually open to persons of color. But all legislation designed to promote even limited social equality is delicate work, and, if not very skilfully and cautiously done, may make even political equality impossible. Moreover, an act of this kind can never be enforced, and will, therefore, simply serve as an irritant for the whites. One negro might make his way into the Charleston Hotel, but if he did, he would have to be queerly constituted to find himself comfortable there; and the mass of negroes having their business to attend to, would sooner go to bed in hotels of their own, than spend their evening hours in painful contentions with an irate landlord.

---

The attack on Mr. Evarts, to which we have referred, in the Anti-Slavery Standard, is a letter from Mr. Charles E. Moss, from Washington, on the 3d inst., announcing that "everybody knew" that Mr. Evarts's opinion would decide that Mr. Rollins had resigned, because everybody knew "that his master desired such an opinion, and would deprive him of his bread and butter should it be refused;" and the writer adds gracefully, and with the usual omniscience of the set to which he belongs, that Mr. Evarts "was selected for the Attorney-Generalship as the man above all others capable of making a respectable work of infamy." Mr. Evarts's opinion, however, has been given in Mr. Rollins's favor, and we shall now wait with some interest to see how Mr. Charles E. Moss and the Anti-Slavery Standard will treat it. We hold there are few better tests of a man's moral condition than his manner of dealing with charges made by himself, injurious to the character, or peace, or comfort of a fellow-man, and proved to be untrue; and we are bound to say that although vituperation is to the school of politicians to which Mr. Moss belongs what the camel is to the Bedouin, the reindeer to the Laplander, or fat to the Esquimaux, we have never known a case, though we have watched them carefully for some time, in which any one of them has retracted or apologized, either voluntarily or on demand, or has ever returned a civil answer even to the remonstrances of his victims. If Mr. Moss does it in this instance, it will be a flagrant departure from the customs of his tribe. What makes its customs all the more repulsive is that it professes to act in a peculiar degree by the pure law of right, and to value "truth" and "justice" more than the common run of men value them.

---

Talk of the establishment of a United States protectorate for Mexico begins again to be heard—including, of course, a loan of money to Juarez and a "rectification" of our southern frontier. This is tantamount to an admission that Juarez is not fully master of the situation, and that what Mexico wanted was not, after all, simply to be let alone by foreigners. If Mexico cannot get on of herself, what becomes of M. Romero's assertion, at the banquet given him here before his departure, of the suitability of popular government for all races in all places and circumstances and degrees of culture? We feared at the time that Mexico would yet afford a striking illustration of the worthlessness of such generalizations, and the present talk of its friends seems to indicate that we shall not have long to wait for it.

---

Governor Geary's address to the people of Pennsylvania in honor of Thaddeus Stevens's memory, though good in the main, was marred by exaggerations, some of which we do not well know how to characterize, and on such an occasion it was well-nigh inexcusable. He said the State was indebted to Mr. Stevens for "its magnificent system of free schools, by which the children of the poor are enabled to reach a degree of cultivation beyond which the wealthiest and most favored of other lands cannot go." Now, either Mr. Geary does not know to what degree of cultivation a wealthy and studious German, or Frenchman, or Englishman can attain, in which case he should not have made the comparison; or he does know, in which case he has made an assertion about the common schools of Pennsylvania which he is aware is ridiculously untrue. The fact is that the common schools of Pennsylvania are not so good as those of many of her Northern neighbors, and so far from affording a young person the means of surpassing the ablest students of foreign universities, they do not afford him the means of equalling an ordinarily successful pupil of the common schools of New York or Ohio; but this, of course, in no way lessens the credit due to Thaddeus Stevens.

---

The most important piece of news from England is that of the disturbances in Ireland, in which a strong body of police protecting a landlord in serving notices of ejectment was repulsed by the mob and the landlord killed. The affair looks serious, not because the mob cannot be and will not be easily crushed, but because the partial success of this outbreak is likely to lead to others, and because a general and united movement against the present land tenures would render their maintenance impossible. The tithes were put an end to by a process which is perfectly applicable to rents and tenancy-at-will—the general refusal of the population to pay them, accompanied by a general refusal to buy goods distrained for non-payment, and the following of the officers of the law by great hooting, howling crowds of "evil-disposed persons." There is a point up to which resistance of this sort on the part of the Irish to the existing land-laws would have the sympathy of English liberals, and to that point it might be good policy to carry it; but if the malcontents have any person or persons amongst them capable of directing such a movement, they are luckier than they have ever been heretofore. There is something practical about this which would make it odious to the Fenian leaders.

---

The question of securing married women the possession of their own property, under a general law, as in many of the States of the Union, without any formal "settlement," is undergoing vigorous discussion in England, apropos of a bill introduced by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, a gentleman who travelled in this country three years ago. American testimony as to the working of the change has been freely used in the controversy; but the Pall Mall Gazette, which is the principal defender of the existing régime, meets this testimony by the insinuation that the standard by which Americans judge of the goodness of wives is different from, and lower than, the one in use in England, and that the results of the change in America, though considered good by Americans, would be thought bad, or only middling, by Englishmen. One point made by the opponents of the bill is, that the wife would, in a large number of cases—we are not quite sure that they do not say in the majority of cases—refuse to contribute to the support of the family, and spend her money on herself, while leaving the husband responsible for her debts. It is a pity that no statistics on this point could be collected in this country; the result would, we feel sure, be strongly disappointing to the Pall Mall Gazette. In fact, most of the English arguments against the change are based on the Hobbes doctrine, that selfishness in its lowest form is the great regulator of the social relations, and that, freedom of choice being given, men and women will, in the majority of cases, follow the lead of their worst instincts. If women who have money were generally disposed to use it as the Gazette fears they will, women without money would be unfit for marriage, and society would go to pieces. Unmitigated selfishness does not need the control of a fortune to display itself.

---

The queerest news of the day now always comes from France—much of it reading not unlike a chapter from Tacitus. For instance, what is there in the "Annals"—taking into account the difference in civilization between Imperial France and Imperial Rome—odder than this last story? M. Billault was once an Orleanist, then a Republican, and then an Imperialist, having long served the present Emperor in the Corps Législatif as no other man had ever served him, as Minister of State. M. Billault, during his ministership, quarrelled with an old friend of his democratic days, and immediately after the quarrel issued his warrant and had him locked up in an asylum as a dangerous lunatic, and here the unfortunate man remained till M. Billault's death, when he was unconditionally released. The affair was mentioned the other day in the Chamber, and then M. Rochefort took it up in his funny little weekly, the Lanterne, and, of course, made a piece of very unpleasant reading out of it for the Government. The minister then sent him an official explanation, and required him to publish it in his paper according to law; but the explanation was forty pages long, and the Lanterne only contained sixty. This, M. Rochefort said, amounted to confiscation, and refused to publish it, and he has been prosecuted for refusing, and condemned to a year's imprisonment and a fine of $2,000. All this occurs, too, in the France which could not bear Charles X., or even Louis Philippe, and looks back on the lettres de cachet as one of the horrors of the past.

---

Recent elections in Würtemberg show that the unification movement is making progress in South Germany. The national party has elected ten members of the chamber, in spite of the active hostility of the Government, which frankly acknowledges itself beaten, and announces that the aim of its policy is to make closer the union between North and South Germany. Austria in the meantime has been making a vigorous effort to rouse some German feeling in her own behalf, by having a great Schützenfest at Vienna; but, on the other hand, the real power passes more and more into the hands of the Hungarians and Croats, and the more it does, the more the Germans of the old Duchy are likely to feel their separation from the main body. The command of the Hungarian contingent of the army is henceforward to be exclusively in the hands of Hungarian officers. Prussia is gradually getting into a snarl with Italy, apropos of the La Marmora revelations about the Prussian plan of campaign, and the tone of the Prussian press is not likely to heal the breach. Prussia has many virtues, but a conciliatory demeanor is not one of them; and the Italians, in the character of a worsted ally and protégé, will probably retain, when all is over, a most unsavory recollection of the effect of Geist on manners.

THE NEXT STEP IN RECONSTRUCTION.

THERE is, of course, a good deal of allowance to be made in every canvass for buncombe and exaggeration in estimating the amount of weight which ought to be attached to campaign speeches; and although Southern orators could not complain if we took literally all they are just now saying, probably very few people do take it literally. It is most likely that neither Blair, Wade Hampton, nor Forrest feels nearly as valorous or as bloodthirsty as he talks. If they did, they would not only belie all our past experience of Southern speeches, but of all campaign speeches. If campaign orators really went through all the emotions they describe themselves as going through, few of them would ever witness the Presidential election. There are limits to human endurance; and if speakers usually found—like General Battle, the other day, at Mobile—that "no language could express the emotions that swelled their bosoms," there would be a grave beside every stump. But there is little doubt that, though Southern politicians do not mean as much mischief as their words, taken literally, would indicate, they mean a good deal of mischief. There is good reason for believing that they do not intend to be very scrupulous about the use of intimidation as a means of influencing the coming election. They are busy getting up a "Conservative party" amongst the negroes by moral suasion, and any negro who is convinced by their arguments that the Southern planters are his best friends, they appear to be receiving into their ranks with a good deal of cordiality. But then, it would be a mistake to suppose that they give up as hopeless cases those negroes who are not convinced by their arguments. For them they are providing a simple and efficient system of social persecution, by which, in some parts of the country at least, any negro who is not armed with a card, issued by a white committee, testifying to his "soundness," will not receive employment in any capacity. But there will, of course, be a large number of cases in which both the moral suasion and the denial of employment will prove ineffectual; and the great question of Southern politics now is, how will these and the white Unionists—"the carpet-baggers" and "scallawags"—be dealt with on the first Tuesday in November next? We suspect roughly. We doubt very much whether, in a large number of districts in the South, voting the Radical ticket at the polls will not be a service of much difficulty and great personal danger.

Now, this ought not to be. If all we have heard during the last year or two of the "regeneration" of the Southern States through the adoption of the new constitutions and the readmission of their members to Congress has been true, there ought to be no more ground for anxiety about the elections in Georgia and Alabama than about the elections in New York or Connecticut. But it was not true, or true only in a Pickwickian sense. Southern society remains in the States which are in the Union exactly what it is in the States which are out of the Union. The loyal portion of the population are represented in Congress, which is all very well so far as it goes; but the disloyal portion is no smaller, and no less fierce and bitter than it has ever been. What we have gained by reconstruction is, that the government of the restored State has been handed back to those of its own people who are fit to be trusted with it, and that the negroes are being familiarized with the duties of political life. But the tie which binds the State to the Union has not been really strengthened, nor have the normal guarantees of social order. No shifting of the power from one hand to another, no distribution of the franchise, no administration of oaths, will do this. Nothing will do it but the growth of new habits on the part of the people. A State is made peaceful and prosperous, not by the appearance of a certain number of gentlemen in black broadcloth in certain seats in the House and Senate, and the accession of Jones, in place of Brown, to the governorship or shrievalty, but by the acquisition by the mass of the people of certain ways of looking at life, and their adoption of certain standards of propriety for the regulation of their conduct. If the mass of men in South Carolina had the same notions of the objects of living, and of the difference between vice and virtue, comfort and discomfort, as the mass of men in Massachusetts, even though their views about the rebellion were substantially what they are now, you might safely let them send Hampton and Forrest, or anybody else they pleased, to Congress, and let everybody vote without any test oath or other restriction. A man might approve of the rebellion most heartily, but if he had a sincere respect for the law, or, at all events, a hearty horror for violence and outrage, he would prove a very good citizen, and discussion might fairly be relied on to cure his political heresies. But the mass of men in most Southern States are not in this condition, or in any thing like it, and therefore it is that what we call "reconstruction"—that is, the restoration of civil government in the Southern States, and the reappearance of their members in Congress—instead of being the "regeneration" of Southern society, is only one of the various agencies by which that regeneration is to be effected.

The foremost amongst them, we say still, as we have frequently said during the past two years, and we say it now more confidently than we have ever said it before, are time and order. What does most to make the spectacle of the political equality of the negroes odious to Southerners is what made the spectacle of negro freedom odious to them—want of familiarity with it. What makes it so hard for them to have negroes vote is their never having seen them vote. What makes it so hard for them to keep their knives out of negro ribs, and their pistols away from negro heads, is the fact that outrages on colored people, or, in fact, on any people, are not associated in their minds, as they are in the minds of the members of more civi lized communities, with legal punishment. It is, therefore, in the highest degree important—no matter who represents the South in Congress—that the State governments should be in the hands of persons who will use their powers to give security to all classes, and that there should be an administration at Washington which may be counted on to uphold these governments in case of necessity. Put Seymour and Blair in power, and the process of undoing at the South at once begins; the rule of the strong hand is restored, and we are just as far from real reconstruction as ever—in fact, farther than ever—for the beneficent effects of the last three years of military rule would be lost. The idea of respect for the law, as something higher and stronger than the feelings of the local mob, which has been slowly taking root in the Southern mind, would be torn up and cast out, and we should be worse off than ever. To govern the South militarily so long is the best thing that the Republican party has done next to emancipation, and if it could, with a due regard to the interests of the whole country, which we admit it cannot, keep it under military rule for four years more, it would be rendering the South the highest service that it can receive through any human agency. Unless the machinery of government the party has set up there, however, can be kept going for some years longer—unless, in short, the South can be governed by law, and not, as in times past, by the passions and prejudices of the most passionate and most prejudiced of the most turbulent community in the world, reconstruction will prove a complete farce. The South of 1869 will be the South of 1860, minus so many men killed, so much property destroyed, and the destruction of legal slavery.

The danger of a Democratic triumph, too, does not lie in the fact that Seymour is this kind of man, or Blair that kind of man, but that the party which elects them has ceased to be a party of progress or reform. This has been often said of it of late; but it is usually said, and most loudly said, with special reference simply to its opposition to the removal of negro disabilities, and the charge therefore makes less impression on the public mind than it ought. The fact is that it is the enemy of all useful changes or ameliorations in the government. Judicial purity, administrative efficiency, popular education, the sense of corporate honor, the strict administration of justice, and, in fact, all restraints on the evil tendencies of society, in whatever direction, have no worse enemy. In fact, the only principle it can be said to hold firmly and preach persistently is that liberty is not a means but an end, and that as long as a man can do what he pleases, what it pleases him to do is of little or no consequence—a doctrine as hostile to social and political progress as any that ever was preached. It is in this fact, inded, that the gravity of the present crisis lies. Usually, an opposition has the other half of a political and social truth in its possession, and while pursuing the same great ends as the party in power, advocates the use of different agencies, and has at its head men who, whether right-headed or wrong-headed, are sincerely wedded to ideas, and stand as high morally as their opponents. The peculi-arity of the Democratic party is—and the history of the last seven years justifies us in saying this—that its sole principle is hostility to the men in power, so that if the Republicans hit on a plan of adding twenty healthy, happy years to human life, the Democrats would devote themselves to persuading the public that the boon, coming from such hands, was worthless. There is probably nothing in political history equal to the speeches of the Brookses, Vallandighams, and Seymours, since 1861, for emptiness of everything but negation and invective; and the readiness the Democratic members of the House invariably show to vote en masse with any Republican, on any subject, who sets himself up in opposition to the rest of his party, is a striking illustration of their childishness and the imbecility of their tactics. Their accession to office, therefore, for the government of any community, would be a great misfortune—much more for a community in so disturbed and critical condition as this.

THE PROBABLE SOLUTION OF THE GREENBACK CONTROVERSY.

While the country is agitated with the discussion of "the greenback question," meaning thereby the question of repudiation, no one appears to notice the very important fact that another "greenback question," vitally affecting this controversy, and bearing directly upon the business interests of the whole country, is now under consideration in the highest court of the land, and that within a short time we may hear of a judicial decision which will compel the Pendletons and Butlers to take their choice between the full payment and the total repudiation of the public debt. Yet this fact is well known; and, although the judges have said little or nothing, there is very little doubt among those who know their habit of mind as to what their decision will be. It is the firm conviction of every one who has any means of foreseeing the result, that the Supreme Court will declare the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional.

The reasons for such an expectation are obvious to any one even slightly familiar with law and politics. No judge of a State Court, adhering to the Democratic party, has acknowledged the validity of the Act, while several prominent Republican judges have denied it. It is manifest from the written opinions of those judges who affirmed the constitutionality of the statute, that they did so under the pressure of a supposed necessity, and that they found great difficulty in reaching that conclusion. The period of necessity has passed. The real interest of the country plainly demands a different decision, and in so far as the judges may be affected by feeling, it is more likely to lead them to overthrow the statute than to imbue them with a desire to maintain it. There are eight judges, four of whom are unquestionably allied to the Democratic party, and two others are understood to have leaned toward it for some time past. We think there can be no doubt that Messrs. Nelson, Grier, Clifford, and Field believe the Legal Tender Act to be invalid; and it was a matter of common rumor at Washington last spring that Chief-Justice Chase was disposed to take the same view. We think that Judge Davis will; and we should not be surprised if the court were unanimous.

It is easy to see that such a decision would scatter to the winds all the ingenious schemes that have been devised for pretending to pay the public debt without really paying any of it. As Congress is not restrained from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, the legal tender clause of the Act of 1862, if declared unconstitutional at all, must be held void as to future contracts as well as in respect to past ones. It cannot fall on account of its retrospective operation, and must therefore fall as a whole. It follows that the holders of the five-twenties, and, in fact, of every species of claim against the Government, would have an absolute legal right to payment in gold. The holders of greenbacks and other obligations of the Government not bearing interest would, of course, have no means of enforcing their claims at once; but the holders of interest-bearing bonds would have such a plain right to the payment of interest until the Government was ready to pay the principal in gold, that their claims could not be evaded without unequivocal, undisguised repudiation. Honest men would then get face to face with political Jeremy Diddlers; and we should have no more palliation of fraud by reference to "the letter of the law."

But there is another result certain to follow this judgment, and not so agreeable to contemplate. The decision which we predict will involve a forced and sudden return to specie payments among private citizens. The injustice which was suffered by creditors in 1862 and 1863, when debts contracted in gold were paid off in depreciated paper, will now be inflicted upon debtors, who must pay in gold debts contracted in paper. In the majority of cases, such payment will not be exacted, because paper will continue to constitute the actual currency, and gold will be paid only upon legal compulsion; but debts secured by good mortgages will be largely collected in gold, unless the courts feel at liberty to go behind the technical word "money," and inquire what the parties really meant when the bond was drawn. In any event, the decision which we anticipate must seriously unsettle business for a time, and produce some hardship; yet we believe that its ultimate benefits will far outweigh its temporary disadvantages. The existing system is demoralizing the nation; and scarcely any price is too dear to pay for the sake of getting back to solid bottom. Congress will, we fear, never dare to return to a specie basis; and our only hope is in the severe remedy of a judicial decision.

The Senate, foreseeing this event, twice passed a bill allowing contracts to be made for payment in gold; but the House of Representatives, with its usual shortsightedness, refused to concur. The passage of such a measure would have enabled the community to anticipate and avoid the evil results of a sudden return to specie payments. As matters stand, it is difficult, but not quite impossible to do so. The courts are more disposed now than they were during the war to enforce specie contracts; and with a little care such contracts may be drawn so as to protect all parties. We should advise all who have large sums to pay after next winter, and who expect to pay in full, to consider well the form of their obligation, and either to secure the right of paying in greenbacks or to agree to pay in gold of specified weight and fineness the equivalent of what they have received. Nevertheless, it must be distinctly understood that all our warning is founded upon surmise, and that no one must blame us if our predictions are not fulfilled. The Legal Tender Act may be fully sustained. Every one must forecast for himself. But our belief and expectation are as we have set forth, and in calling the attention of the public to the possibilities of the case, we have done all our duty.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. Stevens cannot be said to have so associated himself with any public measure or series of measures as to make it a memorial of him personally and peculiarly, except the school system of Pennsylvania. He was not, strictly speaking, the founder of this; but he did what was, perhaps, harder than founding it—he saved it from the attacks of the friends of ignorance, and made it the means of raising Pennsylvania from darkness into light, and of furnishing her material industry with the only sure basis, that of popular intelligence. This alone, of course, gave him a fair title not only to fame, but to the gratitude of posterity, but it would hardly have sufficed to make him much known outside the boundaries of his own State. Coupled with his personal popularity, however—which his habit of living in public and the extraordinary kindliness of his nature made unusually great—it enabled him to enter Congress with an amount of hearty confidence from his constituency such as few representatives ever enjoy. This confidence he never lost, and it made his re-election so sure that he became one of the oldest and most experienced members of the House, and its readiest and shrewdest tactician. Other constituencies might well learn a valuable lesson from the course pursued by his—the lesson that, when they have got a good man to represent them in Congress, the very best thing they can do is to keep him, and that in keeping him they not only increase his value to the country, but increase their own influence on national affairs.

His earlier Congressional record appears to have been simply that of a hard worker in committee-rooms. His attention, like that of all other politicians, statesmen, or philanthropists, was absorbed in the slavery question as the great, and, in fact, the only, question of the day, and to the agitation of this he brought almost unequalled ardor and enthusiasm, a shrewd wit and bitter tongue, such as few of the other anti-slavery men possessed. Moreover, he had the great virtue of thinking more of his subject than of himself. No public man was less of an egotist. His personality was completely swallowed up in his convictions, and about the nature of these he never left the slightest room for doubt. There were few men of his day to whom the colored race owed more—few men, we might almost say, to whom the poor and needy owed more. His usefulness continued unabated through the war. It reached its highest point, perhaps, in the second year of the war. What was wanted then was men who did not doubt or hesitate, and to whom the issue was certain—not through a calculation of the material chances of the struggle, but through moral faith—and Mr. Stevens was one of these. He was one of the first to perceive the legal effect of the blockade of the Southern ports. He was not for one moment deceived into supposing that it could be upheld as a measure of municipal police. He held that it was a virtual concession of belligerent rights, and from this concession he extracted the inference that the Southerners were henceforward alien enemies, entitled to whatever rights they could make good at the point of the sword, and to nothing more. In this way he cleared the ground for the curious experiments in reconstructive legislation which he afterwards brought to the notice of Congress, and for the success of which, of course, freedom from constitutional restrictions was absolutely necessary. He urged Mr. Lincoln into the issue of the emancipation proclamation under this theory, and pushed forward every war measure with extraordinary vigor and tenacity, and with the authority of long parliamentary experience, of a perfect mastery of parliamentary tactics, and of withering scorn for everybody who had the misfortune to differ with him.

The anti-slavery agitation was, however, essentially a destructive agitation. It had in view the breaking down of old prejudices, of well-established social and political theories, and of legislation created for the support of them. The business of the agitator was to keep the hammer constantly going, and the bump of reverence compressed. In this kind of work Mr. Stevens was a master, but the minute the burden of reconstruction, or of working the complicated machinery of government, was imposed on him, he failed utterly. The first symptom of his incompetency in this direction was afforded by his famous bill attempting to make greenbacks equal in value to gold by making it penal to buy or sell gold at a premium. To say that this showed simply ignorance of political economy does not tell the whole truth. The laws of political economy are in large part the laws of human nature, and ignorance of them is a sign that a man has not considered, as every legislator is bound to do, the nature of the motives by which the mass of men are guided in the ordinary transactions of life, and consequently, the extent to which the force of these motives can be increased or diminished by legislation. His scheme, "mild confiscation," by which he proposed to pay off the national debt and provide farms for the negroes, displayed the same mental defects; and foremost among these was a total want of imagination, the absence or presence of which often makes all the difference between a lawyer or statistician and a statesman. No man is fit to conceive legislation who has not the power of putting himself in the position of those for whom he legislates, and of following out his measures to their remote consequences. Of this Mr. Stevens was apparently completely incapable. His defence of his gold bill made plain, too, his inability to digest history, and he rarely showed in his speeches much sign of intelligent reading of it. This was curiously illustrated in a conversation with him reported in the Tribune of August 14, where he discovers a parallel between Charles I. and Andrew Johnson, and evidently thinks lessons for the guidance of the Fortieth Congress may be found in the history of the Long Parliament, overlooking altogether the essential fact of Charles's case—that he was irremovable except by death. Had he been, as Johnson was, removable by the popular vote at the end of two years, he would undoubtedly never have been tried, and the Long Parliament would not have furnished the shadow of a precedent to the Congress which impeached Johnson.

Upon reconstruction Mr. Stevens's influence was in many respects very unfavorable. He did good service in pushing Congress to the position which it finally took up, but his two theories of conquest and of the omnipotence of legislation over human conduct, combined with his natural restlessness, led him into constant efforts to overdo, and to pile bill on bill, and resolution on resolution, thus shaking the confidence of the South in the good faith of Congress, and the confidence of the North in its sagacity. His position, too, as Chairman of the Committee on Reconstruction gave him an amount of control over legislation which his failing health, as well as his natural defects, made very unfortunate. The crisis was so serious that it was undoubtedly the duty of his political friends to have formally put him aside. The effect even of his nominal leadership on the public mind was prejudicial to the party and to the country, and it was made more so by the theory on which most of the party papers acted, that his past services and his high personal character entitled his political opinions and acts to exemption from criticism. There could not have been a more mischievous mistake. Whenever the greatness of a man's past increases the weight of his authority, the duty of withstanding him face to face, when his aberrations from sound principles become glaring, is doubly imperative. Of his share in the impeachment business we have said so much recently, that we shall say nothing now. For whatever was reprehensible in his course then, the party was more to blame than he. If the stories some members of it told of his mental and bodily condition were true, and their estimate of the importance of the process was a just one, their putting him among the managers, and "crowding round" the clerk's desk to listen to lectures from him on the law and ethics of the matter, was a most objectionable mode of testifying their respect for him.

His greatest value, after all, lay in his character as a man, and his eminence in that character nobody can deny. A manlier man never sat in the House. He had what Congressmen so often want—a conscience of his own, opinions of his own, and a will of his own, and he never flinched from the duty of asserting them. When one sees the eagerness of hosts of his colleagues to repudiate their own individuality, their readiness to take up the last popular cry, the neutral tint of all that they say and do, and the utter want of basis either in their mind or temperament for much of their political course, one's admiration for Stevens, who never was cowed, and never retreated, and never considered what was "safe," can hardly help being hearty. No political puppet or intriguer could look at him without envy, and nobody who believes as we do, that the dignity, force, and independence of individual character are of more importance to the state than even wisdom in legislation, can deny that he deserved well of his country and of his age. Any young politician who proposes to get on in the world by being a cowardly sneak, as thousands of young politicians do, cannot help profiting by the study of his life. He will see by it that, even under the shadow of an irresistible popular will, the road to the highest success lies through courage and self-assertion, and not through base compliance. The tenderness, too, with which the old man's heart overflowed, even in the last evil hours of his long career, for all whom kinship, sorrow, or suffering gave a claim on his sympathy or pity, must, as long as his memory lives, secure for him the indulgence which has been solemnly promised to those who have loved much.

FRENCH CANADA.

II.

Although there has been until now no system of popular education amongst the French Canadians, and though the priests have done little or nothing to make up for the want of it, and although the feudal tenures and feudal organization of society may be said to have held their own down to 1837, colonial life, with its usual concomitants of good food, good clothing, security, and the absence of class feeling, and exemption in a great degree from the blighting influence of feudal traditions, have raised the bulk of the people, both physically and morally, far above the peasantry of France. The French race in the New World certainly weighs more and stands higher in its stockings than the French race in the Old World, though of course the question might be raised whether this was not due rather to the fact that the original settlers were picked men than to the influence of the new soil and climate on their descendants, or whether Frenchmen, as has been often asserted, have not dwindled greatly in size under the influence of the wars of Louis XIV. and of the first Napoleon. The famines of the earlier years of the eighteenth century, and the relegation, during the earlier years of this one, of the task of perpetuating the population to the halt, the lame, and the blind, owing to the insatiate demands of the army on the able-bodied, no doubt have done much to lower the French stature, and something, no doubt, also to mar the regularity of French features. At all events, their Canadian cousins are now vastly better-looking men and women. One who is at all familiar with the appearance of the French peasantry at home, or even with the appearance of the French army, which contains the flower of the peasantry, cannot go very far along the Lower St. Lawrence without asking himself whether the good-sized people with the well-cut faces whom he meets are really Frenchmen and Frenchwomen.

If what we were told be true, they are, however, not only bigger and handsomer than their cousins, but better, more intelligent, and more moral. In spite of their piety, they do not keep up the supply of priests needed even for their own education—a circumstance for which one gentleman accounted to us by the startling assertion that celibacy was more repugnant to them than to Frenchmen. Consequently, drafts have from time to time to be made on the French clergy, but the French priests are rarely put in charge of country parishes. They are kept for service in the large towns, and in schools and colleges, nearly every case in which the experiment has been made of sending them out amongst the peasantry having proved a total failure. In the first place, their manners are found by the country folk intolerable. Priest-ridden and seigneur-ridden though he has been, the free air of the wilderness has given the Canadian a dignity and self-respect in which the French peasant, in spite of the Revolution, is still wanting. The former will not, in short, allow the priest to treat him as a clodhopper and ignoramus. Moreover, the preaching of the French priests has proved as offensive as their pastoral demeanor. In country parishes in France, they communicate moral instruction from the pulpit, and descend into the particulars of immorality with startling plainness and simplicity. In the few cases in which they have been permitted to try this style of instruction on the Canadians, it created such an uproar that they had to be recalled, and the country curés are now almost invariably natives. They are generally well-educated, and often polished men; they still levy tithes by law, the rights and privileges of the Catholic Church having been reserved by the treaty of cession; are consequently well paid, keep a good table, are well housed, and if they suffer from want of society, have, per contra, the satisfaction which results from being the chief men of a comfortable and very religious community.

Some idea of the sums they extract from their flocks for religious purposes may be formed from the size and costliness of the churches, which are generally, judged by the American standard, amazingly out of proportion to the means and numbers of the worshippers. In New England, one rarely finds, out of the large towns, churches of half the size, or costing half as much, as one is almost sure to meet with in the smallest Canadian village. We found in perhaps the poorest parish in the province, which for eight months of the year has no means of communication with the civilized world without a four days' journey through the wilderness, a lofty stone church, 150 feet long by 75 broad, with a large vestry in the rear. The number of families which can reach it in winter, in fine weather, does not, we were assured, exceed 300. The only country church in New England, in fact, which we have happened to see, which can compare in size, cost, and material to great numbers of country churches in Canada, is that at Greenwich, Connecticut.

One can, of course, readily give a dozen reasons why Americans and Englishmen continue to speak the same language in much the same way, though it is over two centuries since they separated. Their literary and religious and commercial intercourse would alone have prevented any very serious divergence from the common standard, even if the intellectual activity of the colonists and their attention to literature and oratory, at least in the Northern States, had not been as great as it has been. But that Canadians and Frenchmen should speak the same language in much the same way, after two centuries of separation, one can hardly help regarding with surprise, considering how small the amount of intercourse which was at any time carried on between them, how completely it has ceased since the fall of Quebec, and how small and how sluggish the educated class in Lower Canada has always been. And yet the Canadian peasantry—for peasantry they are—speak not only very good French, but they all speak the same French. The French priests, when they come out, are astonished to find that, wherever they go, they never come upon a trace of patois. The original settlers were mainly Normans and Bretons; but no trace of mixed origin is to be discovered in the language of their descendants. The accent of the country people is, of course, rude, and they use plenty of words unknown to Frenchmen, called into existence by the wants of colonial life; but there is probably no part of France in which a foreigner will find so little difficulty in understanding and in making himself understood by the farmers as in Canada. Of intonation it hardly becomes a foreigner to judge; but we received abundance of good testimony to the effect that though Canadian speaking was much more monotonous than that of Frenchmen, the cadences were the same in character, though generally less marked. Some ways of using the voice with which one becomes very familiar in France, but which are impossible to describe on paper, produce a strange and almost startling effect when heard in a Canadian village or wood-path. We were told by a young man who had studied in Paris that he surprised and delighted some of the lovers of the older French poesy in that city by producing and singing as common village songs, with which he had been familiar from childhood, songs which for the last century have been only known in France to literary antiquaries.

Oaths are always a delicate subject, but that they are not an utterly despicable subject a social philosopher may readily satisfy himself. There are very few well-established oaths that do not tell something worth knowing of the people who use them. They may be divided into two great classes. Oaths belonging to the first connote a belief in a future state and in a system of rewards and punishments after death; oaths belonging to the second class connote looseness of manners and disbelief in female virtue. The oaths of nearly all northern nations are of the first class; the oaths of Oriental nations mostly belong to the second; while, curiously enough, the great oath of the Hungarians, with which everybody who has heard much Magyar spoken is doubtless familiar, may be said to be a horrible mixture of both, the Hungarians being an Oriental race Christianized. The disguises in which old oaths are frequently found are often amongst the most curious of the many ways in which people show the effects of early religious training and of a social atmosphere strongly pervaded by religious feeling, or even of sensitiveness about the convenances. The most brutal and unblushing swearers in the world are the English and Americans. In many parts of the North, however, oaths are a good deal disguised, as in the former's "swan," and "swow," and "dun," and "gosh," and in Ireland some of the earlier English oaths, which have been long extinct in England, are preserved in such phrases as "blood an' 'ouns" or "blood an' oundhers." In France variety in oaths is almost gone, though in such phrases as "ventre-bleu" the remains of some primitive Norman swearing may be detected. But there is one French oath in disguise which everybody who has passed a night in a French camp will remember as almost invariably the first sound which fell on his waking ear, coming through the canvas from the lusty throats of grooms and cooks, "Sacré nom d'un chien." We have always supposed it to be a device of comparatively recent origin, dating probably from the First Empire or at all events from the latter days of the Revolution. There is nothing of the grace or wit of the ancien régime about it, and it is very difficult to say from internal evidence whether it is the composition of a worshipper of the goddess Reason or of a Christian who retained traces of an earlier respect for the proprieties of the tongue. But our doubts were set at rest by hearing it in a remote Canadian village from the lips of a very old man who was in a great rage with one of his neighbors about some eggs. There it was with the same emphasis on "nom," the same dropping of the voice at "chien," with which one is familiar in France, and yet the old man was of the old Canadian stock, and had probably never seen a Frenchman in his life.

The French Canadians, instead of declining before the Anglo-Saxons, gain on them rapidly, and bid fair before many years to have the lower province almost entirely to themselves. There is a Scotch colony on the Lower St. Lawrence, of not very ancient date, from which every trace of Scotch origin has disappeared, and in which French only is spoken. Wherever Canadians intermarry with the English or Scotch, the Canadians, owing to their greater religious tenacity, almost invariably succeed in bringing up the children as Catholics; and the children being Catholics, they naturally consort with the French, and are soon absorbed by them. Moreover, commerce is deserting Lower Canada. Quebec is a declining city; and there are few things more melancholy to the eye of "enterprise" than the almost complete absence of ships from the magnificent expanse of water which connects the port with the sea. Even the lumber trade has moved up to Ottawa. The English and Scotch, of course, will not stay in a place which commerce is deserting, and the Canadians, who are still content with their small farms and retail stores, move in and fill their places—and we suspect are not sorry to be rid of the others and their restlessness and heresy.

The number of Irish who have got a foothold in the province is small, and the inhabitants, in spite of their Catholicism, detest them for their turbulence and love of politics. The French lawyer whom we have already mentioned spoke of them with great bitterness as a kind of scourge. He said they were "lancés sur l'humanité commes des loups." In his own town of five thousand inhabitants, he said there were only twelve Irishmen. "Figurez vous, monsieur," he said with great earnestness, taking us by the button-hole—"seulement douze;" and yet one of them had got to be mayor, in the way with which we are so familiar in New York. He kept a grocery, and bought up "the people"—that is, the poor Canadians—partly in money and partly in groceries. The Anglo-Saxon race has rendered incalculable service to the cause of civil and religious liberty; but it has committed the two greatest crimes of history—worse crimes by far than Cæsar's slaughter of the Gauls—in the elaborate legal degradation of the Irish and the negroes; and there is something comic as well as striking in the way in which retributive justice is being dealt out upon it both in the New and Old World, by the conversion of the descendants of the victims into a political and social thorn of the first magnitude, from which there appears to be no escape. The rage of the Irish for political offices is one of the most curious phenomena in history, and is a really unprecedented result of extraordinary and long-continued oppression; but it is certainly rather hard that the French Canadians should suffer from it.

The latter will probably preserve their language and manners intact till the whole country is annexed to the United States. Both will probably then disappear rapidly before the terrible solvent of American ideas and institutions. With them will disappear the last relic of Old France, and probably, outside the Tyrol, the purest and simplest, most prosperous and most pious Catholic community on the globe.

ENGLAND.

London, July 31, 1868.

Everything gives signs of the approaching holidays. The Ministers have performed their solemn annual ceremony of dining off whitebait, and have blown their trumpets more emphatically in public dinners at the city. Parliament has dwindled to a small body of virtuous members who remain at their post in spite of the hot weather, and wrangle more pertinaciously, and with even less temper, than in the whole previous session. Every one is glad because of their departure, and the summer migration has fairly set in. The railways are crowded, and considerably less than three millions of people are left in London. They would doubtless feel it dull in their comparative solitude were it not for the patriotic efforts of newspaper editors. Now is the time for those energetic gentlemen to start what, in the language of the chase, would be called their bag-foxes. Every editor keeps a stock of those useful animals, and when no game is to be found in the regular beats he lets one of them loose to make sport for the multitude. Thus, for example, the Daily Telegraph has contrived to get up a tremendous discussion on that most perennial of topics, the comparison between celibacy and marriage. Its columns fairly overflow with the enormous quantity of correspondence addressed to it by persons who appear to have a bonâ fide belief that they can settle the matter offhand, and lay down, for the first time in history, a distinct moral code showing when a man ought to marry and when he ought not. The peculiar social stratum for which the Daily Telegraph is written delights in extremely fine language and a great deal of commonplace morality. In spite of the lavish expenditure of brilliant epigrams in the leaders, and of excited sentiment in the correspondence, I do not think that any results have been obtained of sufficient interest or novelty to justify transmission across the Atlantic. I may remark, in passing, that an important change has recently taken place in English journalism, which threatens to interfere with the influence exercised by the "Penny Thunderer"—to give the Telegraph its fittest title. The Daily News—a paper which has long had a very high reputation for its thorough liberalism and for its commercial independence—has lowered its price to a penny, and I am glad to hear that the experiment of providing really good matter at that price seems likely to be successful. The other penny papers, the Star and the Standard, may pair off on opposite sides as rabid and unscrupulous defenders of the extreme parties. They are very little credit to their supporters. The Times and the Post are now left alone as high-priced daily papers. How long the Times will be able to maintain its place, and to charge three times as much as its rivals, is doubtful. The Post, which has a very small circulation, and lives chiefly by reporting fashionable intelligence, depends upon a different class of clients. But the influence which the Times once wielded, as representing English opinion almost alone, has received some severe blows, and its humble imitator, the Telegraph, will now have an effective rival in the Daily News.

To return to the great marriage controversy, it may be said that it is merely the manifestation of a movement which daily excites keener interest. Women's rights and women's wrongs are becoming prominent matters of discussion in many quarters. Women have already been admitted on the register of voters in one constituency, and it seems not impossible that the legal position which they assert has more claims to validity than was at first believed. One of the last acts of the dying Parliament was to appoint a select committee to enquire into the laws affecting the property of married women. A very lively discussion arose in the Pall Mall Gazette upon this topic. A powerful writer, to whom a great part of the influence of the paper is unquestionably due, asserted that Parliament had dealt with the subject with disgraceful levity; that it had acted upon no fixed principles, and proposed a sweeping alteration in the law without the faintest forethought as to the consequences. He wound up by declaring that the only sound theory was that a family should be in the nature of a monarchy, in which the husband was king, and that the simple fact must be recognized that men were stronger than women, mentally, morally, and physically; in short, in every way in which one human being could be stronger than another. Great was the indignation at this round assertion amongst all classes of women, and one after another rushed into the controversy. The most prominent combatant was Miss Taylor, the step-daughter of Mr. John S. Mill, who seems to have assimilated many of Mr. Mill's ideas and something of his style. The battle was well fought on both sides, though I think, as is usual in such cases, the most conspicuous result was the absence of any appropriate experience on the subject. The committee appointed by Parliament have just issued their report. Without speaking decisively, they rely very much upon the evidence received from the United States and Canada. In England, as you are aware, we still have the old common law, by which a woman's property is vested entirely in her husband; and in the case of poor people, undefended by settlements, this undoubtedly leads to many considerable hardships. A drunken husband often enough lives by plundering his wife periodically of her earnings. According to the evidence received, the change of law in New York, Massachusetts, and elsewhere is said to have given universal satisfaction; and we are recommended, after taking certain precautions in respect to the working of the law, to move in the same direction. If any of your readers can throw any light upon the subject, they may encourage our Parliament in a reform or deter it from a blunder.

But it is plain that this and other questions are rapidly becoming more prominent. The other side of the question has been taken in a series of articles in the Saturday Review, which have gained unusual notoriety. They have been attributed to a great number of people, though, I think, the evidence is in favor of female authorship. The lady, if such she is, reviles her sex, as at present existing in England, with extraordinary virulence and pertinacity. She says that they paint themselves, and are almost openly indelicate in their manners; that they are either fast, frivolous, and horsey, or make ludicrous attempts to rival masculine thought; that most of them have for their one object in life the making of a rich marriage for themselves or their daughters; and that none of them are fitted for domestic life. The moral is, let our wives and daughters take to cookery and mending our shirt-collars, and give up attempting to think, and still more retire from what it is proper to call the "vortex of fashionable life." I believe that a more preposterous caricature was never drawn, and that it resembles most English ladies about as closely as Dickens's Miss Hominey resembles George Eliot. In short, it is only worth notice as a specimen of the irritation produced in some minds by the various tendencies which are summed up in the demands for the emancipation of women. We, say the strong-minded ladies, want to take a larger part in the affairs of the nation; and the answer is, what a foolish, frivolous, unwomanly set you are! We will laugh and abuse you till we make you feel your insignificance, and drive you back to be content with your inferior position. The check has been certainly unmanly, and quite unworthy of a paper which is generally gentlemanlike in its language. But as there is a grain of truth on both sides of most questions, it may perhaps be admitted that some fashionable ladies have given occasion to the blasphemer by extravagance in dress or behavior, and that even strong-minded ladies have at times a few ridiculous points.

To turn from these wide questions, the last new sensation has been the discovery, or supposed discovery, of a new poem of Milton's, which, I presume, you will have seen by this time. The rapidity with which controversy has accumulated round it rather tends to diminish one's respect for the critics. The cause of the sceptics has been prejudiced by Lord Winchelsea's rash assertions that Milton never used such rhymes as are found in the poem, whereas the commonest acquaintance with his writings would supply abundant instances. On the whole, I think the critics incline toward the favorable side, and hold the poem to be a genuine, though not a very fine, specimen of Milton; but it is a very pretty quarrel, and there is room enough for new disputants to distinguish themselves in the fray.

Yesterday the greatest improvement that has been made in London within modern times, the Thames embankment, was partially thrown open. The river, instead of being an unsavory ditch hidden carefully out of sight, will, before long, be a very respectable stream, with a really fine roadway along the greatest part of the bank. The Houses of Parliament and the Somerset House are at present the only picturesque buildings immediately fronting the river, but undoubtedly others will spring up on what will be the best of all points for architectural effect. We have already gained perceptibly by its partial completion, which has allowed the drainage system of London to be nearly completed. The chief sewer follows the line of embankment and discharges into the Thames at such a distance as to prevent the return of offensive matter to London. Consequently throughout the unprecedented heat of this summer the river has never been offensive, whereas a few years back the stench in summer weather was enough to knock a weak man down, and produced a fearful crop of fevers. It is true that a few miles down the sewerage is forming banks which are blocking up the navigation; but there is every prospect that it will soon be applied to agricultural improvement, and the problem of decent drainage be effectually solved.

Correspondence.

THE SOUTH AND DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS.

To the Editor of the Nation:

I have read much of the campaign literature that has appeared so far on both sides of the question, and although I have met with much declamation and numerous frantic appeals on the one hand not to let so much blood have been spilled and so much treasure lavished, etc., etc., in vain, and on the other hand to preserve intact the glorious fabric of the Constitution as bequeathed to us, etc., etc.; and although I have besides seen learned disquisitions proceeding from Mr. George T. Curtis and other shining lights of the wisdom-of-our-ancestors party, all proving by chapter and verse that all the events that have happened since 1861 had no right to happen, and that it is the duty of every pious citizen to consider that they have not happened and govern himself accordingly; although I have found abundance of this sort of thing, I have found very little of that practical, common-sense discussion of the issues of the hour which strikes one so favorably in the British newspapers, and of which some very fair specimens abound in the recently republished essays of Mr. Bernard Cracroft. To be sure, there are exceptions, and if I may say so without seeming to flatter, more of them in your columns than in those of any other journal with which I am familiar; it is for that reason that I venture to suggest to you some aspects of the present contest which I do not think have received the attention they deserve, and which you may think it worth while to develop. I refer to the effects which the result of the election is likely to exercise on the condition of the country at large, and more especially on that of the Southern States. The politicians of the South and all that portion of the Southern people who embarked with enthusiasm in the rebellion, and are now bitterly mourning for their lost cause, were at one time more than half disposed to acquiesce in the accomplished fact of reconstruction, to accept the inevitable, and to go to work to build up a new prosperity on the new basis. The unfortunate course which Mr. Johnson saw fit to pursue inspired them with fresh though faint hopes that something would turn up, and now the platform of the Democratic party, the language held before and since the making of the nomination by one of the candidates, and the high consideration accorded to Northern Peace Democrats and to rebel generals and pirates, have completely carried them beyond the bounds of good sense, have obliterated from their memories the sufferings of the last seven years, and have led them to form the most extravagant expectations of the advantages to accrue to them from a Democratic triumph. If, by some unforeseen combination of events, Mr. Seymour should be elected, how would his election benefit the South? Even if his success at the polls included the return of a number of Democratic Congressmen commensurate with his electoral vote, the Republican majority in the House, being re-enforced by the Southern members, would still be large enough to render him as impotent as Mr. Johnson now is for every purpose but the interposition of aggravating and embittering delays, and of obstacles requiring nothing but time for their removal. But suppose we go a step further, and put the case that the Republican ascendancy in Congress is reduced from a two-thirds vote to a simple majority. Suppose we go still further, and concede a Democratic majority, what would be the result? The Democratic party are, by their own declarations, precluded from legislating in Congress concerning the suffrage, even if they were insane enough to suppose that the suffrage once conferred can be taken away; their only course would therefore be to repeal the Reconstruction Acts and remit the whole question to the people of the Southern States. But repealing a law does not wipe out the acts done under that law while it was in existence, for Congress is prohibited by the Constitution from passing ex post facto laws, and the regular governments which are now in existence in the Southern States would be the ones which the new administration would be bound to deal with and recognize, there being no others by whom their validity can be called in question. To these governments, then, elected by the colored voters, would, in the extremest and most unlikely contingency, in the contingency most favorable to the pretensions of the Democratic party, be remitted the question whether the colored voters should be disfranchised.

While the completest victory of the Democratic party would thus work no change in the actual situation which could benefit any class of Southern society, the election of Mr. Seymour, with or without a Democratic Congress, would stimulate the feverish unrest which is the bane of Southern prosperity, would induce excitement where peace and order are the principal requisites, and would open afresh the wounds which, if "let alone," would soon heal up spontaneously. The election of General Grant, on the other hand, will at once give their quietus to all the vain imaginings in which Southern politicians are so prone to indulge, and will for ever convince them that their only salvation lies in bowing to the necessity of the hour, and that the Democratic party is the last quarter from which to expect substantial aid. When this result is once attained, the most serious obstacle in the way of genuine welfare and prosperity will have been removed, and the Southern States once more put in the way to repair the losses and sufferings entailed by the war. I fear I have already trespassed too far on your patience, and must therefore refrain from dwelling on the benefits to be expected for the whole country from a united and harmonious administration, as contradistinguished from the disastrous results which must follow a continuation of the present want of harmony between the various branches of the Government; and I must equally refrain from pointing out how the former will be secured by the election of Grant—how the latter must unavoidably follow his defeat. Hoping that you will not hold it useless to elaborate and press home some of these hints, I remain, yours respectfully,

A. T.

New York, August 10, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

Messrs. Nichols & Noyes announce as in press, and to be published during the month of September, three works. One is the "The American Church Register for Various Denominations," designed for the use of pastors and church clerks, compiled by the Rev. Daniel T. Noyes. It will be published in several sizes, and the price will vary with the size. A "Memoir and Sermons of Professor George Shepard, of the Bangor Theological Seminary," is another of Nichols & Noyes' announcements; and the third is "The Cricket's Friends," by Virginia W. Johnson, who is the author of several "juveniles," one of which we recollect as being not bad.——In mentioning the illustrated Christmas "Kathrina" of Messrs. Charles Scribner & Co., we omitted to mention that of the seventy illustrations, nine (landscapes) are from designs by Mr. C. C. Griswold; the rest are by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, as before stated.——We add to previous announcements by Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Son, "What Makes Me Grow? or, Walks and Talks with Amy Dudley," a 16mo, for small readers.

—Messrs. O. D. Case & Co., Hartford, who lately republished Baker's "Nile Tributaries," have issued sixteen supplementary pages, in the same style, and numbered right on, so that they may, if desired, be bound up with that work. The Rev. W. L. Gage is the writer, and we think must have previously contributed the substance of the supplement to one of the monthly magazines, where we seem to remember having read it. It is now tacked on to Mr. Baker's narrative as if to complete his information concerning Abyssinia, of which Mr. Gage first reports the religious history, then speaks in a very general and indefinite manner of its geography and resources, then pictures the character and career of the late Emperor Theodore, and finally alludes to recent events that ended in the destruction of Magdala and of the emperor himself. There are, however, several reasons why this does not seem to us either a necessary or a valuable addition to Mr. Baker's work. In the first place, the connecting link of Abyssinia is by no means so strong a one as the title of the work would seem to imply. It is true, the Nile tributaries followed up by Mr. Baker are rightly assigned to Abyssinia, since they take their rise in that country; but he did not explore them to their sources, and except when visiting Mek Nimmur, an outlying vassal of Theodore's, he can hardly be said to have entered Abyssinia at all. Elsewhere, at most he was in neutral territory, contested feebly by Theodore, whose pretensions extended even to Khartoum, but effectively possessed by Egypt; a large part of it, indeed, uninhabited, and the rest having a very unstable and migratory population. What Mr. Baker saw of Abyssinia amounted to little more than that great mountain-barrier and watershed which he frequently terms the alps, and he cannot be said, although Mr. Gage asserts it in his opening sentence, to have made that country "interesting" to his readers. So the statement that "the most casual reader of Baker's pages must be struck with the extraordinary fertility and the almost inexhaustible supply of game" cannot properly be applied to Abyssinia. It is as if a person who had visited Galicia and seen the Carpathian Mountains should be cited as having given an account of Hungary, which lies on the other side. Moreover, as we have said, Mr. Gage is too little precise in what he has to tell us of Abyssinia and of General Napier's expedition; and this defect is aggravated by the extreme carelessness of the printer, who in one place represents Theodore as "framing [fearing] a combined English and Turkish invasion." There are other errors not so easily rectified.

—If any one wishes an instance of how much the value of an office depends on its incumbent, let him compare the first annual report of the Commissioner of Education, at Washington, just printed, with the statute creating the department. We do not suppose it is doubtful that no other American can rival Mr. Barnard in fitness for the position which he now holds. Certainly so far as past experience, accumulation of facts and works of reference, and breadth of view are concerned, his superiority is not likely to be called in question; and if he is spared for the work, and liberally sustained by Congress, we believe he will justify in the most gratifying manner the wisdom of the act under which he is laboring. We presume that sound judgment, as well as the economy imposed on the department, forbids the very general circulation of the documents which emanate from it. They would be in danger of going to waste if distributed much outside of the teachers themselves, the clergy, and the various newspapers. We could wish, however, that the simple tabulation of the scope of the Commissioner's enquiries might be very widely broadcast, in order to exhibit the real meaning and extent of education to those who have the most inadequate ideas of it—among whom teachers would form a by no means insignificant minority. The report is also deserving of study as suggesting the importance of a bureau whose authority does not exceed the collecting and collating of statistics, which at first sight is not an obvious advantage to the country. But whoever has attempted to get light from the chaos of State Superintendents' reports, whether taken by themselves or in connection with others, and has witnessed the numerous false inferences which even their authors have drawn from them, simply because there is no uniformity in the statistics furnished, will be prepared to believe that almost the first step the department can take "to promote the cause of education throughout the country," is to introduce a proper system of inter-State comparison of the condition and progress of public instruction. This progress depends in a great degree on force of example; and the clearer the example is made—the more perfectly one State is able to discern the merits or defects of the school system of another—the easier it will be to suggest and to effect improvements.

—Mrs. Prescott Spofford, with her wondrous wine-cellar full of topaz tints and amethystine tints, and liquid sunshine and quivering souls, and fine names of Sidonian and Damascene and other gorgeous wines, would feel a little thrill of the old fervor now and again if she were to read a report published in the Horticulturist for July and August, made by a committee of American wine-growers who have been looking into European viticulture. These are their remarks on Johannisberger, full of an agreeable enthusiasm for that hock of hocks and mysterious king among wines:

"Now, Johannisberger is the most delicate of wine, as it is indeed superlative in every respect. By the kind invitation of the Princess Metternich the committee were allowed to taste specimens of the best the castle cellar contained, including some that was twenty-one years old in the cask, and some from a cask that was, par excellence, called the 'bride of the cellar,' and the opinion formed was that the quality of Johannisberger is such that it cannot be described, and can be communicated only to the organs of taste; nor can it be understood, or even imagined, except by those who are so highly favored as to have a taste of it."

The committee argue in favor of the superiority of red wine over white; it is less heating, much more tonic, much less exciting to the nerves, much less intoxicating to the brain, and its effects are more enduring than those produced by white wine. We Americans, then, being, by reason of our dry climate, as well as from moral causes, more excitable than Europeans, have peculiar reason for following the example of the French, who every year use less and less white wine. This suggestion it would be not at all difficult to carry into practical effect in this country, and the subject is worth the consideration of the temperance people, who are spending much of their money in vain, and who are too obstinate in refusing to accept lager bier and good native wines as allies of great value in the war against whiskey. The committee came back, they tell us, with a better opinion of American wines than they had at setting out—a good opinion shared by the German jurors at the Great Exposition, but not by the French, who say that the more of the natural flavor a wine possesses, the lower they rank it in the scale. The Germans, accustomed to wines of high bouquet, which only the very best of French wines have to any extent, were much pleased with the Catawba, which the French despise. The committee repeat the assurances with which all writers on this subject close their remarks, and of which, indeed, there can be no doubt, that the United States cannot but become a great wine-growing country.

—We have recently come upon a pair of twin brothers for the famous Parson Knak, of Berlin, who avows his belief that the sun moves round the world, or rather over it, and says to the men of "science falsely so called," "You may laugh at me, but I am as happy as a child." In 1823 the learned Jesuits Le Sueur and Jacquiers edited a new edition of the "Principia," "in the preface to which," says Mr. R. A. Proctor, the astronomer, "there occurs the following remarkable passage: 'In adopting the theory of the earth's motion, to explain Newton's propositions, we assume another character than our own, for we profess obedience to the decrees of the Popes against the motion of the earth!'" Mr. Proctor has recently contributed to the Popular Science Review an interesting article on "Jupiter without his Satellites"—that is to say, Jupiter as he will be seen to-morrow night by many more astronomers than have ever so seen him before. So far as is known, no more than five men have ever observed the eclipse of the four satellites—Molyneux in 1681, Sir W. Herschel in 1802, Wallis in 1826, and Dawes and Griesbach in 1843. Mr. Proctor's article, as well as another on "The Earth a Magnet," may be found in the September Eclectic, which also has Blackwood's recent abuse of Ruskin as a sociologist, and a readable paper on "British Arms and Soldiery."

—The "silly season" of the English newspapers having fairly set in, the controversy about Mr. Morley's Miltonic poem occupies much time and attention. The opinions of the critics—some of whom are critics for the nonce and have the trade yet to learn—are on the whole not unequally divided. Mr. Morley sticks to his first impression. Professor Masson—who, by the way, made the acquaintance of the poem years ago when he was studying for his biography of the poet—also abides by the opinion he first expressed, and will not believe it Milton's. As for the handwriting, he and the best experts of the British Museum deny its genuineness, while some of the Museum authorities, Mr. Hain Friswell and Mr. Hepworth Dixon, who has his say about everything that anybody is saying anything about, are sure that Milton's own hand wrote the lines. Mr. Morley does not deny that Mr. Bond's and Mr. Rye's dictum on this point has shaken him in his former belief. As for the signature, it appears that it may be J. M. or P. M., and a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette—for the fate of whose suggestion we shall watch with interest—suggests that it may be A. M. A horizontal flourish at the tip of the A was perfectly common at that time. A. M. would be Andrew Marvell, at that time twenty-seven years old, subsequently a secretary of Milton's, and presumably an early earnest admirer of his master. Much of Marvell's own poetry, it may be added, shows that he might have been an enthusiastic admirer of Milton's earlier poetry. He himself was of like mind; many of his own poems—all the good ones with one or two exceptions—have, not less than Milton's first ones, a beautiful natural-seeming melody and sweetness entirely in agreement with the tenderness of the sentiments, and, more than Milton, Marvell had an inclination towards semi-philosophical reverie—

> "Reducing everything that's made
> To a green thought in a green shade"

—an inclination which would be stronger at twenty-seven, an age which dreams, than afterwards, and one which consorts well enough with the spirit of the epitaph in dispute. But we suppose the experts in handwriting will settle the question easily enough. If they divide on it and the world at large is remitted to the internal evidence, we feel pretty sure that there will be, proportionately, more editions of Marvell published with the poem in them than of Milton. This remark alone embodies a strong argument in favor of the enthusiastic disciple's claims to the authorship. "Milton was at all events not so impoverished in thoughts as to quote himself. But young Mr. Marvell might have unconsciously assisted himself without dishonor." Amid all the talk the general public is learning a great deal about an author known better by name than by the reading of him. It is made plain that he was in practice as in theory rather disposed to scorn the "barbarous jingle" of rhyme; that rhythm was what he cared for; that the word "its" is of rare occurrence in his works; and that his habit is to use "his" or "her," and much more of the same sort. In the epitaph, by the way, "its" occurs four times, while in all the acknowledged works it occurs but twice. At least it is so asserted; the correspondents are not all wise or trustworthy; Lord Winchilsea's letter, for instance, was most foolish, and Professor Masson's concerning his lordship's courage and gallantry was also very absurd and gave the reader unpleasant sensations. The poem, meantime, is itself really not worth all the stir that has been made about it. Neither Milton nor Marvell need have been too much ashamed of it, and even the lesser of the two would certainly have had no reason to be proud of it. There is good music in it and good detached expressions, but little or nothing more that is good; and much of it is far-fetched and ill-brought.

—The Right Rev. Samuel Hinds, who was formerly the chaplain and friend of Archbishop Whately, and afterwards the Bishop of Norwich, which see he resigned about ten years ago, has just published a book which may be pronounced exceedingly liberal for the work of so high a dignitary of the Church as he has been. Indeed, he might almost have been the author of the "Comedy of Convocation," and might certainly have been the author of that saying of Dr. Holmes's, "Protestantism means 'None of your business.' No logical stopping-place short of 'None of your business.'" Dr. Hinds argues for perfect freedom of discussion, and that it is the right—nay, the duty—of clergymen to stay in the Church, whether they believe its generally received doctrines or not. As for the action of ecclesiastical courts in depriving and suspending clergymen for their opinions, that forms "an interference of authority extraneous to the Church." The fundamental article of the Church of England, the one which determines the test by which doctrines may be tried, the sixth article, in effect simply forbids that any of its members should be compelled to believe any doctrine as requisite and necessary to salvation which cannot be proved to be so. "The first generation of the Reformed Church," says the doctor, "had no right to restrain future generations from doing what they did themselves, and assumed no such right. . . . . What the framers of the Articles have left with us is not a will bequeathing fixed property, but a series of decisions . . . . and the framers of the Articles being fallible men," and claiming to be no more, could not debar their successors from also—if they felt moved thereto—using their fallible judgments too. The work may very well be the work of an author of a "Logic," and will be welcomed by Bishop Colenso's friends as well as by Catholics, who are always apt to think something is done for them when the outside things of some other communion are attacked. Friends of free discussion among truth-loving men will like it most of all, and will thank its venerable author for this latest labor of his. The "Free Discussion of Religious Topics" is the title of the work.

—We have already once or twice spoken of "Max Havelaar," a novel by a Dutchman who wrote for the purpose of showing his fellow-countrymen the horrors of Dutch rule in the East. There has been an English translation of it made, and Messrs. Putnam & Son have promised to reproduce it in this country—which would be to confer a favor on novel-readers. We refer to it again to speak of the verses which are here and there scattered through the story, and which have every appearance of being what they purport to be, genuine translations of Javanese originals; certainly they are not Dutch. Readers curious in poetry will be glad to see a specimen of them. In fact, the poem below will please all readers of poetry, and not the curious only. By reason of the last touch, which, by the way, is surprisingly well managed and very effective, it quite merits the word "exquisite" which the Nashville Home Monthly bestows upon it. Mata glap, let us say, means "in a frenzy."

"I do not know where I shall die.
I saw the great sea on the south coast when I was there with my father making salt.
If I die at sea and my body is thrown into the deep water, then sharks will come;
They will swim round my corpse, and ask, 'Which of us shall devour the body that goes down into the water?'
I shall not hear it.

"I do not know where I shall die.
I saw in a blaze the house of Pa-ansoe, which he himself set on fire, because he was mata glap;
If I die in a burning house, glowing embers would fall on my corpse;
And outside of the house there will be many cries of men throwing water on the fire to kill it.
I shall not hear it.

"I do not know where I shall die.
I saw the little Si-Oenah fall out of a klappa-tree, when he plucked a klappa (cocoa-nut) for his mother;
If I fall out of a klappa-tree I shall lie dead below in the shrubs like Si-Oenah.
Then my mother will not weep, for she is dead. But others will say with a loud voice, 'See, there lies Saidjah.'
I shall not hear it.

"I do not know where I shall die.
I have seen the corpse of Palisoe, who died of old age, for his hairs were white:
If I die of old age, with white hairs, hired women will stand weeping near my corpse,
And they will make lamentation, as did the mourners over Palisoe's corpse, and the grandchildren will weep very loud.
I shall not hear it.

"I do not know where I shall die.
I have seen at Badoer many that were dead. They were dressed in white shrouds, and were buried in the earth.
If I die at Badoer, and am buried beyond the dessah (village), eastward against the hill, where the grass is high,
Then will Adinda pass by there, and the border of her sarong will sweep softly along the grass.
I shall hear it."

The bold realistic handling and the vivid picturing bring to mind the book of Japanese poetry of whose contents we not long since gave some examples. But this is far more finely imaginative than anything we remember in that volume.

—M. Henri Rochefort, the young man of thirty or thirty-five who, by his satirical abilities, has made the Lanterne so brilliant a success that he finds himself within the short space of a few weeks rich, famous, and feared, has, of course, got himself into difficulties with the Government. He has had served up to him a dish of the sort that he is so fond of setting before other people, and apparently he does not relish the jest very well. The Minister of the Interior has sent in to him a communiqué so long that it would fill or nearly fill one entire number of the Lanterne. By law, the paper served with a communiqué must print it. In the case of a libel on a private person, the offending journal is bound to print a reply, though it should be twice as long as the article complained of. There is no law, however, to decide how long a communiqué may be, and M. Rochefort is decidedly of opinion that this one is too long. He sees no reason why, if he is bound to submit to the present infliction, he may not get next week, in reply to three lines about Napoleon I., the six volumes of the "Memorials of Saint Helena;" and the week after, that work may be followed by twenty-two volumes of M. Thiers' "Consulate and Empire." So he preferred to refuse to print, to be prosecuted, to pay the maximum fine of 10,000 francs, and to go to jail for a year. He is, however, more popular than ever in Paris, where he before was the most popular man in the city. Very likely he will issue the Lanterne from his prison. In the course of the affair publicity has been given to a letter written by Béranger to Rochefort when the latter was a school-boy in the Monge Lyceum. He had sent the aged poet an ode in his honor. The letter of reply is very pleasant and is worth reproducing:

"To the Lycéen Rochefort: I am under great obligations to your friends, monsieur, for having suggested that you should send your charming ode to me. You certainly owed me a copy, since I was so fortunate as to inspire your muse. Is it true that you are only sixteen? When I reread your verses I cannot help asking myself and you this question—Are you but sixteen? Oh! if I, at that age, had composed such well-turned poetic strophes, I should have fancied that a brilliant destiny was before me. It is true that you lycéens are forced in a hot-house, whereas I, at sixteen, did not know how to spell. Now, remembering all the means that have been taken to develop your faculties precociously, do not, my dear child, allow yourself to be too vain of a happy début and the praises of an old rhymester, who may be somewhat blinded, perhaps, by your incense. Beau mérite, vraiment, de toucher un vieillard que l'on flatte. But this old man has yet mind and reason enough, and a heart warm enough to respond to the impulses of generous youth, and from the bottom of his heart he begs you to receive his thanks. Stick to your themes and versions for a long while yet, and believe me, my dear young friend, yours very truly,
"Béranger.
"Passy, December 20, 1849."

MR. BRONSON ALCOTT'S ESSAYS.*

For the orphic reader the Orphic Saying is no doubt a very fine thing, but somehow the world in general is as yet unripe for it; wherefore the orphic sayer, so far as he is a man addressing contemporary human beings, must appear to be an unsagacious person, or, not to put too fine a point on it, a bad failure. For our own part, we have no doubt that such a man's conversations posterity, down to the last syllable of recorded time, will allow to remain soliloquies; but let it be that he is writing for the future; certainly he is not writing for the present when he sets down on paper thoughts like this:

"Boehme, the subtilest thinker on Genesis since Moses, conceives that nature fell from its original oneness by fault of Lucifer before man rose physically from its ruins; and moreover, that his present existence, being the struggle to recover from nature's lapse, is embarrassed with double difficulties by defection from rectitude on his part. We think it needs no Lucifer other than mankind collectively conspiring, to account for nature's mishaps, or man's, since, assuming man to be nature's ancestor, and nature man's ruins rather, himself were the impediment he seeks to remove; nature being the child of his choices, corresponding in large—or macrocosmically—to his intents. Eldest of creatures, the progenitor of all below him, personally one and imperishable in essence, if debased forms appear in nature, these are consequent on man's degeneracy prior to their genesis. And it is only as he lapses out of his integrity, by debasing his essence, that he impairs his original likeness, and drags it into the prone shapes of the animal kingdom—these being the effigies and vestiges of his individualized and shattered personality. Behold these upstarts of his loins, everywhere the mimics jeering him saucily, or gaily parodying their fallen lord.

* "Tablets. By A. Bronson Alcott." Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1868.

> "'Most happy he who hath fit place assigned
> To his beasts, and disafforested his mind;
> Can use his horse, goat, wolf, and every beast,
> And is not ape himself to all the rest.'

It is man alone who conceives and brings forth the beast in him that swerves and dies. Perversion of will by mischoice precipitates him into serpentine form, duplicated in sex."

Consider it as thought and argument intended for the persuasion and enlightenment of an audience, and put it into ordinary language, and what is got from the passage above given will be this: If there are poisonous snakes in the world, and wallowing hogs, and noxious plants, and foul weather, it is not, as Boehme fondly imagines it is, because the devil fell from a state of holiness and worked evil on earth before man arrived in it. Boehme's undoubted superiority in subtilty, or subtlety, did not save him from here falling into a complete misunderstanding of the matter. The fact is, that when men became numerous enough they "collectively conspired," and the snakes, and diseases, and hard frosts, and rotting leaves, and bad things generally, are the results of the conspiracy. How plain this becomes if we will only recollect, 1st, That man was made before nature; and 2dly, That he is "the progenitor of all below him." Nature is the child of his choices, and this being so, what possible effect can Lucifer's choices have had on nature? Nature corresponds in large to man's intents. If at the time of the conspiracy he had very bad intents, he "shattered his personality" into some very low animal, perhaps a bat or a fish of one of the meaner species; if his intents were better, he "debased his essence" into the forms of some vertebrates higher in the scale, or perhaps made it into some of the milder types of disease, or into some rather inclement weather, while his good intents took shape in beautiful and convenient things.

To us we are free to say this sort of thing does not seem to be thought in any sense of that word which has ever yet found acceptance among men, and if it were not orphic we should have no hesitation in calling it by some very hard name. If we were going to account for the genesis of it, we should say that Mr. Alcott once read the bit of poetry above cited—good enough as a poet's figurative remark on certain bestial traits of human nature, but otherwise valueless—and then proceeded, as is the wont of his kind, to spin a plain saying out into obscurity, making it at the same time devoid of meaning and perfectly dogmatic. It is, by the way, a distinguishing mark of the school to which Mr. Alcott belongs, that their "thought" is very commonly a distortion or adaptation of some other man's metaphor, and that they in return repay the simile-monger better than any other student of their works.

Another habit of theirs is to take what is known to the unilluminated as a truism, and enounce it in the orphic manner. For example, no one would call the man a seer who should say that actions speak louder than words; but it is orphic to say, "If one's life is not worshipful, no one cares for his professions." It is orphic to say,

> "When thou approachest to The One,
> Self from thyself thou first must free,
> Thy cloak duplicity cast clean aside,
> And in the Being's Being Be."

But, even if capital letters were employed, it would be unorphic to say that when one wishes to find The Truth it is well to divest one's self of prejudice and all self-seeking feelings. Go at a man with a saying of this kind, "Know, that seeing you, I divine your gods also," and he discerns at once the difference between you and the man who merely repeats to him the familiar remarks that a man's face is an index of his character, and that his notions of heaven and hell and his views of God's character are determined by his own character and the degree of his intellectual and spiritual enlightenment. Give it as your opinion that "like loves like," and you are on the level of Mr. Tupper; but it were a worshipful thing to inform a listening world that "Affinities tell. Every one is not for every one."

There is, however, a class of orphic utterances, removed as far as need be from sayings whose obvious truth has made them, in their ordinary form, proverbial philosophy. No man is fully orphic until he can turn out things of this kind: "Every pulse pushes nature's quaternion along life's currents, recreating us afresh; the morn feeding the morn, Memnon's music issuing from every stop, as if the Orient itself had sung." Or here is another: "Memory is the premise of our sensations: it dates our immortality." Still another is this, which describes "Man": "Not elemental, but fundamental, essential, he generates elements and forces, perpetually replenishing his waste—the final conflagration a current fact of his existence." Under the head of "The Family," it is said to us: "Still youth and innocency are the sole solvents of all doubts and infidelities; the faiths of women and children in friendship ever fresh demonstrations of life's sufficiency and imperishableness." The next sentence after this last one suggests to us a consideration which is not without its comfort for the ordinary, unillumined reader. It is to the effect that "Families never die, since they trace their pedigree to Adam the First, who is of immortal ancestry." It is a consideration which very possibly long ago occurred to the mind of the reader; but, as we have said, it struck us most forcibly when we had read along to the page or two from which we have just been quoting, and it took in our mind this shape—that it is within the reach of every man and woman of average intelligence to become, when he or she likes, as orphic as the best seer in existence. Let it be that youth and innocence—or innocency—dissolve doubts, and that women's faiths demonstrate that life is imperishable; what has that to do, said we, with the fact that Adam the First was of immortal ancestry, and that families never die because Adam the First, being of immortal ancestry, founded "The Family"? Surely, we continued, a good deal of being orphic depends on saying the first thing that comes into one's head, without any regard for what preceded it, and without the least idea of what is to follow it. Now, anybody—a village idiot—can do this in his idler moments—when for a little while he throws off the responsibility, greater or less, which is imposed on all of us, of being, first of all, so far as we can, intelligent and intelligible animals. A principal thing to be done by the would-be orphic sayer or seer is to become an intellectual voluptuary, and allow the mind to lie passive while a throng of ideas and images, coming from everywhere, going anywhere, often indistinguishable the one from the other, pass before it for its mere delight, submitting to any usage. Of course, to be totally and constantly orphic, orphic and nothing else, more is necessary than to abandon one's self to reverie and soliloquy, but for a short time the effects can be produced in all desirable perfection—in sufficient perfection at any rate to relieve the young from that painful awe which the orphic sayer is apt to inspire into them when they are just leaving off feeling and have not yet learned thinking. The regular orphic seer has been obliged to begin while young the reading of as much idealistic philosophy as he could get hold of, and he must hold in its fulness the doctrine which may be briefly described as the bringing of all things under one's own hat, to the great ruin, theoretically, of the outside world, including the hat and the head—a process which has for its chief result the strenuous assertion of the "imperishable me," and so great a consequent contempt for everything else that the oracles of the seer are flung out of cloud-land to the poor despised seeker for truth as bones are flung to a dog; and furthermore, if the dogs are to be trusted and not the thrower, are as bad as bones can be.

We, for our part, have found "Tablets" very nearly worthless, and have learned little or nothing from it except that Mr. Emerson is not indebted for some of his deepest thoughts to Mr. Alcott—which story used to circulate among some of the more puzzled and enthusiastic of the Boston believers. He may have been indebted to him for an impulse away from materialism, but that too we doubt. Even if Mr. Alcott ever did that much good to anybody, it would be good got at a vast expense; it would be like preventing a traveller from being thirsty, not by giving him a draught of water, but by enveloping him and saturating him to the bones in a bewildering dank fog or Scotch mist—cause of more delay to the pilgrim than any loitering he would be likely to do for the sake of gratifying his materialist senses. In other words, we look on Mr. Alcott with his emptiness and affectations as being, for all his anti-materialism, no good servant of the cause which he is thought to serve. His thinking and preaching delight himself, no doubt; to us, so far as we know either, both appear trivial to almost the last degree—that is to say, when it is Mr. Alcott himself who is talking. Much of the book is quotation of the two ordinary kinds—the acknowledged borrowing from other men, and, secondly, the use, or orphic abuse, rather, of the world's common stock of familiar ideas.

CHAPMAN'S TRAVELS IN SOUTH AFRICA.*

MR. CHAPMAN'S work, though scarcely comparing in interest with those of Dr. Livingstone on the same region, is in the same category. They are contemporaneous also; both explorers beginning their travels into the interior in 1849, and being often near each other, or crossing one another's tracks. While Livingstone, however, made the Cape his original starting-place, Chapman entered by the way of Natal, and thus obtained an experience of the Boers quite other than that which the missionary had of them, among the tribes adjoining the Trans-Vaal. We would not imply that he extenuates the barbarousness of that remarkable people, or apologizes for their murderous slave-hunting incursions upon their peaceful neighbors. It would be strange indeed if the Dutch stock of the colony had wholly run to evil, and such does not appear to be the case. Honesty and hospitality are virtues which they own in dealing with one another and with the stranger who comes among them free from suspicion. Old-countrymen, it appears, are not of this number, owing to sundry impostures which have brought the name of Hollander into bad odor among the Boers. Towards the natives their feelings are such as a superior and master race always entertains for an inferior and servile; and their prejudices in regard to sitting on a jury with negroes, or burial in the same ground, or even living under a rule—the British—which gives equal rights to blacks and whites, and which was a principal cause of their secession from the colony, are the exact parallel of those which flourished among us and at the South in the palmy days of slavery. For much of the blood shed by the Boers in their attacks upon the natives—that is to say, for the attacks themselves—the British Government is responsible by the studiously unequal provisions of its treaties in regard to the sale of guns and ammunition, by which the blacks were left quite unarmed and wholly exposed to the rapacity of the Boers. And on the other hand, we must agree with Mr. Chapman in thinking that "it is a pity that missionary societies, instead of quarrelling with the Boers in their endeavors to instruct the natives, have not rather turned their attention and their means to the advancement and instruction of the Boers themselves, who at the time I speak of had not one permanent clergyman amongst them, and generally no better schoolmaster than a British deserter fresh from the ranks to teach their progeny the Dutch language."

The chapters, or parts of chapters, relating to the Boers are among the most entertaining in the two volumes, and we turn from them with reluctance which is somewhat mitigated by the Dutch flavor that pervades the narrative, and treats us frequently to such words as trek, inyoke, outspan, vley, and veld. Next in point of interest we have found the Bushmen, whose character, says Chapman, has much in it to be admired. "Degraded as they are in the scale of humanity, and even in the eyes of their superiors amongst the native races, their morals are in general far better than those of the more civilized Bechuanas," whom they serve. They have a plurality of wives, but "their women are not at all flattered by the attentions of their Bechuana lords." The Namaqua Hottentots, on the other hand, appear to the least advantage, as indolent lords of the Damaras, who were once the owners of the immense flocks and herds which they are now forced to tend for their conquerors, and "of the soil on which they now grubbed for roots in order to obtain a scanty subsistence." In spite of its absolute, life-and-death sway over its unfortunate subjects, the tribe of Namaquas is but a small one, and, in the author's emphatic words, "the most besotted, dissipated, and debauched wretches on the face of the earth." They have had the honor of introducing the habit of smoking among the hitherto only snuff-taking tribes, besides imparting the diseases which everywhere wait upon licentiousness. Their polygamy is without the effect of increasing the population; which the missionaries have observed to be the case generally. "One of the tribes tried the experiment with the view of increasing their number and power. The men took each as many wives as they could support, but in a few years the result proved no increase, but a decided decrease, whereas among those who lived at missionary stations and confined themselves to one wife there was a considerable increase of population." Among the Makololo, the limited extent of polygamy is attributed to the number of slaves, and the abundance of food and rain.

The spirit of adventure which prompted Mr. Chapman to make his excursions, was joined with a passion for hunting and a willingness to speculate in ivory, together with a laudable desire to promote natural science. His journal is full of observations on the fauna and flora, the geology and climatic phenomena of the country which he traversed—so full that the general reader may be somewhat wearied by it, his practice being different from that of Livingstone, who omits unnecessary and purely scientific details and reserves them for an independent work. In these two volumes, however, we have apparently a clean account of all Mr. Chapman has to render for his fifteen years of travel; and besides what is plentifully scattered through the text, there are long appendices, scientifically prepared, on the animals, birds, insects, and botany of inter-tropical South Africa. With some part of these observations the text, of course, could not dispense. It would, for instance, have been far less graphic without this concentrated experience (ii., p. 234):

"The wet weather, however, has its disadvantages for us. Last night a large, swift, hairy spider, six inches long, ran over my face several times, but was so quick that we could not catch him until he had run the gauntlet of everybody; and although the boys did not care much about him, saying he did n't bite, I did not feel at all easy until I had secured him. Hardly was this done when another nuisance was discovered, and my bed was found swarming with a kind of ant, half an inch long; body, brownish-red; abdomen, brown; these, although they do not bite, are disagreeable bed companions. Being in search of cooked food and sugar, for which they have a strong predilection, they had got the smell of the elephant lard with which I had anointed my limbs; and as I could not jump into a warm bath to obliterate the traces of it, I was obliged to put up with the nuisance as well as I could, slaying as far as I was able. In the morning I found a scorpion in my shoe, and another in my haversack."

Of course the formidable tsetse (poison-fly) figures frequently in these pages. Like the other pests, its extinction may be certainly looked for soon after the establishment of civilized colonies in those parts. Its habitat is within a certain range from water, and it is thought to be a parasite of the buffalo only; so drainage and cultivation, and the introduction of guns, are likely to exterminate this insect, whose bite is so fatal to cattle and horses. And with it, many other animals besides the buffalo will be exterminated with fire-arms. The elephant, being most valuable, will perhaps go first. He was principal game for Mr. Chapman, and in comparing his experience with Mr. Baker's in the Soudan, it would appear that the South African elephants are more vulnerable and less ferocious than those attacked with swords by the Hamran Arabs. While Baker, again, almost invariably shot at them from horseback, Chapman disapproves of this method; but the "unsteady, panting, and frightened horse" is the one he has in view, which Mr. Baker's highly trained steed was far from being. The two or three serious situations our hunter was brought into with elephants, were, in fact, due to some misbehavior of his horse. But he was generally an excellent shot, as, to say nothing of his perils and think only of his voracious followers, he had good need to be. "Can it be credited," he asks, "that, besides the bundles of flesh, they (about fifty men, women, and children of the Makalakas) have devoured a buffalo, a quagga, a fallah, two water-bucks, and three rhinoceroses, and all since Saturday evening, this being Tuesday?"

Mr. Chapman devotes his second volume to what may be called his most original expedition, from Walvisch Bay, on the west coast, to the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi, where he had been preceded by Dr. Livingstone. His idea was that the port just named would be a more natural and feasible entrance to the interior, for trading purposes, than the Portuguese port of Loanda, where Dr. Livingstone emerged, and from which he afterward crossed to the east coast. He started, therefore, better equipped than he had been on any previous "trekking," with a "special artist" attached, and with photographic apparatus, etc. But almost in the ratio of his preparations he was destined to meet with obstacles and delays and accidents; and his plan of descending the Zambesi in boats constructed by his party was rendered futile. He succeeded in witnessing the glory of the smoky falls, and—to judge from Mr. Baines's views in chromo—like Dr. Livingstone, failed to do even faint justice to it in words. Returning to Damara Land, and hoping to effect a settlement which should serve as a basis for a fresh expedition to the Zambesi, or at least permit him to prosecute his researches in natural history, he was foiled also in this, owing to incessant broils between the Damaras and the Hottentots, and was at length compelled to abandon a country in which there was no security for life or property; in which, if there was a cattle plague, tribal wars must ensue; if a bountiful harvest, invasion must be feared. We may take leave of him just before the last illusion is dispelled, on his way to Walvisch Bay, amid the lovely scenery of the Kaan valley:

"Through such a landscape it is an interesting sight to watch the red wheels of the white-tilted waggons dragging heavily after the sturdy team of parti-colored oxen, often stumbling and kneeling over the sharp flints; now rolling with the roar of distant thunder down the rocky steps of the mountains, with difficulty maintaining its equilibrium; now grating down the quartz slope with the drag on, the oxen dragging sometimes on their

* "Travels in the Interior of South Africa, comprising fifteen years' hunting and trading; with journeys across the continent from Natal to Walvisch Bay, and visits to Lake Ngami and the Victoria Falls. By James Chapman, F.R.G.S." Illustrated with maps and numerous engravings. In two volumes. London: Bell & Daldy. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.

haunches; anon grinding over the pebbly bed of the stream, on emerging from which the sore-footed cattle more firmly tread the soft, red, sandy road, cut through a carpet of emerald, until they bury themselves out of sight in the blooming groves, while the mountains re-echo with the driver's harsh voice and the crack of his huge whip."

UHLHORN'S DISCOURSES.*

THESE discourses, which have no particular value either as criticism or as positive scientific or religious statement, are yet very well worth reading, since they show in an intelligible and untechnical way both the strength and the weakness of the position taken by the orthodox Protestant who assumes that Christianity must stand or fall with the Bible. Dr. Uhlhorn apparently thinks that the sole internal evidence of the truth of Christianity is afforded by the life of the faithful believer—which is virtually making it a subject for purely historical treatment. As such he uses it, considering it always from an external stand-point, and making evident neither in his argument nor in the temper in which it was conducted any reason for supposing that he believes the spiritual truths and the moral precepts of the New Testament to have any value apart from the accounts of miracles with which they are connected. To him the ethics of Paul, for instance, seem worthy of attention only because Paul was miraculously converted while on the road to Damascus. The critics whom he opposes look at the question from the historical point of view also; but they attack only the superstructure of dogma which the Church builds on what they consider historically insufficient grounds, and not her spiritual and moral teachings. Dr. Uhlhorn stakes both on the single issue of the truth or falsehood of the apostolic versions of the life of Jesus—which is not only absurd and logically inaccurate, but, taking into consideration the fact that he was addressing an audience who were presumably believers and obviously uncritical, is also manifestly disingenuous. From the clerical standpoint there doubtless appears every reason why discourses like these should be occasionally delivered, but when it comes to printing them it seems worth while to consider whether it is best to strengthen the position of the antagonistic party by using unsound arguments against them.

The first two of these discourses contain a fair and sufficiently careful estimate of Renan's "Life of Jesus" and the "Character of Jesus Portrayed," by Dr. Daniel Schenkel. The title of the second discourse associates the name of Dr. Strauss with that of Dr. Schenkel, but the quality of fairness which we predicate of Dr. Uhlhorn's treatment of the two books we have mentioned cannot be predicated of his hasty consideration of the "New Life of Jesus," by Dr. Strauss. There is no permanent danger to Christianity to be apprehended from a rationalism like that of Dr. Schenkel, nor from the poetical romancing of Renan's criticisms; and Dr. Uhlhorn, very well comprehending this truth, devotes to it plenty of space and much pleasing and convincing eloquence. He is hardly as fair in his treatment of Schenkel and Renan personally as in his review of their arguments; but as he found it easy to demolish the latter, it was perhaps only natural that he should look for the motive of work so palpably unsatisfactory. He is more respectful to Dr. Strauss, and makes a less damaging criticism on that author's book. He considers it, he says, less dangerous than the other, because people cannot understand it, and therefore will not read it. He seems to us, however, to understand thoroughly that it is only Dr. Strauss and critics of his school who seriously undermine the historical foundations of the faith. His arguments are passed over lightly; indeed, the positive portion of this volume is composed of statements fortified only by proofs against which Dr. Strauss has brought much evidence, which in a work of this kind would seem to have been worth investigating. We, for our own part, should have been glad of some more definite information on certain disputed points, such as the paschal controversy and the authorship of the fourth Gospel, than is contained in Dr. Uhlhorn's assertion that the recent investigations of "such men" as Ewald and Steitz have settled the matter beyond further dispute in favor of the Church's view. Dr. Uhlhorn's unfortunate habit of quoting the meaning instead of the words of his authorities, and omitting to give any precise references, except to texts of Scripture, would have been in some degree atoned for had he furnished the curious reader some account of the nature of this conclusive proof of which he merely hints the existence.

In his discussion of miracles we do not find Dr. Uhlhorn altogether satisfactory. He does not attempt to prove the miracles of Jesus from the Gospel records of them, because he "demonstrated their (the records) trustworthiness only upon the presumption that there were miracles, and hence cannot now prove miracles upon the presumption of their trustworthiness." He turns, therefore, to the "four uncontested Epistles of Paul, in which we have an indisputable historical document." But what does he mean by such a use of the word "historical"? Paul's Epistles are not narratives of matters of fact, but letters of reproof, of counsel, and of exhortation to those who already believed in miracles. The word "authentic" applies to them as indubitable productions of the author whose name they bear, but "historical" is a term as inappropriate to them as to the thoughts of Marcus Aurelius. Great miracles attended the martyrdom of Polycarp, insomuch that the Jews endeavored to keep his body from the Christians, lest they should hide it and announce a new resurrection. Irenæus also testifies that in his own times men were raised from the dead by the united prayers of the Church. Is Dr. Uhlhorn ready to accept these miracles on testimony, or does he, like the majority of Protestants, while claiming the possibility of miraculous intervention in human affairs, limit the period of such intervention? Catholics find no difficulty here, but it is unnecessary to convince those who already believe. Behind the Catholic is a Church which claims a perennial inspiration, a perpetual miraculous power. Her life is so full of accounts of the exercise of this power that when Dr. Uhlhorn, in combating the idea that the primitive Church was easy of belief, says that "everything is opposed to the view that the Church acted so uncritically as to accept anything that seemed edifying without regard for its truth," we should be more ready to accept the statement if he would amend it so as to insert after "everything" the words "except the ecclesiastical histories." It is the Protestant, the man who scouts the idea that a miraculous power is latent in the Church, who needs to have irrefragable proofs offered him—whose reason it is necessary to convince that a miraculous occurrence is susceptible of historical proof.

* "The Modern Representations of the Life of Jesus. Four Discourses delivered before the Evangelical Union at Hanover, Germany. By Dr. Gerhard Uhlhorn, First Preacher to the Court. Translated from the third German edition by Charles E. Grinnell." Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1868.

Old Deccan Days; or, Hindoo Fairy Legends current in Southern India. Collected from oral tradition, by M. Frere. With an introduction and notes by Sir Bartle Frere. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1868.)—Despite the resemblances which the collector has pointed out, and the reader cannot fail to observe of himself, between these fairy tales and those of Northern Europe and the Teutonic race generally, they are substantially fresh and peculiar, and in a high degree entertaining. In complexity, which never begets confusion, and of course in Oriental flavor, they recall most vividly the "Arabian Nights." But even here the jungle serves to characterize their Indian origin. Stepmothers and second wives (or, as in "Truth's Triumph," the thirteenth wife) cause most of the difficulties; and the king and queen who had no children, but wanted them sadly, in the end have their prayer granted. These stock characters and situations involve pretty certainly the following incidents: A prince gets comfortably married, and presently has a dream of another princess, who is kept secluded in a glass palace surrounded by seven hedges of bayonets and as many seas, which must all be passed in order to win her; which done, and the marriage celebrated, desire arises to see the first wife and home again. The return is accompanied with renewed perils, but all ends happily, and the wicked are generally brought to grief. There is also, in most of the stories, a Rakshas, or evil geni of the stupid sort, and a cobra more or less friendly to man, and always living in a nest of precious stones and other treasure. It will be strange, also, if the jackal is left out, he being to the other animals what the fox is in European legends, or "Br. Rabbit" in the laughable contes of the Sea Island negroes. In the punishments and vengeances we see the Oriental contempt of human life and suffering; and Oriental extravagance abounds. The stepmother in "Punchkin" must have a shaddock-tree pulled up and boiled root and branch, and her forehead wet with a little of the water, to cure a headache; and afterward bids her husband kill his seven daughters, that by anointing her forehead and palms with their blood she may be cured of her feigned mortal sickness. Vicram Maharajah is directed by the shade of his father to perform this act of devotion to the god Gunputti: "You must fasten a rope to the top of the tower, and to the other end of the rope attach a basket, into which you must get head downward, then twist the rope by which the basket is hung three times, and, as it is untwisting, cut it, when you will fall head downward to the earth"—upon a bayonet hedge, unless the god interposes. The Rajah's son says of his best friend and inseparable companion, "Father, I am angry with the Wuzeer's son; I hate that boy; kill him, and let his eyes be brought to me in proof of his death, or I will not eat my dinner." The occasion of this quarrel is an excellent stroke of art. So, in another way, is this description: "And many passers-by, with chattees [pots] on their heads, for watching him, let the chattees tumble down and break, they were so much astonished; and several men and women, who were looking out of the windows of their houses, leant too far forward and fell into the street, so giddy did they become from wonder and amazement!" The girl-nature is aptly hit off in the case where a hundred brothers and one sister are hidden each under one of a flight of steps leading to a well. A washerman's child amuses herself by running up and down, without knowing what is beneath her. "All the hundred boys bore this without uttering a sound," but the little girl cries out, on being squeezed, "How can you be so cruel to me, trampling on me in this way? Have pity on me, for I am a little girl as well as you;" and the secret of their hiding-place is betrayed at once. As for naïveté, take the following conclusion of the story just quoted from: "Thus truth triumphed in the end [the Rajah has just burnt his treacherous dozen wives]; but so unequally is human justice meted out, that the old nurse who worked their evil will, and was in fact the most guilty wretch of all, is said to have lived unpunished, to have died in the bosom of her family, and to have had as big a funeral pile as any virtuous Hindoo."

These narratives preserve, with some exceptions, a simplicity of style which will recommend them to children, for whom they appear to have been designed, and who will certainly forget—unless children have changed—the violent and polygamous portions of them, and retain only the main incidents and actions.

---

The Opium Habit. With Suggestions as to the Remedy. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1868.)—If we are to believe all that is darkly hinted or confidently asserted, "the opium habit" is fearfully increasing in this and in all civilized countries. It has always been true that here and there an invalid, especially among women, having at first resorted to the drug as a necessary remedy, has at last made constant food of what should have been an occasional medicine, and has suffered more or fewer of the certain evils which attend its excessive use. But with the excitements of modern civilized social life the temptation to resort to opium, as a solace for disappointment and as a sedative for the legion of high-wrought excitements to which the inhabitants of great cities are exposed, has been intensified. It is not surprising that this temptation should not be resisted in an age in which is prevalent the epicurean doctrine that comfortable sensations comprehend the sum of human blessings and are "the chief end" of human existence. The author of this book thinks that "the number of confirmed opium-eaters in the United States is large—not less, judging from the testimony of druggists in all parts of the country, as well as from other sources, than eighty to a hundred thousand." They are in general "professional and literary men, persons suffering from protracted nervous disorders, women obliged by their necessities to work beyond their strength, prostitutes, and, in brief, all classes whose business or whose vices make special demands upon the nervous system."

The writer and compiler of the volume has been himself a victim to the habit which he describes, having eaten more than half a hundredweight of the drug and continued in its uninterrupted use for more than fifteen years. He emancipated himself by a short but painful struggle of six weeks, in which he proceeded from 80 grains a day by diminished doses to its entire abandonment. The story which he tells is interesting without being at all sensational; it is minute enough without being tedious, and its moral lessons of hope and perseverance are none the less impressive from the fact that there is not any attempt to state or enforce them. There is no cant nor preaching in the story, and but very little in the selections which follow it; the author judging wisely enough that the facts preach loudly and forcibly enough, and that to the great majority of opium-eaters their own reflections furnish more preaching than they care to hear or can consent to endorse.

The story of the author, who is known to his friends as a well-educated and accomplished man of about fifty, is entitled "A Successful Attempt to Abandon Opium." With the brief introduction it occupies a little less than eighty pages. This is followed by all from De Quincey of fact and description which his own writings and those of his friends furnish in respect to his experiences with opium. These are followed by the opium reminiscences of Coleridge, which are gleaned from all the sources accessible in any published writings, from Joseph Cottle to Dr. Gilman. To these are added the narrative of William Blair, from the Knickerbocker Magazine of 1842, which is more full of horrors than it is altogether pleasant to read. An essay, never before published, on "Opium and Alcohol Compared," by a person who had made ample use of both, is not much more soothing to the nerves, however salutary it may be to the conscience. Then another narrative of "Insanity and Suicide from an Attempt to abandon Morphine," tells the story of a clergyman who committed suicide in January of the present year. Our feelings are somewhat relieved by the record which follows of "A Morphine Habit Overcome," taken from Lippincott's Magazine of April, 1868. The conscience of the opium-taker will gather some gleams of ghostly comfort from the introduction of Rev. Robert Hall and William Wilberforce as habitual eaters of opium. Then comes Fitz Hugh Ludlow's article, "What shall they do to be Saved?" followed by the less exciting but no less interesting "Outlines of the Opium-cure," from the same writer. These collected papers may be said to furnish nearly, if not all, that can be served up to the public in regard to the "Opium Habit." The facts which these papers embody are worthy the attention of "all whom it may concern." All confirmed opium-takers who have not yet lost their wits or their courage, all those who are dallying with this enchanting drug, and the friends of both classes, will find in these pages much material for their consideration. None of them will find anything which need offend their taste or shock their prejudices. We cannot but hope that the suggestions in the last article will lead speedily to the foundation of an asylum in which many victims of opium may be successfully treated.

---

A Hand-book of Gymnastics and Athletics. By E. G. Ravenstein, F.R.G.S., etc., President of the German Gymnastic Society, London, and John Hulley, Gymnasiarch, of Liverpool. With numerous wood-cut illustrations, from original designs. (London: Trübner & Co.; New York: John Wiley & Son.)—We believe there are still traces on the Delta, at Harvard College, of the open-air gymnasium which flourished, if it was not founded, during the professorship of the eminent Dr. Charles Follen, himself one of the most accomplished gymnasts that Jahn's example produced in Germany. Not till later—that is, after 1835—perhaps considerably later, were established those in-door gymnasiums, one or more of which are now to be found in every large city of the country. Last to be introduced were the Turnvereins, which we owe to the German immigration of 1848-9, and which are the only real gymnasiums that exist in the United States. The esprit de corps, the rigid discipline, the perfect co-operation and subordination which characterize them, are still foreign to our native establishments though generally kept by a professional gymnast. Instead of a thorough system of instruction, with tests of strength and proficiency, assignment of exercises and leaders, a programme that is regularly carried out, we see commonly the frequenters of our gymnasiums divided into two classes—the skilled performers, who monopolize ad libitum certain instruments, and often spend a large portion of the evening in emulating the tricks of the circus; and the unskilled, who practise as they can, without association or instruction, or lounge and gape at the display. Inefficient as are these resorts for the moral and physical training contemplated by their founder, when Germany was still oppressed by Napoleon, and the hour of her resurrection was approaching, they have nevertheless accomplished a vast amount of good. Many a strong man went from swinging the clubs and pulling the weights to leading a company or a regiment in the Federal army, and the greater endurance of soldiers from the cities over those from the country may be partly attributed to the bodily culture of the gymnasium. But there is no reason why the country towns should not have gymnasiums, and none why those in cities should not be brought up to the ideal standard. This standard, we are glad to announce, is given in the beautiful work before us, certainly the best of its kind we have ever had the fortune to read—clear, orderly, full of special knowledge, abounding in common sense, and complete in scope. It is equally fitted for the novice and the teacher, for practice in company and practice alone; includes free exercises and exercises with every variety of instrument, and according to a number of systems; and does not neglect swimming, skating, or the more athletic sports. At the end are condensed the directions which a leader will need to use in guiding his class. The chapter devoted to boxing is free from the odor of the prize-ring; and generally, we may say, that the æsthetic side of gymnastics, rather than the animal, determines the tone of this work.

---

The Lost Cause Regained. By Edward A. Pollard. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. London: S. Low, Son & Co. 1868.)—That quality of the Southern mind which leads it to evolve continually, without any cessation, perpetual Congressional Globes, in the shape of political treatises on the negro and kindred matters, is perfectly illustrated by Mr. Pollard's "Lost Cause Regained." We feel moved to assure Mr. Pollard that we, familiar with the literature of many ages and many lands, do not know more worthless writing than is produced by the typical Richmond editor. People of any taste or judgment are constrained to laugh whenever that gentleman makes his appearance. It does no good, though, to say so; for he is not merely ignorant to the point of absurdity of what the world—literary, sociological, religious, scientific, or what not—has been thinking about during the past hundred years; he is not merely destitute of all knowledge except the knowlege of the art of writing obsolete bad English, but he is the most conceited of provincial mankind. It is impossible to make him understand that he is a laughing-stock. Beyond a doubt Mr. Pollard, for instance, is incredulous as to our sincerity when we say that books like "The Lost Cause Regained" excite in us a feeling of amused contempt mixed with some pity for the authors of them. We present a specimen of the work before us. Mr. Johnson is Mr. Pollard's theme, and the Richmond and Petersburg historic muse is to be seen in not her most high-stepping mood, but still in much of her natural pomp and dignity:

"Had he chosen the part of a Cromwell or a Napoleon, a servile legislative assembly would have been at hand to prompt and sustain him in the character of usurper, and to constitute him the greatest military despot of modern times. Had he acquiesced in the scheme of reconstruction prepared by Congress, he would have secured its bad alliance, and, through his office as commander-in-chief, have found himself absolute master of the lives and fortunes of ten millions of people residing in the military districts of the South. It was the spectacle of a legislative assembly, in order to gratify its political passions, not only offering the Executive chief despotic powers, but prompting him to their assumption, and eager for his acceptance. Congress laid at his feet the absolute empire of nearly one-half of the country—a patronage the most enormous in history; and had he accepted them, he might well have defied the feeble discontent of the South, while Congress would have been complaisant, and he would have blazed in the encomiums of the most numerous party of the North. What, then, constrained this man, thus tempted—the temptation safe, the temptation even calculated on a balance of popularity for the acceptance—to deny and spurn it, to mortify his ambition, to reject the counsels of the most numerous, to sacrifice power and popularity together?—what but the high, severe, overruling sense of duty, which absolves from his selfishness, and makes him the sublime minister of the eternal laws of truth and justice."

There is any quantity of such matter in the book, but it contains some personal abuse of Southern "statesmen," which is agreeable reading, and sounds like truth.

---

Hannah; or, A Glimpse of Paradise. A tale in four parts. Illustrated. By H. M. Moos, author of "Mortara; or, The Pope and his Inquisitors," etc. (Cincinnati: Literary Eclectic Publishing House. 1868.)—This is a large, well-bound volume, with gilt edges and profuse illustrations which are admirably well adapted to the style of the letterpress. We advise all our readers to look at it, for reasons which will be obvious when we make one or two extracts from its pages—we despair of giving in any other way a just idea of its author's capabilities. Here is a description of the hero:

"He was of medium height, lithe and slenderly built, and attired in a suit of plain black cloth. His face was as fair, pale, and clear as the moon seen through the mirror of the lake, and his features as calm and regular as if drawn by the hand of God upon the brow of an angel. His eyes were soft, black, and dreamy, expressing mildness, depth, and suffering. His lips were thin and pale, from under which a row of small pearly teeth peeped forth, in whiteness vying with the purest ivory. His nose was of a Grecian style, small and elegantly cut. His hair was black, long, and glossy, falling loosely over his shoulders. Hannah gazed at this retired stranger with a sense of admiration and astonishment. Never before had she seen so sad and yet so lovely a face. Its beauty was unearthly, reminding her of the ideal—of sweet dreams—of a faint mirror of heaven—of a thought of love faintly visible through the pale light of the moon."

"Could any one have looked into Edgar's face at that moment, he might have seen and read in its calm, fixed, and immovable lines that peculiar look, which, in its want of expression, reminds one of a pale and sickly candle-light, or of a faint shadow of midnight seen through the color of morn. It was not despair—it seemed rather a passion that was deprived of its intensity and violence without having lost that depression which utterly stupefies and benumbs the senses, that could be traced in every lineament of his face. It was equanimity, seen through the light of extinguished hopes. It was exhaustion, seen through the mirror of receded misery."

This beautiful and pensive youth keeps a diary, with an extract from which we close our notice:

"Thursday, March 11.—Went to the office and attended to my duties. Found a letter from Mr. Clark; he accepted my poem; desires me to compose others for him; will pay me two dollars and fifty cents for every one accepted by him. Answered him, complying with his wish. How happy I feel! Can compose four a month. Will net me ten dollars. . . . Came home to supper. Told my parents of my engagement with Clark. Mother kissed me and father fondly gazed at me. Peace! peace! peace! Our dwelling is the home of peace. . . . Came home; gave a lesson to Ruth. Spoke to my father and mother until they retired. Commenced a new poem—wrote till twelve."

---

Folly as it Flies: Hit at by Fanny Fern. (New York: G. W. Carleton & Co. 1868.)—Fanny Fern is a little too apt to indulge in slang, and treads dangerously near the borders of vulgarity; but she does not, on the whole, compare unfavorably with the rest of the small social philosophers. Strip off from the thought of any of them the husk of it—the literary expression—and she really differs in no essential respect from any half-dozen one could name of the more celebrated or respected platitudinarian moralists. And from the fact of her being actually a woman, and healthy, and not given to sentimentalizing, her style gains a certain freshness, which is pleasanter than the prosiness and the unction and the general deadly dulness which mark others of her school who, by virtue of some inexplicable freak of nature, are women—old women—only mentally.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Price. |
|---|---|
| Black's General Atlas of the World, edition for America | (John Wiley & Son) |
| Brooks (S.), The Gordian Knot: a Tale | (Roberts Bros.) |
| Champlin (J. T.), Lessons in Political Economy | (A. S. Barnes & Co.) |
| Comer's Navigation Simplified | (Harper & Bros.) |
| Concilii Plenarii Baltimorensis II. Acta et Decreta | (Murphy & Co.) |
| Cronise (T. F.), Natural Wealth of California | (H. H. Bancroft & Co.) $6 00 |
| Hecker (J.), Scientific Basis of Education | (A. S. Barnes & Co.) |
| Hittell (J. S.), The Resources of California | (A. Roman & Co.) |
| Jenkin (C.), A Psyche of To-day: a Tale | (Leypoldt & Holt) 1 25 |
| Kolb (G. F.), Culturgeschichte der Menschheit, Part 1, swd. | (L. W. Schmidt) |
| Macgregor (A. L.), John Ward's Governess: a Tale | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) |
| Major (R. H.), Life of Prince Henry of Portugal, surnamed the Navigator. | (John Wiley & Son) |
| Meunier (Mme. H.), Le Docteur au Village | (F. W. Christern) |
| Packard (Dr. A. S., Jr.), Guide to the Study of Insects, Part 2, swd. | (Essex Inst.) 0 50 |
| Pictorial History of the Rebellion, Vol. II. and last | (Harper & Bros.) 6 00 |
| Ravenstein (E. G.), and Hulley (J.), Handbook of Gymnastics and Athletics. | (John Wiley & Son) |
| Stephens (A. H.), Constitutional View of the late War between the States, Vol. I. | (National Pub. Co.) |
| The Art Journal, August, swd. | (Virtue & Yorston) 1 25 |
| Theory of the Universe | (P. S. Wynkoop & Son) |
| Webster (N.), Academic Dictionary | (Ivison, Phinney, Blakeman & Co.) 2 25 |
| High School Dictionary | " " " 1 25 |
| Common School Dictionary | " " " 0 95 |
| Primary School Dictionary | " " " 0 63 |
| Pocket Dictionary | " " " 1 00 |
| Army and Navy Pocket Dictionary, | " " " 1 00 |

Fine Arts.

PORTRAITS OF GRANT.

THE personal presence of the general of the army corresponds very well with the regard in which he is held by the sounder portion of the community. All through the war the photographs of the leaders were very entertaining study, and Grant's portrait, when it first appeared as the likeness of a Western officer who could strike hard and who knew how to choose his time to strike, was as interesting as any one. It contrasted sharply enough with some of the pictures of earlier heroes. Most of them were troubled with self-consciousness, and prancing and ambling in various attitudes, with which their carefully posed faces did not harmonize. They were also exhibited alone, seated but erect in body, looking off to the right, looking off to the left, grasping spy-glasses, girded about with sword-belts; they were displayed standing with their staffs (if that is the right plural) around them, with one leg a little bent or "sprung" as Punch has it, with tents in the background, with intrenchments in the background, with field-batteries or siege-trains in the background. There were exceptional single portraits which could be enjoyed and which we still enjoy; but, classing roughly together the heads and the accessories, the outlook was not bright for a couple of years after the great Wigfall had taken Sumter. Perhaps it is rash to prophesy boldly from the "cut of the jib" of any public man; but prophecies after the fact were very well warranted by the faces of the great leaders of Red River expeditions and Manassas campaigns. So when experience had begun to do its work, and officers who had better than anticipatory fame took the places of the figure-heads, it was pleasant to a loyal and still hopeful community to see their business-like countenances. And Grant's quiet face, while it would not justify many men in confident prognostications of success of the cause, was found to agree very well with some interesting passages in his recent record, and comforted us all during the dark days of the long campaign against Vicksburg.

Since that time portraits of Grant have multiplied in the land, and they differ less among themselves than the different likenesses of most men. The expression changes but little from day to day. It is that of a man of firmness and self-possession; and a certain greatness of soul shows in it which we would call magnanimity, if that word were not Latin and long. As we have said, prophetic insight is not common. It would be unwise to build upon any man's face too solid a fabric of inference as to his future; but at this time it is interesting to trace in Grant's face his past career, and, believing him just the best man now in public life to make a President of, to find confirmation of that opinion in his outward aspect.

Of the different portraits of the General, photographs being excluded, we find the most satisfactory to be (mirabile dictu) a chromolith, published by—we know not what house. It is not remarkable as a piece of lithochromy, but has caught the right expression wonderfully well, and is fairly good as a work of art. Of other portraits, the two of most importance are large engravings—one of head and shoulders, the other more nearly a half-length—the one engraved by Mr. W. E. Marshall, from his own drawing, the other engraved by Mr. H. Gugler, after a drawing by Mr. J. H. Littlefield; the one published and sent to us by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, the other by Mr. Littlefield himself. The Littlefield portrait is the better engraving of the two, for Mr. Marshall's work has all that coarseness and want of delicate meaning in the lines which was objectionable in his portrait of Lincoln. Mr. Gugler's work is better done—is indeed unusually soft and brilliant for a modern engraving in line. And as regards the important question of truth of portraiture, while it would be impossible, in the case of two good likenesses, for any person but an intimate friend, who should be also a close observer, to decide absolutely upon the best, no such difficult question, it is evident, has place here. The Marshall portrait, if an ideal head, would be a poorly imagined one; as a portrait, it is a poorly rendered one. We are speaking wholly of the engraving; its badness as an engraving has much to do with the expressionless character of the face which looks out of it; the painting may have been a good likeness, but as published it is not a portrait head at all in the best sense.

The Littlefield-Gugler print is in every way better, and is probably the best engraved head that has been executed in this country.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE.

Now ready,

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

I. DALLAS GALBRAITH. An American Novel. Part IX.
II. SORRENTO.
III. PRE-RAPHAELITE AT SARATOGA.
IV. TWO AMERICAN PRESIDENTS.
V. ON ESSAIE TOUS LES GANTS.
VI. NANTUCKET.
VII. A VIGIL.
VIII. DISPUTE ABOUT EDUCATION.
IX. MY TWO.
X. AMERICAN IN WARWICKSHIRE.
XI. THE KITCHEN.
XII. WHO SHALL SEPARATE US?
XIII. EXPRESSION IN SCULPTURE.
XIV. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
XV. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

For sale by all Periodical Dealers.

Yearly Subscription, $4; Single Number, 35 cents.

Specimen number sent to any address on receipt of 35 cents by the publishers.

Just published,

THE HERMITS. By the Rev. CHARLES KINGSLEY, M.A., author of "Westward Ho!" etc. With three plates and colored vignette title. 12mo, extra blue cloth, $2; extra gilt, $2 25. Being Vol. II. of the "Sunday Library."

A SUMMER IN ICELAND. By C. W. PAIJKULL. Translated by M. R. BARNARD, B.A. With map and numerous illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $5.

JOHN WARD'S GOVERNESS: A Novel. By A. L. MACGREGOR. 12mo, fine cloth, $1 75.

THE HOLY LAND: A Record of Travel. By WILLIAM HEPWORTH DIXON, editor of the Athenæum, London. New cheap edition, illustrated with steel plates and woodcuts, from original drawings and photographs, 12mo, extra cloth, $3.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

LONDON BOOKS.

PRICED CATALOGUE

No. 10,

Containing selections from our Stock in the Departments of

| | |
|---|---|
| THEOLOGY, | THE CLASSICS, |
| HISTORY, | BIOGRAPHY, |
| VOYAGES AND TRAVELS, | POETRY, |
| THE DRAMA, | FRENCH AND ITALIAN, |
| SCIENCE, | MEDICINE, |
| AND GENERAL LITERATURE. | |

Now ready, and will be sent free of charge to any address.

A. DENHAM & CO.,

Importers of English and Foreign Books,

49 BARCLAY STREET,

NEW YORK.

NEW BOOKS.

I.

LIVES AND DEEDS WORTH KNOWING ABOUT, with other Miscellanies. By the Rev. W. F. STEVENSON. Printed on toned paper, crown 8vo, cloth, $1 50.

II.

THE FRESH AND SALT WATER AQUARIUM. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, author of "Common Objects of the Country and Seashore," etc. With eleven colored illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

III.

POEMS WRITTEN FOR A CHILD. By Two Friends. With sixteen illustrations. Square 16mo, cloth, gilt edges, $1 50.

IV.

THE WHITE COCKADE; or, Faith and Fortitude. A Novel. By JAMES GRANT. 12mo, boards, 80 cents.

 Any of the above will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,
416 Broome Street, New York.

NEW EDITION, REVISED.

MR. MORRIS'S NEW POEM,

THE EARTHLY PARADISE.

The new and revised edition of this book is now ready.

One volume 16mo, price $2.

Sold by all booksellers, and mailed post-paid by the publishers.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction. Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, New York.

Just published, and will be mailed free on receipt of a postage stamp,

CATALOGUE

OF

THE LIBRARY COLLECTED BY THE LATE PROFESSOR AMOS DEAN, OF ALBANY, N. Y.,

For sale, at the very moderate prices affixed, by

JOSEPH SABIN, Bookseller,
84 Nassau Street, New York.

This Catalogue forms a volume of 186 pages.

TEACHERS

Interested in History, Mythology, Anglo-Saxon, Early English, Hebrew, French, German, Italian, and Spanish are invited to acquaint us with their specialties and send for our catalogue before selecting text-books for the approaching season. Our principal publications in French, German, and Saxon are in use at YALE, HARVARD, WASHINGTON COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, and other leading institutions.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, New York.

READY TO-DAY, No. V. OF THE

QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF PSYCHOLOGICAL MEDICINE

AND

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

Edited by WM. A. HAMMOND, M.D., Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the Bellevue Hospital Medical College.

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

I. Chlorosis a Disease of the Nervous System. By Prof. Wm. A. Hammond, M.D.
II. Suicide and Insanity. By T. Edwards Clark, M.D., Ph.D.
III. The Legal Consequences of Insanity. By Prof. S. Henry Dickson, M.D., LL.D.
IV. A Consideration of the More Remarkable of the Remarks by Counsellor Simon Stern upon the Law of Rape. By Prof. Horatio R. Storer, M.D.
V. A Case of Epilepsy Successfully Treated with Strychnia. By R. L. Parsons, M.D.
VI. Singular Development of Language in a Child. By E. R. Hun, M.D.
VII. Further Remarks on Organic Infantile Paralysis. By Prof. Wm. A. Hammond, M.D.
VIII. The Formation of the Mixed Human Races. By M. De Quatrefages. Translated by E. S. Dunster, M.D.

Under the heading of "CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE" are full notices of recent publications, and in the "CHRONICLE" will be found a rare collection of important cases of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System, and Medical Jurisprudence, as well as interesting and valuable selections of Miscellaneous Scientific and Professional Items and Observations.

Subscription price, $5 per annum; single numbers, $1 50.

The undersigned also publish the NEW YORK MEDICAL JOURNAL, issued monthly, 96 pages, and edited by DRS. W. A. HAMMOND and E. S. DUNSTER.

Subscription price, $5 per annum; single numbers, 50 cents.

The two Journals are commuted at $8 per annum. Terms strictly in advance.

D. APPLETON & CO.,
90, 92, and 94 Grand Street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston,

HAVE FOR SALE

The following Miscellaneous Standard Works:

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE, from the Commencement of the French Revolution, 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons, 1815. Latest and best edition. 23 vols. 8vo, and Atlas, 4to, half calf, extra. Edinburgh, 1860.

NOTES AND QUERIES; the three series complete, from November, 1849, to June, 1867. A handsome copy in 35 vols. small 4to, half calf, gilt tops. London, 1850-67.

LOCKE'S WORKS, with Life. By LORD KING. 11 vols. 8vo, sprinkled calf, marbled edges. London, 1824-30.

FULLER'S WORKS. Worthies of England, Church History, and Holy and Profane States. 10 vols. 8vo, polished calf, extra, gilt tops, edges uncut. London, 1840.

FROIS'S ART AND MONSTRELET'S CHRONICLES. Best editions, in 24 vols. 8vo, and Atlas of Plates, 4to, half morocco, gilt tops, edges uncut. London, 1808-10.

NOUVELLE BIOGRAPHIE GENERALE. 46 vols. 8vo, half morocco. Paris, 1862-66. The best Biographical Dictionary published.

BRIDGEWATER TREATISES. Complete in 13 vols. 8vo, polished calf, extra, gilt tops, edges uncut. Wm. Pickering, London, 1833.

Also, elegant copies of the Aldine Poets, large paper; British Essayists, large paper; Grote's History of Greece; Strickland's Queens of England and Scotland; Encyclopædia Britannica; Smith's Dictionaries; The London Punch; Knight's Pictorial Shakespeare, original edition; Irving's Works, large paper; Scott's Waverley Novels, etc., etc.

---

WEBSTER'S

School Dictionaries.

NEW EDITIONS. ILLUSTRATED.

This popular Series is very justly regarded as the only National standard authority in ORTHOGRAPHY, DEFINITION, and PRONUNCIATION.

Webster's Primary School Dictionary. This work may be used as a text-book for teaching Spelling.

Webster's Common School Dictionary. With the improvements made, this book can now be advantageously used as a text-book for systematic instruction in Spelling. The illustrations have been selected with care, and with a view to usefulness rather than mere ornament.

Webster's High School Dictionary. In the hands of an accomplished teacher, this volume may be made highly useful in schools, since it furnishes material for a valuable course of exercises on words, including their orthography, pronunciation, definition, composition, syllabication, and the like.

Webster's Academic Dictionary. New edition, with valuable additions and improvements. A most valuable text-book for systematic instruction in the English language. Finely illustrated.

Webster's Counting-House and Family Dictionary. With important additions, improvements, and appropriate illustrations.

Webster's Pocket Dictionary.

Webster's Army and Navy Dictionary. By Capt. E. C. BOYNTON, of West Point Military Academy.

 Correspondence and orders will receive prompt attention.

Address the Publishers,

IVISON, PHINNEY, BLAKEMAN & CO.,

47 and 49 Greene Street, New York.

---

TO THE TRADE.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE, 1868.

FROM AUG. 20 TO SEPT. 25.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK, August, 1868.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully invite attention to their List of Books, which they will sell on the following Terms, for Cash, from the 20th of August to the 25th of September, after which their Terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount, and Five per cent. for cash.

" 500 " 30 " " " "

" 1,000 " 33⅓ " " " "

" 2,000 " 35 " " " "

THEY WILL NOT SELL AT ANY OF THE TRADE SALES THIS FALL.

---

"The National & Metropolitan Magazine."

PUTNAM'S MAGAZINE

FOR SEPTEMBER

NOW READY.

I. Camping Out in Siberia.
II. At Sunset.
III. John and Bridget: A Talk about Names.
IV. Autographs, III.
V. A Three-Horned Dilemma.
VI. The Pine.
VII. French Newspapers.
VIII. Saved from the Asylum.
IX. Hellas.
X. Organ Chant.
XI. Too True. Chap. XV.
XII. Louis XVII. and Eleazer Williams: Were they the same Person?
XIII. Threescore.
XIV. In the Saddle.—On the Plains. I.
XV. On a Very Small Subject.
XVI. Eliot's Indian Bible.
XVII. Pathway of a Great Enterprise.
XVIII. Baron Bunsen.
XIX. The New York Post-Office.
XX. The Situation and the Candidates.
XXI. Literature.
XXII. Table-Talk.

The "Northern Monthly" is incorporated with this Magazine.

Price 35 cents. $4 per annum. Liberal terms for Clubs.

C. P. PUTNAM & SON,

661 Broadway, New York.

---

REPUBLICAN

CAMPAIGN ENVELOPES FOR 1868.

Unique, Handsome, Significant, True, Ornamental, Useful, and Historical.

ON THE FRONT—The names of the distinguished candidates, with the latest heart sentiment of each. ON THE REVERSE—A Complete Synopsis of the Republican Platform.

The Political campaign of 1868 is destined to be the most memorable of any since the foundation of the Republic. There can be no more expressive souvenir of the Republican aspect of it than these envelopes.

Every Citizen should have a few, at least, to keep for posterity. Copyright secured. Republicans will, of course, use and circulate them extensively as possible.

100 sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.
400 " " " " " " 3.
1,000 " " " " " " 5.
5,000 sent by express, at $4 per 1,000.
10,000 or more, sent by express, at $3 50 per 1,000.

WM. P. LYON & SON,

Envelope Manufacturers,

537 Pearl Street, New York.

---

MORE MYSTERY.

PLANCHETTE OUTDONE.

THE PENDULUM ORACLE!

Moves for everybody!

Answers any question AT ONCE.

Will tell your inmost thoughts, and astonish as well as amuse all who consult it.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR.

To be had at retail of SCHIFFER & CO., 713 Broadway.

Trade supplied by WALTON VAN LOAN, 111 William Street, New York.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 165. THURSDAY, AUGUST 27, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 161
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Probable Effects of the Decision on the Legal Tender Act ..... 164
The Southern Legislatures and the Electoral Vote ..... 165
The Empire and the "Lanterne" .... 166
Lying for the Right ..... 167
CORRESPONDENCE:
Reconstruction at Yale College ..... 169
NOTES:
Literary ..... 170
Montlong's Mexican Revelations ..... 172
Ruskin's Modern Painters ..... 173
Hospital Days ..... 174
Magazines for September ..... 175
A Man in Earnest ..... 176
The Gordian Knot ..... 177
Books of the Week ..... 177

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

MAINE being ready to speak, it is hardly worth while to prophesy as to the result of the contest, but we think no one who does not live in the South with Democratic neighbors about him need disquiet himself in regard to the turbulence of the Southern leaders. The news relating to the canvass in the North seems to be all in favor of the Republicans. The campaign has passed through two stages, and may now be said to be in that one which will last till after the day of the election. At first Grant's election was conceded by everybody; it was only a question among the Democrats as to who should have the compliment of the nomination. After Seymour was put up, and it was found that there was not so noisy and utterly disastrous a stampede from the Democratic fold as most impartial observers had predicted, the Democrats began to pick up courage, and this unexpected confidence lasted through the period of "ratification meetings." But now that both parties have got fairly at work, and that there are seen to be no disgusted Republicans left, while disgusted Democrats of considerable prominence—from the Hon. Mr. Weston, of Maine, to Mr. Sibley, of California, and from Chief-Justice Pearson in North Carolina to Judge Lindley in Indiana—are each week pronouncing in favor of Grant and Colfax, the Republicans feel their strength, and the Democratic rejoicings of a fortnight or three weeks ago sensibly abate. From Indiana the news is decidedly adverse to Democratic hopes. The Republicans have perfected a canvassing system not much inferior apparently—considering the more "magnificent distances"—to that which works so well in New Hampshire; mass-meetings are the order of the day, and are enthusiastically attended; the Democrats decline to meet their opponents on the stump; and altogether there is every indication that the result of the October election will not only give the Republicans the State, but will be of a kind to encourage the party for its November struggle. So also of Ohio, which the best-informed authorities, looking at the State by Congressional districts, pronounce absolutely sure for the Republicans by a majority a good many times larger than the majority of three thousand by which it was retained last fall. Pennsylvania is still to be put down as doubtful; it will take hard work to overcome the small Democratic majority, but we hear of some hard work being done. At the worst, then, giving Pennsylvania to the Democrats, the October elections, so important in their influence upon the "weak-kneed," will, no doubt, on the whole, be favorable to the Republicans. And nothing short of their being very unfavorable could, so far as we can see, prevent Grant's getting a majority of the 317 electoral votes, which are all there are even if we count the votes of Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi. Seymour may carry Pennsylvania (doubtful), New York (not certain), Connecticut (which will go Republican if Pennsylvania goes so in October, and possibly will go so in any event), Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey (a State which there is a chance of Grant's carrying), Oregon, Alabama (which is as yet doubtful), Arkansas, Mississippi, Texas, Georgia, and Virginia, and Grant will still have all he needs.

---

Apparently the campaign in the Southern States gets more and more bitter, despite the somewhat less violent language which the orators have been warned to employ. Not that they do not allow themselves full swing on all subjects but that of open war against the present State governments. They make up for their enforced silence on that point by gross abuse of their opponents. Wade Hampton says, in a speech made in Anderson District the other day: "These scallawags and traitors should be branded with infamy and eternally stigmatized. . . . . The word scallawag is used by drovers to describe the mean, lousy, and filthy kine that are not fit for butchers or dogs. . . . . They have dishonored their State, and heaped everlasting shame on their families. . . . . There are no words in the English language to express the utter contempt entertained by me for these renegades and traitors"—white Unionists, namely. For a year or so after the war a man suspected of being a Yankee took his life in his hand when he went into Anderson District; it is one of the darkest corners of the South. Possibly speeches like this last one from Hampton may do something towards bringing back the halcyon days of 1865. Another gentleman, speaking at the same meeting, says: "Who is Scott, before high heaven? He is the best-looking omnibus-driver I have seen in some time." "Scott" being General Scott, a hard-headed, sensible Western man, a brave soldier, and probably gentlemanly enough to think meanly of himself if he should foam at the mouth and call names when discussing the character and claims of his political opponents. Colonel Thomas was another of the Anderson orators, and of him we hear that "Colonel Thomas then described the South Carolina Legislature as a conclave of ignominy, ignorance, baseness, and depravity."

---

On either side of South Carolina, in Georgia and North Carolina, the canvass goes on, and the latter State becomes each day more certainly Republican. Chief-Justice Pearson's recent Grant and Colfax letter is worth thousands of votes to the Republicans, the judge being probably the most respected man in the whole State. Georgia, it seems to be daily more probable, will be carried by the Democrats. In the Legislature, on Monday last, a resolution was offered which declares that the State is full of "organizations in open hostility to the public peace and good order, threatening violence, and in many instances opposing the execution of the laws." The Southern governors, meantime, cannot procure arms from the Secretary of War, in consequence of an unrepealed provision of the Army Appropriation Bill of the last session of the last Congress, which was aimed at the negro-harrying militia companies of Mr. Johnson's provisional governors. In Alabama, too, the Republicans have work before them if they are to keep the State. From Mississippi we hear that the Democratic State Committee, which acts temporarily as a State Convention of the party, talks seriously of nominating Presidential electors in the face of the law which declares that the electoral vote of Mississippi shall not be counted. An adjourned meeting of the committee is to be held on the day after that appointed for the possible September session of Congress; and should Congress not then meet, one may expect this wanton incitement to disturbance. Louisiana remains quiet; General Buchanan has ordered his subordinates to send him word by telegraph if they apprehend trouble within the limits of their commands, but not to use troops without orders from him. He certainly ought to have the State well in hand, and will be held responsible for any outbreak that may occur. The Texas and Virginia Democrats are said to have in contemplation the line of action which those of Mississippi are supposed to intend following. In Tennessee the Legislature has in hand a bill which could hardly be more lavish in its gift of power to Governor Brownlow if the State were involved in civil war. It will probably pass, for, in fact, Middle and West Tennessee are even now in a condition not far removed from civil war, and nobody thinks the state of things will improve between now and November.

---

The Brooklyn Union, which certainly knows more about the political condition of Brooklyn than we do, denies the accuracy of our statement about the lukewarmness of the Brooklyn Republicans, and says that, although they might do better, they are doing well. As regards the State of New York, the Tribune is very confident of a Republican victory, but gives expression to its confidence in its usual way—and that way, we need hardly say, gives no human being a clear idea of the real state of the case. Its general theory is, as well as we can make it out, that the Republican defeats in New York have always occurred on occasions of secondary interest; that "on a vigorous canvass and a full poll," such as this is sure to be, a Republican victory is certain. The small majority last year it ascribes to the absence of thousands of Republicans "in Europe and travelling on business"—as if the Democrats did not go to Europe or travel on business also—to the bad conduct of three Republican dailies in this city, and to from ten to twenty thousand fraudulent votes. This year a greater effort will doubtless be made, and Republicans have fewer burdens to bear in the shape of bad local legislation and local frauds. But then the Democrats as well as Republicans will be home from Europe; there is no improvement in the character of the "Republican dailies." As to the fraudulent votes, when the Tribune, in reply to the question, Will they not be cast this year in as large numbers as ever? replies, "No; we shall be wide-awake and on the alert this year; we shall be watching the villains," etc., there is nothing left for sensible men to do but to lay down the paper and smile. Everybody is so familiar with this kind of talk, and has seen it so often followed by defeat, that its continuance argues extraordinary contempt for the public understanding on the part of those who use it. The result in this State will depend, in the main, on the majority the Democrats carry out of this city and Brooklyn. That that will be enormous no one doubts, but it is a majority which, of course, exertion on the part of the Republicans can diminish.

---

Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, has been making a very able speech on the situation, in which he reiterates his heresies about the bonds, but neutralizes them by the admission that though the bonds may be payable in greenbacks, the greenbacks are certainly payable, and payable at once, in gold. The Tribune, which certainly shines in the greenback controversy, replies to this in a really unanswerable article, which, if printed together with Sherman's speech, would make a campaign document of the best kind. It points out that the very fact that the greenbacks are made by "the letter of the law" convertible into bonds at the pleasure of the holder, proves that the legislature did not suppose the bonds might be paid off in greenbacks, for the bondholder, under the contract, would have the right to demand instantly another bond.

---

We are glad to see that General Butler is not going to resemble the somewhat celebrated Smithers, and "walk the course" in his Congressional district. The Grant Club of Salem, which seems to number among its members some of the best men of Salem and the region round about, have just "denounced" him—denounced him by implication to be sure, and without making bold to mention their new neighbor by name, still their references are direct enough to be understood. "Our candidates," they say, "must be supporters of the Republican party and its principles. They must be worthy men, loyal men, men of good moral character. They must be nominated, and fairly nominated, upon the Republican issues alone." Then, too, they adopted these resolutions: "Resolved, that we heartily endorse the platform of the Republican party, and ratify its nomination of Grant and Colfax; that it is repudiation either to substitute greenbacks for United States bonds or to retain under the name of taxation any part of the interest due thereon." If now the honest and honorable Republicans of the Fifth District, remembering the truth—it is the simple truth, neither more nor less—that to send Mr. Butler to Congress is to injure their own reputation and that of Massachusetts, will work as hard against Butler and Loring as these two worthies have been working for themselves, they will deserve and receive the thanks of the whole party.

---

It must in justice be said of the World that it has been since 1862 the only approach to an opposition the country has had, and the only Democratic paper which has ever presented "the other side" of any question of the day with clearness and ability. It has doubtless more than neutralized any good it has done in this way by its faults, of which we have often spoken, and everybody knows what they are. Its greatest fault has undoubtedly been its gross and shameful abuse of General Grant, into which, we would fain hope for the credit of the press, it has been dragged by the low cravings of the rank and file of the Democratic party. It has, however, within a few days, sought to account for the extraordinary contradiction between its judgment on Grant in 1865 and its judgment on him in 1868—both judgments being very elaborate and written in its most careful style—by announcing that, in 1865, it was led away by its "enthusiasm," and said of Grant, while in the glow, that which calm consideration now shows to have been totally untrue. We give this explanation to the public for what it is worth.

---

If correct, it furnishes an awful warning to the enthusiasts of all parties, and especially to the Boston Commonwealth. Surely, after following the World's criticisms of Grant, they will beware of getting into "a glow." Our advice likewise is, and we offer it once more with great deference, to try in political discussion the human understanding simply. When one of them has written an article, let him, before sending it to the printer, strike out all the poetic and vituperative parts. The remainder, it is true, will present a very poor appearance; but it will still be the work of a human being trying to improve himself, and as such entitled to the respect of all good men. The second attempt will be found still easier, and in favorable cases, where the patient's natural parts are good and his education fair, he will be able in three or four months to write a column of average reasoning in clear, gentlemanly language. To repress the tendency "to glow," there is nothing like a wet towel round the head and sedative draughts. For the tendency to vituperation, the treatment ought to be moral rather than physical—walks in the country, early hours, and association, if possible, with cultivated and well-bred men—though this in many cases would be like prescribing port wine and carriage exercise to a pauper—and the reading of good philosophical works, but not histories or biographies, as "historical parallels" are the patient's worst enemies, and are often fearfully exciting.

---

Brick Pomeroy has accused Grant of stealing molasses, but the story has a feeble air about it, and is not funny. The question for honest Democrats will soon be, What species of commodity known in commerce has Grant not stolen, and what general of ancient or modern times ever displayed such military incapacity as he? The next greatest ass of history must, on the World's theory, have been Napoleon Bonaparte, for he too slaughtered great numbers of men, and was on divers occasions abandoned by his enemies on the field of battle—we suppose through horror of his butcheries and thefts. There is an affidavit from an English captain in "Her Majesty's Merchant Service," whatever that may be, showing that Vallandigham, or "Val.," as Mr. Greeley bitingly calls him, ran the blockade during the war for the purpose of exciting riots in Northern cities. This, however, is not a campaign story proper, because Vallandigham is only a candidate for Congress. Mr. Pendleton and other Democratic stump orators have been speaking very respectfully of Grant, which makes it seem probable that the abuse of him has been found a failure, and that a change of tactics has been resolved on. This, if true, will place the World in a very awkward position.

The World and the Commercial Advertiser have had a terrible encounter during the past week, owing to the former having announced that the Advertiser was going down and would soon expire. Nothing could better illustrate the strength of the commercial instincts of the race than the fury which an insinuation of this kind always inspires. It is between newspapers the equivalent of the soufflet among continental duellists—a sign that all hope and all wish for peaceful relations have passed away. One newspaper may say that the editor of another is a noted cracksman, or has stolen a horse from a one-armed negro, and time, or the intervention of friends, may wipe out the remembrance of the insult; but if it says that his circulation is declining, and will cease on an early day, it is usually taken as an indication of diabolical hate, which renders all further interchange of what are called "the amenities of journalism" impossible, and calls for a few observations on the assailant as "scathing" as time and means will permit. The insinuation is really in most cases resorted to as an expression of deadly hostility—a sort of hoisting of the black flag. It is, of course, of no use against long established and thriving journals, and yet even their nerves are rarely proof against it. The sensitiveness of some of them, whose prosperity is notorious, about their circulation, is amusingly shown in the mutual bets and affidavits to which they so frequently treat the public, and which they evidently consider of the highest interest to everybody. In the present case the Advertiser followed the usual, and, as we think, mistaken course, of getting into a rage and being brutal in reply. But, if we may be allowed to perpetrate "an amenity," we are glad to learn that it is thriving. We confess, however, we miss the articles on "H. G."

---

A party of deputy-sheriffs went to a theatre in this city during the performance to serve a writ on the manager, issued in a suit between him and the proprietor. They forced an entrance by knocking down the door-keeper, and then, going behind the scenes, pistol in hand, opened fire on the crowd of actors and mechanics, wounding a boy mortally and a man seriously, and continued the fire or threats of firing until overpowered by the police. It is not very long since one of the same fraternity went to a lawyer's office in this city to replevin a bill of exchange in a friendly suit, and not finding the lawyer who held it in the office, refused to comply with his partner's request to wait a few minutes, attempted to force the safe, and finally got the partner on the floor and proceeded to strangle him. The life of the latter was saved by the intervention of some clients, when the deputy drew his pistol on them all, and, on being overpowered and disarmed, had them arrested for assault and battery. Complaint was made to the Sheriff, but no notice, we believe, was ever taken of it. The deputy-sheriffs are drawn from the lowest grades of city politicians, and are generally men of pugilistic and pot-house antecedents, who have helped the Sheriff himself at the elections; and the bar has to bear with their idiosyncrasies for the simple reason that a lawyer who made himself obnoxious in the Sheriff's office would find his writs so extraordinarily difficult to execute that his business would leave him. From the courts, under the present system, there is of course no redress to be had, for the same reason that there is no use in complaining to the Sheriff himself. He has in this instance written a most impertinent letter to the police justice, offering to take the blame of the conduct of his men on himself. But his share of the blame lies in his having such men in his employment. The penalty of their crimes they must pay in person. There is this peculiarity about all that relates to the administration of justice in this city, that what is told of it in the papers is always an understatement. Generally the press exaggerates; in this case, strange to say, it conceals or diminishes. The real horrors are only heard in private conversation.

---

M. Rochefort's affairs, which may now be said to furnish the topic in which Frenchmen are most interested, are becoming more and more complicated. It appears that he gave way after all, and did finally publish the ministerial communication about M. Billault and M. Sandon, but not till he had been prosecuted for refusing to do it. Moreover, instead of its occupying forty pages of his paper, as he said it would, it only occupied nineteen; and instead of injuring his paper, it served it, for the number containing it sold as no number had ever done before, and in acknowledging this he invites the minister to become a regular contributor, and offers him five sous a line and a loaf of bread every day. It is right to add that the ministerial communication is neither more nor less than the report of the committee of the Senate on the Sandon case, from which it appears that M. Sandon was an unmistakable lunatic, and was so certified to be by the principal mad-doctors of Paris, and that all M. Billault had to do with his detention was his prosecuting him for an attempt to extort money by writing threatening letters. He was a monomaniac only, however, his delusion being that he had been outrageously wronged by M. Billault, and when M. Billault died all good reason for his detention was at an end. In short, M. Rochefort does not come well out of this affair, and, in fact, shows clearly that he is by no means a politician, or anything but a witty and not very scrupulous Frenchman turned "little digger." We have a swarm of such men in the press here, but few so bright.

---

La Lanterne has, however, been at last suppressed, the police even seizing the copies they saw sticking out of people's pockets in the street. The number contains an account of an assault committed by M. Rochefort on the publisher of one of the petits journaux, in which, he says, agents of the police had been defaming him, with the view of provoking and entrapping him. They first attacked only his personal character, then assailed the memory of his mother, and, hearing that they were going to libel his daughter, a school-girl of twelve years of age, he went and thrashed the publisher in default of other satisfaction. For this he has been sentenced to four months' imprisonment. The same journal which libelled him libelled also M. Wolff, one of the writers for the Figaro, in a similar manner. M. Wolff, instead of taking the law into his own hands, appealed to the courts, and the defendant was convicted and fined one franc. This case was mentioned in our correspondent's letter a fortnight ago. These petits journaux have reached a lower depth of degradation than any other newspaper since the press came into existence, not excepting the La Crosse Democrat, for even it and the Southern papers, we believe, respect the female relatives of their victims; and so do, thus far, the "little diggers" of our Northern journals.

---

Some amusing details of the voting of the last French loan of $100,000,000—which, by the way, has been taken in a rush, but at a lower rate than American securities now bring in the European markets—have been received by mail. The debate in the Senate on the bill—one of the most important of the session—consisted of one speech of eighteen lines from the reporter, the Marquis of Audriffet. The committee on the bill had it twenty-four hours under consideration, including their sleeping and eating hours. The vote followed immediately after the marquis's speech. There were ninety-one senators present, and there was a majority of ninety-one for the bill, and the division was followed by cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" and an immediate adjournment. Our distinguished representative, Mr. Cobb, when he moved last session the introduction of a bill taxing Government bonds ten per cent., and then immediately afterwards moved "the previous question" also, evidently had some such swift legislation as this in his glorious eye; but we are still behind the French in many things, and he had to submit to the stupid formality of a short debate.

---

The Emperor has delivered a short speech at Troyes, in which he declared that the peace of Europe was in no danger of being disturbed, and the newspapers have been discussing it ever since. It has given a good deal of relief in business circles, but there is still in many quarters a lurking suspicion that his last word has not been said. The opinion that France must fight soon is certainly stronger amongst well-informed persons than it was a year ago. The armament is too great to be borne without war, and the dynasty is for various reasons in a weakly state. The story is in circulation that the Queen of England has gone abroad on a diplomatic mission, having in view a general disarmament. The state of her health only is sufficient to make the report ridiculous, though there are plenty of other reasons for paying no heed to it.

PROBABLE EFFECTS OF THE DECISION ON THE LEGAL TENDER ACT.

THE influence of all legislation affecting ever so remotely the currency of a country is so widespread that the approaching decision of the Supreme Court touching the constitutionality of the Legal Tender Act, to which we called attention in our last issue, is beginning to be very seriously discussed among many very different classes of the community. The political, or, more correctly speaking, the partisan importance attaching to the mode of paying the national debt, and to other purely financial questions, has caused the currency difficulties to be temporarily lost sight of; but thinking men have always known that before this currency question even the debt and taxation fade into comparative insignificance, and that no attempt in whatsoever direction to re-establish our financial affairs on a solid basis can be of the slightest avail until we have first restored to health and soundness that foundation of all finances—our currency. Not the wisdom of our representatives, not the forethought of our Treasury officials, but the practical necessities of daily business transactions are bringing this issue to a settlement—a new and striking illustration of the incompetence or backwardness of the whole body of officials.

What is the question that the Supreme Court will be called on to decide? Not, as many people may think, Is the Legal Tender Act constitutional? Issues do not come before the Supreme Court in that shape. The Supreme Court, like any other court, can only decide questions of right between individuals. Brown owes Jones a thousand dollars. Brown hands Jones a one thousand dollar greenback in payment. Jones refuses to receive it, demands one thousand dollars in American gold coin, and sues Brown for that amount. The question for the Supreme Court to decide is: What does Brown owe to Jones? and nothing more. Brown appeals to the Legal Tender Act, which says that the greenback shall be a legal tender for all debts public and private, and claims that all he owes to Jones is paid by the thousand dollar greenback. The court decides, supposing that should be its decision, that the laws of the country know no dollars except gold dollars, that Brown's appeal to the Legal Tender Act cannot be admitted, because that act, in the opinion of the court, is not in accordance with the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, and is therefore no law at all, and that Brown owes and must pay one thousand dollars in gold coin. This decision, of course, fully and finally settles the case of Brown and Jones, and for all practical purposes settles in advance all future cases of a precisely similar nature, and to that extent entirely destroys the force and validity of the so-called Legal Tender Act. But, as before stated, the Supreme Court decides only on questions of right between individual suitors, and its decision in any one case can of course prejudge only cases that are precisely similar. It is therefore desirable to state more explicitly what the general nature of the different cases may be that are likely to come up for decision, without any reference to the cases actually under consideration.

The cases likely to come before the Supreme Court under the Legal Tender Act may be placed in four different groups: 1st, Claims for payment in coin of engagements entered into prior to the passage of the Legal Tender Act, in cases where the original contract simply calls for the payment of dollars; 2d, Claims for payment in coin of engagements entered into subsequent to the passage of the act, where the contract specifically states or clearly implies that payment is to be made in coin; 3d, Claims for payment in coin of engagements entered into either prior or subsequent to the passage of the act, in cases between foreigners and American citizens, where the contract was made abroad, and does not specify the nature of the currency; 4th, Claims for payment in coin of engagements entered into subsequent to the passage of the act, in cases where the contract does not specify the nature of the currency. It will be seen that almost every case likely to arise can be placed in one or other of these groups, and that at least four decisions on four different cases will be necessary to enable the general public to understand how its interests are to be affected by the opinion of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the Legal Tender Act.

As far as the political and legal associations and the implied or expressed opinions of the majority of the judges enable us to arrive at a conclusion, we are, as stated in our former article, very decidedly convinced that the court will base all its decisions on the declared unconstitutionality of the Legal Tender Act, and that, in all cases belonging to the three first groups described above, the court will decide that payment is due and must be made in United States gold coin. In the fourth case, however, we are, after mature consideration, more inclined to believe that the decision will be against the claimant, on the ground that, although the Legal Tender Act be unconstitutional, and the very issue of the greenbacks perhaps be illegal, yet the existence of the greenbacks and their undisputed acceptance as the general popular currency was an accomplished fact of unquestioned notoriety, and that after the passage of the act and the issue of the currency every contract made was made with the knowledge of the act and of the currency, and with the implied understanding, which is absolutely not to be questioned, that, in the absence of all other specification, payment was to be made in the accepted, universal, undisputed currency of the time. We repeat: if our judgment of the men composing the Supreme Court is correct, they will decide that an agreement to pay money, if made before the passage of the Legal Tender Act, is an agreement to pay gold coin; and that an agreement to pay money, if made subsequent to the passage of the act, is an agreement to pay greenbacks; and that an agreement to pay gold coin, no matter when or where made, is an agreement to pay gold coin, and cannot be settled by the tender of greenbacks or of anything else, but solely by the payment of the only money known to the Constitution. These decisions would be in accordance not only with the known views and antecedents of the majority of the judges, but with equity, common sense, and the requirements of an exalted statesmanship. The injustice of the Legal Tender Act is generally admitted. The great majority of wrongs perpetrated under it cannot ever be repaired, but under the supposed decision of the Supreme Court no further injustice could be done in any case originating prior to the act and not yet settled, while it is possible that some redress may even be found for flagrant cases settled by consent or under judicial decision. In no case can the gross injustice practised in 1862 upon creditors under the protection of the Legal Tender Act be an excuse for, or an argument in favor of, practising a similar or worse injustice upon the debtor class in 1868. In fact, the history of the world has shown that, while wholesale injustice to creditors, if rare, is still possible, wholesale injustice to debtors is a practical impossibility, and has never been attempted without resulting in revolution and social anarchy. The recognized impossibility of this injustice, as well as the moral aspect of the injustice itself, make it seem likely that the declaration of the unconstitutionality of the Legal Tender Act will not practically involve the compulsory payment in coin of legal tender engagements now outstanding.

If our view of the approaching decision be correct, its main effect will be to establish virtually a double currency for the United States, by declaring that the only currency recognized by the Constitution, the gold coin currency, is the only currency that the law can recognize; that all debts of whatsoever nature are legally payable in coin; but that if contracts exist between individuals calling for payment without specifying the kind of currency, although the judicial presumption thereafter will be in favor of a gold coin currency, yet proof shall be admissible that another currency—greenback currency—was intended, and that the burden of such proof shall thereafter fall upon the debtor instead of the creditor. It is evident that this re-establishment of a gold coin currency legalizes gold contracts far more completely and more satisfactorily than the otherwise well-intended but unsuccessful legislative attempts of the last session of Congress, and is, of course, as we have constantly urged, an important step towards a resumption of specie payments. It is equally evident that the declaration of the unconstitutionality of the Legal Tender Act must debar the Government of the United States from ever claiming any legal right to pay its indebtedness in greenbacks. But beyond the legalization of gold contracts, the settlement of some important relations between individuals, and the additional force given to the claim that the debt of the United States is payable in coin, the supposed action of the Supreme Court in declaring the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional is not likely to produce immediate results. It is certainly very far from at once restoring specie payments, as many sanguine people seem to expect it will, for the simple reason that, as we have repeatedly shown in these columns, specie payments had been suspended long before the Legal Tender Act was dreamed of, and that the Legal Tender Act merely attempted to legalize a state of things brought about by events entirely beyond legislative control. The Legal Tender Act did not produce suspension, but it rendered resumption more difficult; its abolition cannot restore specie payments, but it no longer renders resumption impossible.

The essential condition of a resumption of specie payments is a reasonable degree of certainty that the coin required for banking reserves shall not be suddenly withdrawn for export or for hoarding. The suspension of specie payments was brought about by the withdrawal of the banking reserves for hoarding. The resumption of specie payments is prevented by the steady and increasing withdrawal for export of the coin required for banking reserves. Our domestic fears brought about suspension; but it is the condition of our foreign commerce that renders resumption impossible. For three years past our supply of coin has steadily decreased, the exports during the last six months alone being over fifty millions, or double the total product of the Pacific States during that time. For three years past the mistaken policy of our Treasury management has made our gold coin, our precious bank reserves, our only hope for an early resumption, the cheapest article in our markets, and has actually held out an inducement to foreigners to come and take it away. While Mr. McCulloch was doing his best to make our bank reserves as cheap as possible, the Legal Tender Act was making them practically useless, by exposing the lender of gold to the risk of having his loan repaid in greenbacks. This last evil the abolition of the Legal Tender Act would greatly tend to remove, and would to that extent contribute to the resumption of specie payments. But as long as our national extravagance permits or encourages the continuance of our present enormous importation of foreign merchandise, so long will our supplies of coin continue to decrease, the resumption of specie payments be rendered more difficult and more distant, and the abolition of the Legal Tender Act be of but slight avail. Nevertheless, as the first step in the right direction, after long, weary days of wandering from the true path—as the first sign of returning judgment after years of dementia—let us by all means offer it welcome, and let us hope that our anticipations of the course of action to be adopted by the Supreme Court may prove to be well founded. The Legal Tender Act once removed from our path, the peace that General Grant bespeaks once restored, we shall only need to return to our old ways of honesty and economy to see ourselves once more resume our old career of prosperity and progress.

THE SOUTHERN LEGISLATURES AND THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

We have not been very much impressed by the arguments of those Republicans who commend Governor Smith because he vetoed the bill empowering the Legislature of Alabama to cast the electoral vote of that State. For there seems to us very good grounds to fear that any popular election held in Alabama next fall will be, so far as concerns the expression of the popular will, a farce. If it does not turn out a bloody farce, it will be, if we are not mistaken, simply because many voters of the majority, being in fear of their lives, will submit to a minority threatening violence. The Federal soldiers in Alabama are very few; just how small is their number we do not know, but South Carolina is as well supplied with garrisons as Alabama and the South generally, and in all that State the military posts are to be but three —Charleston, Columbia, and Aiken. Now, we have no manner of doubt —no one needs have any doubt who has heard what General Thomas says about Tennessee, or who reads Southern papers and the reports of Southern speeches — that without United States troops to prevent intimidation, and even murder, the colored voters of Alabama, to say nothing of the white loyalists, will have to stay away from a good many of the polling-places, unless they choose to hazard a fight. Every day's news from the South shows that the hopes of what may be called the rebel element of the population have never been so high since the war as they are now, nor the determination so strong to take all possible means of carrying the South for Seymour and Blair. Everybody knows what it is that the Southern Democrat hopes for from the success of that ticket, and how little there is except his own will to prevent his taking the extremest measures to bring about the desired result, and how successful such measures were in Mississippi, despite the decided majority of colored voters in that State. What reason Governor Smith or any other man can have for supposing that the next election in Alabama will be a tolerably fair one we cannot see, nor hardly how anybody can expect it to be peaceful.

If this is really the state of the case, why should not Alabama, Louisiana, and Georgia follow Florida's example, and let their legislatures cast their electoral votes? Of course no one doubts their constitutional right to do so; but why, on the ground of high expediency, is it not the best thing to do?

Several objections are brought forward. First, it is said that the present legislatures were not chosen for the purpose of choosing Presidential electors. But to make this objection very weighty, it would seem to be necessary to show, first, that when the people this spring ratified the Radical constitutions and elected members of the legislatures, the issue was not the same as it is now and will be in November; or, secondly, it will be necessary to show that, the issue being the same, the mind of the people has changed. Even if this were admitted, it might be answered that in the case of each constituency the representative would be likely to know the change and to regard it. But the fact is that, unless perhaps in the case of Georgia, there is no reason for supposing that any such change has taken place, and we think no one would say that the issue is not substantially the same. The question now is of the stability of what was this spring established. A Southern vote for Grant, as the Alabama Legislature plainly said, is felt to be essentially the same thing as a vote to go into the Union under the Republican conditions of reconstruction. And we have no more doubt than we have in regard to the identity of the two issues as to whether the legislatures could speak the mind of their constituents on the relative merits of Seymour and Grant. At all events, the Alabama Legislature is as competent to speak for Alabama as her Ku-Klux Klan is, or her disfranchised citizens, and after all that, practically, is about what the matter comes to.

In the second place, it is said—Governor Smith lays great stress on this point—that to take away from the people at large and give to the legislature the right to cast Alabama's vote for President would be unrepublican. This brings us face to face with the practical question again. How republican does Governor Smith suppose would be the election in Mobile, or Atlanta, or Charleston, or New Orleans, should there be in those cities, on the third of November next, no United States police to protect the majority of the voters? How republican will it be in Kingstree and Opelika and Natchitoches? It is not considered unrepublican that the legislatures should elect senators; it was not originally intended, nor was it at first the practice, that the electoral college should have no discretion in giving its votes to the various Presidential candidates before the people. But leaving out of view considerations of that kind, what is there republican in allowing the minority to set at naught by illegitimate means—by main force, in fact —the wishes of the majority? It is simply because for generations the spirit and the whole structure of Southern society was thoroughly unrepublican, as the minority would like to make it now, that we to-day have United States troops there, and negro voters to be protected by them, and Governor Smiths in office. If at present we have republicanism there, if the majority has for a little time been ruling, it is only because hitherto the National Government has supported by the military arm what military force established—recently for the first time established. We may as well admit—Governor Smith and the rest of us—that exceptional means are required for the continuance of the exceptional republican condition in which the South now finds itself, and to which the Southern minority intends to put an end as soon as it can. The military forces of the Government—which we need not again say we are sorry to see withdrawn from the Southern States, which were never so well governed as since 1865—are, practically, no longer available for this purpose. Why not, then, use all possible means which can be found in the Constitution—though they may be somewhat exceptional in character—for subserving the same purpose that has been subserved by the national forces, which for some time have been all that prevented a minority from oversetting the government of the majority? That this overturn should be possible may be and is a bad thing; Governor Smith may believe that it is a state of things which ought to come to an end, and, further, that soon it must come to an end. We are not going to take issue with him as regards that, but we in his place should have held that the new government of Alabama ought at least to be allowed every constitutional chance to live till it can be seen whether the election of Grant and the certainty of four years more of Republican rule will not, as may reasonably be anticipated, have a quieting influence on the now turbulent Southern minorities. Certainly there is no reason for ruining it by a doctrinaire stickling for an abstraction, by an unpractical reverence for a merely nominal republicanism whose practical effect will almost surely be the coercion of the larger by the smaller part of the people.

In the third place, it has been said that the effect at the North of the course which we on the whole feel inclined to recommend to the Southern governors would be damaging to the Republicans in the fall elections. This is matter of opinion; we strongly doubt whether, in view of the accounts that come to us of the terrorism which already begins to reign at the South, the Republican party would not gratify their Southern brethren in going to the utmost limits of constitutional right for the purpose of preventing an election all but absolutely certain to be dishonest, and very likely to be bloody. This last consideration —the probability that on the day of election there will be, in many places, several hours of what may almost be called civil war—this alone, aside from any thought at all as to the effect which the election in these three or four States may have on Grant's prospects, might well enough have prevented Governor Smith's veto.

In the foregoing we are replying, in part, to the arguments of the Chicago Tribune, a journal from which we always dissent with some hesitation. Whether the considerations we bring forward are entitled to any weight or not, the Southern legislatures can best judge. If they believe they can preserve the peace on election day, by all means let the electors be chosen by the popular vote. But any legislature which knows it has not the means of preserving order, and knows that order will not be preserved, owes it to the people to prevent the enactment of a bloody farce, by doing the voting itself. We do not want to see, and we are sure the Chicago Tribune does not, the repetition of what passed in Alabama last spring, when the constitution was defeated. The Unionists, we were then told, were kept from the polls by force and fraud, and it was then solemnly determined by the Republican leaders to disregard the result of the vote and act as if the constitution had been formally adopted, and Alabama was accordingly admitted under it. This we considered at the time a serious blow to republicanism and to popular respect for law and plighted faith, and we do not want to see the party exposed to the temptation of repeating it. It ought, therefore, to ask itself this question now, frankly and fairly: "Are we prepared to see every State in the South carried at the muzzle of the pistol for Seymour and Blair?" If they are, then let the popular vote be taken, and let us have no whining over the result. If they are not, let troops be got ready to preserve order thoroughly—there is no force in the South now for any such purpose; or else let the legislatures vote as they may legally do.

THE EMPIRE AND THE "LANTERNE."

The history of the Lanterne, M. Rochefort's little weekly, furnishes a striking illustration of the difficulties with which the French Government has to contend, and of the vanity of the hopes in which the Emperor has now for seventeen long years been indulging of making his dynasty, before he died, a fundamental political fact, about which discussion might rage without danger to the throne. His theory has been, that what is wanted in order to secure France against the frequent revolutions which have marked her history since 1789 is the formation of new political habits, and that any government which could maintain itself till the habit of respecting it as a fixture—or, as we should call it here, an "institution"—was formed, might count on a career of indefinite duration, perhaps as long as that of the Bourbons. He has, therefore, set deliberately to work to create this habit for the benefit of his own dynasty, and with the firm faith that the thing was possible, and with a firm determination not to stick at trifles in striving after it.

His writings during his exile and imprisonment committed him, as fully as writings, when out of power, can commit a man to anything when in power, to the concession of the largest liberty of debate, both on the platform and in the press; but he has never until now permitted any liberty of debate whatever, and has shown himself in his constitution and in his policy the worst enemy the French press has ever had, except his uncle. This he justifies, however, by alleging—through his partisans, of course—that this freedom of speech can only be safely granted, and is only granted in any country, on condition that something in the Government be treated by all parties as unassailable and unchangeable. This thing in America is, he says, a republican form of government embodied in a written constitution, or, if you will, the sovereignty of the people, and he insists that freedom of speech would not be permitted here if a large portion of the press became the advocates of monarchy, or aristocracy, or anarchy. So in England, the throne or the government of the kingdom by three estates, is treated by all parties as a fundamental, unassailable fact. Were the right of either of them to exist to be questioned by the newspapers every day, society would, in self-defence, curtail the liberty of the press. Let the various political parties in France only treat the Napoleonic dynasty as fixed and sacred, and he will let discussion rage in France also.

Unfortunately, however, to create the habit which in America makes the sovereignty of the people, and in England the legitimacy of the monarchy, the great postulate from which all political controversy starts, a long period of popular acquiescence is needed. This in France can only be secured by repression; but repression stimulates the very questioning which it is intended to drown. Moreover, a parliamentary government involves free discussion as a matter of course. In order to avoid free discussion, you must have the personal government of the monarch; and if you have the personal government of the monarch, you expose the monarch himself to responsibility for all public misfortunes; and as long as he is exposed to this, the habit of respecting the dynasty as a fixture cannot grow up. After seventeen years' experiment, therefore, the Emperor finds himself still moving in a vicious circle, with as little prospect of repose as ever. The legitimacy of the dynasty is not only as much questioned as ever, but a generation has grown up which remembers nothing of the terror which made the coup d'état possible, and caused Louis Napoleon to be hailed as the "Savior of Society." The generation which is now interesting itself in politics, and which is criticising the Empire, and to which the Emperor is looking for the recognition of his son, cares nothing about the "spectre rouge" by which its fathers were so frightened in 1849.

Moreover, the "spectre rouge" can no longer be said to exist. The terrible "Reds" are a thing of the past. Communism, in all its forms, has died a natural death in France. The new generation of workingmen know nothing of it. Their attention is entirely turned to co-operation in various forms—either for production or consumption, or for the extortion of a larger share of profits from capitalists—as the true remedy for the evils of their condition. They no longer expect anything from the state, except greater freedom of action and the reduction of the army. They are no longer hostile to property. The political sense, too, is acknowledged to have grown amongst them with extraordinary rapidity. M. Reybaud, a French economist, who is in general disposed to take a rather low view of the mental and moral condition of the working-men, bears strong testimony in their favor on this point in a recent number of the Revue des Deux Mondes, calling attention to the remarkable fact that the working-men of Paris were the first to take heart after the coup d'état, the first to believe in the possibility of the restoration of political life, when the middle classes were despairing or indifferent, and that it was owing to their exertions, organization, and votes that the first five opposition deputies were returned to the Corps Législatif; and we all know that it was the indignant eloquence of these five that roused France from her stupor, and gave her that consciousness of her degradation to which her present uneasiness is due.

Another circumstance which is rendering the Imperial plan difficult of realization is the great change which has taken place in the condition of Europe since 1851. At that time the reaction was everywhere triumphant. Parliamentary government was supposed to have received a mortal blow. It had failed in France, failed in Austria, and though it lived in Italy it lived miserably on Austrian sufferance, and was generally believed on the Continent to have had a narrow escape in England. Since then it has everywhere triumphed. Austria is free and constitutional; Italy is free and constitutional; Germany is constitutional and nearly free; oligarchy is on its last legs in England, and democracy has come triumphant out of a desperate struggle in the United States. French pride is touched to the quick not simply by the total loss by France of the position of head-propagandist of liberal opinions, which she had held ever since Waterloo, but by seeing her subjected to a régime from which every other Christian country except Russia has escaped as intolerable and degrading, and, to cap the climax, by seeing her standing sentinel over the Pope and assisting in the preparation for an Œcumenical Council, in which it is confidently believed the modern world, with all its works and ways and ideas, including "the principles of '89," will be handsomely cursed.

What is worst of all, the men of education, and especially the young men of education, concentrated in Paris, are dead against the Government. It is "the thing" nowadays, as it was between 1820 and 1830, for French students, artists, literary men, and advocates to hate the priests and the "authorities," and to make demonstrations against them. Competent observers say there has never been such hostility to the clergy in France as these classes now cherish, and lose no opportunity of displaying. The Empire has absolutely no hold on them. When a son of General Cavaignac, Louis Napoleon's old rival, was called up the other day to receive a college prize at the Sorbonne, at the hands of the Minister of Public Instruction, the sturdy young republican refused to go because the Prince Imperial was standing beside the minister, and, as it were, patronizing the ceremony, and the refusal was loudly applauded by his fellows. Sainte-Beuve, as the foe of the Church, is now the hero of the Quartier Latin, and a striking evidence of the extent to which the tide of opposition has risen amongst men of culture of more mature age is afforded by the fact that M. Grévy has just been elected "bâtonnier" or president of the Order of Advocates of Paris, although his professional position is not high, simply because he is an opposition candidate for election to the Corps Législatif. Those who know how sensitive the French are about all the professional proprieties will appreciate the force of this demonstration. Now, it may be true that the peasantry are still devoted to the Empire, but if the peasantry can save the Empire after the intellect of France has turned against it, France must have undergone some great change of which there is as yet no sign. The very centralization to which the Government clings as its main-stay makes the adhesion of the provinces of no use to it, and makes it completely dependent on the capital, in which its enemies most do congregate.

The popularity of M. Rochefort and his Lanterne is under these circumstances easily understood, and so is the sensitiveness of the Government. The kind of attacks he makes on it, which are a combination of rather light wit and biting sarcasm, with somewhat coarse caricature, would certainly be annoying anywhere to individuals, but there is no country but France in which they would be considered dangerous to the state. But the fact is they appeal to what is stronger in Parisian Frenchmen than their political sense, and that is their sense of order and logic. In almost any other community the class to which M. Rochefort belongs—a class which is known here as "lively writers"—produces little or no impression on the public mind. They amuse, and in times of excitement stir up the fire a little, but they never influence the popular judgment on grave questions, and certainly could never bring the public to doubt seriously the right of the Government to exist. But in France the absurdity of a political arrangement or any want of congruity between facts and phrases excites hostility as fierce as would outrages on public liberty, and every political arrangement the country has had since 1789 has been in the strict sense of the word absurd. The speeches and the books and pamphlets of everybody engaged in the work of government have dealt with a state of things which did not exist, with a France of the mind, in fact, which the writer or orator conjured up ad hoc. During the First Empire every public document was drawn on the theory that the first desire as well as duty of every Frenchman was to die for the Emperor. During the Restoration, in like manner, governmental acts were based on the theory that there was nothing Frenchmen desired so much as to wipe out every trace of the Revolution, and live in the shadow of the old altar and throne. In Louis Philippe's day peace, simple peace, was treated as the national summum bonum, and the present Government talks and acts as if all Frenchmen, except a few low-minded persons, were overwhelmed by the spectacle of the Imperial wisdom and goodness. Educated Frenchmen see the humbug of all this just as clearly as "practical" Americans or Englishmen, and when anybody undertakes to expose it artistically, as Rochefort does, they go into ecstasies over his sallies, and may even be roused by them into a fury of disgust; but having no "realizing sense" of the possibility of improvement as the result of discussion or agitation, look on or share in the contest as men look on or share in the abatement of a nuisance, and not as men look on or share in the work of reform. In a healthy political atmosphere Rochefort could no more circulate 125,000 copies of his paper than he could get that number of persons to live on cocktails; and it cannot be said that he is in the least helping on the political education of Frenchmen. People do not turn readily from champagne of this kind to the somewhat flat and unexciting liquids which are all that real liberty and progress in most cases have to offer. They might as well seek to cultivate in a gambling-house or theatre a taste for the sober joys of home and the dull routine of ordinary business.

LYING FOR THE RIGHT.

To any person interested in lies and liars the Presidential campaign offers an opportunity for successful investigation such as is rarely met with. At no other period do the liars show themselves so fearlessly and are the lies to be seen in such abundance and variety. Of course there is always plenty of lying going on around us, but at no other time is there systematic lying with reference to a fixed object. In ordinary times men lie loosely and individually, for all sorts of objects, without order or method. During the campaign they lie on a preconcerted plan, by columns of battalions, every lie being uttered in combination with thousands of others. The interest of the occasion to the scientific observer may therefore be imagined.

The classification of lies devised by the New York Tribune is now the one most generally received, and on the whole it is, perhaps, as good a one as we are likely to have. But it has one serious defect; and it is a defect which well illustrates the justice of John Stuart Mill's remark, that "a true psychology is the indispensable scientific basis of morals, of politics, of the science and art of education"—viz., that in its definition of a lie it entirely overlooks the fact that a lie must be the product of a deliberate intention to deceive, and that therefore its phrase—or, rather, the common phrase—"he lies, and he knows it," is a pleonasm. Nobody can lie without knowing it. This being so, a large number of assertions which Mr. Greeley places in the category of simple lies must be taken out of it, and placed in that of unintentional falsehoods. There is no doubt whatever that the many false statements of his political antagonists which he so frequently exposes are made in good faith, and in the belief that they are true. There are so many versions of every political occurrence, so many ways of looking at the character of every political man, and so many different inferences may be drawn from the simplest bit of statistics, that the cases are very rare indeed in which it is safe to assert positively of a political speaker or writer that "he lies" and is a "villain;" if, indeed, the charge of lying does not always include that of villany. But in the Tribune's classification of well-marked or acknowledged lies—such as most campaign attacks on the character of candidates are—we doubt if any improvement is likely to be made in our time.

The campaign, too, affords a striking illustration of the stimulus which the progress of society has given to lying, and the enormous increase of power which the liar has derived from it. In the ancient and mediæval world the public was doubtless more credulous, but his powers of reaching it were so limited that, no matter how great his skill or energy might have been, he could accomplish very little. Very few of the great liars of antiquity or of the Middle Ages were able to circulate a lie beyond the city in which they lived, and even there only imperfectly. The slander of opponents, too, was, as a weapon either of offence or defence, comparatively worthless, because it required prodigious efforts to get a slander before more than a very small number of persons, or before them in a perfect or effective shape, so rapidly do stories change in passing from mouth to mouth. It therefore required only about half as much virtue to be a truth-teller in old times as it requires now, because the temptation to lie was only about half as strong. The whole ancient and mediæval world offered no such example of the triumph of moral principle as the modern world offers in the person of a truthful editor, or telegraph operator, or orator. A lie told in the agora of a Greek city was comparatively a feeble thing; a lie told on the stump or in an editorial article in the United States has the wings of the morning, and flies to the uttermost ends of the earth. No one can say so heartily as the modern liar, "Knowledge is power," for no one's condition has the growth of knowledge so much improved. The invention of newspapers has, in fact, done for the liar what the invention of gunpowder did for the man-at-arms—it makes difference of strength or weight of no account on the battle-field. In the absence of widely-circulated periodicals, the great or good man with the unblemished reputation cared little for the mendacious Bohemian. His name was known and his character established over a wider area than the Bohemian could possibly cover with his slanders. Now the Bohemian has him at his mercy, just as a boy with a revolver would have a knight armed cap-à-pié at his mercy. When the Bohemian says to 50,000 people that the great man stole a service of plate, or was seen, the night before last, drunk in the gutter, what can the great man do?

It ought to be observed, however, that campaign lies are, unlike the common lies of ordinary periods, told upon a definite theory, and that theory is that to do a great right it is sometimes lawful to do a little wrong. There is very little gratuitous and utterly wicked lying in a Presidential canvass. We have no doubt whatever that even Brick Pomeroy comforts himself with the reflection that his lies are helping in the accomplishment of a great end, and are therefore excusable. To say that Grant is a beastly drunkard, or that he uses stolen plate at his table, is a small matter; whereas to defeat Grant, relieve the South from her "shackles," and overthrow the tyranny of the Radicals, would be a great matter. Therefore it is well to lie on, the guilt of lying, like the guilt of killing, being dependent on circumstances. We feel satisfied, too, that if an examination of motives could be made, it would be found that a large number of the frauds on the Government are committed on a similar principle. The amount that any one man can steal from it, the cheat says, is hardly felt by the nation, while it adds enormously to his happiness and that of his children, and may produce a marked improvement in his character. Of course a regular thief of the lower grade does not number self-improvement amongst the objects of his stealing, but there is no doubt a large number of poor peculators who do. There are few poor men who do not feel that they would find it far easier to be honorable and conscientious if they were well off, and plenty of them put their scruples to sleep by dreams of the pious uses to which they will devote their booty—the churches they will build, and the widows and orphans they will comfort.

It must not be forgotten, too, in judging Brick Pomeroy and his like, that his delusion, if our presumption as to his state of mind be correct, is a very ancient one, and has been and is still shared by men who stand well with the world, and stand well with their own consciences as moralists and reformers. Lying has been freely used in the service of the very best of causes during the last three hundred years, ever since, in fact, the principle of association for religious and philanthropic objects came into common use, and since means of publicity began to be extensive. The Jesuits reduced it to an art, and made it one of their most powerful weapons, openly proclaiming that the use of calumny against the enemies of the order or of the faith was at least excusable, a doctrine which still has a strong hold on the minds of large bodies of excellent men in every Christian country at the present day, though doubtless if presented to them in its naked simplicity they would indignantly repudiate it. Many of our readers doubtless remember Pascal's delicious story, in the "Provincial Letters," of the quarrel between the Jesuit, Father Alby, and M. Puys, a priest of a parish near Lyons. M. Puys published a little book, inculcating the duty of attending one's own parish church, instead of running about after strange preachers. The Jesuits were then preaching a good deal, and Father Alby thought the book was aimed at them. So he denounced M. Puys, who was an old and respected clergyman of unblemished reputation, from the pulpit, as a man of licentious habits, whose intrigues with women were notorious, who was suspected of being an impious heretic, and who deserved to be burnt at the stake. M. Puys was overcome by these accusations, and after some negotiation, finding what the trouble was, formally declared that nothing was further from his intention than to attack the Society of Jesus, which, on the contrary, he honored and loved. Whereupon Father Alby said that it was his belief that M. Puys meant to attack the Jesuits which had led him to use the language complained of, but that "knowing better what his intention was, he declared there was nothing to hinder him from holding M. Puys to be a man of enlightened intellect, of profound and orthodox learning, of irreproachable manners, and, in a word, a worthy pastor of his church."

Now, this sounds very comical, but the principle on which the worthy father acted has by no means completely fallen into disuse. It is seen in a very coarse and brutal form in the campaign lies of the newspapers about the candidates—in, for instance, the World's daily contradiction within the last three or four months of what it said three years ago of Grant's talents and character, the facts, except his nomination for the Presidency, remaining precisely the same. But it is also found in quarters where more attention is paid to moral distinctions. On many of the reform platforms there is very little trouble taken to ascertain whether stories which are being circulated by the members to the disadvantage of men considered unfaithful or unfriendly to the cause are true or false. We would not charge these gentlemen with inventing slanders, but they certainly give little sign of caring whether they are slanders or not before they pass them on. Between the circulation of such stories as they spread abroad a year ago, of Grant's having been drunk in the streets of Washington, and the invention of them, there is doubtless a distinction of which human critics are bound to take notice; but if it be a distinction to which the Divine Intelligence will attach much importance, either our logic or theology is at fault.

We might multiply illustrations of the same sort indefinitely from the columns of the "organs" of various reform movements. A good biting story against an "enemy of the cause" is generally published cheerfully and without enquiry; if his acts admit of two constructions, the worse is put upon them, circumstances which tell in his favor are carefully concealed, or his refutation passed over without notice. A striking illustration of this particular form of lying was afforded after the impeachment trial, when the accounts given of Trumbull, Fessenden, and others were in such ludicrous contrast with the accounts which the same organs would have given of the same gentlemen the week before the verdict, in a controversy with a Democratic opponent, that one could almost fancy in reading them that one heard the joyous wagging of the devil's tail. In the temperance agitation, there is visible the same tendency to "help on the work" by loosening the obligation of truth-telling. The rules of evidence are not so strictly enforced in examining into a charge of drunkenness against a moderate drinker as they would be in an enquiry conducted by the same persons on any other subject; and we fear presumptions are adopted against unbelievers by good Christians with a laxity which they would not display if it was the fair fame of a brother believer that was at stake. The tendency to be untruthful is, in fact, in such partly involuntary, and the victim is often entirely unconscious of it himself.

That the world is growing worse in this respect we do not mean to say. On the contrary, considering the prodigious increase of temptation and of population, we think it is growing better. We doubt, for instance, whether any campaign has ever been conducted in this country with so great a regard to truth and decency as the Republicans are displaying in the conduct of this one. Whatever indications of deterioration there may be are found not in the fact that the number of liars increases, but that the liars are a better kind of people, and that the bad effects of lying on society at large are being hidden by the good use made of lying in particular cases. But we cannot consider the effects of lying for the right fairly without remembering that modern society is weakest on the side of the virtues which are covered by the term bona fides. It is gaining prodigiously in humanity and sympathy, but whether it is gaining, or seems likely to gain, in honesty, truthfulness, scrupulousness, and candor is still a disputed question; and it is to this side, therefore, the attention of moralists should be directed.

One other thing ought not to be overlooked, and that is, that confining the term education to the training children get in schools is a dangerous abuse of language. Children get a very small part of their education in schools; of their moral training, so called, hardly anything. Their notions of truth and justice they get from what goes on around them in society—from the conversations and the speeches they listen to, the newspapers they read, the acts they see their relatives commit; and those who flatter themselves that the injurious influences of a canvass filled with lies and vituperation, or of the spectacle of the use of immoral agencies in the furtherance of a good cause, on the opening mind of boys, can be counteracted, on the whole and in the long run, by set lessons in morality or religion, given by paid teachers or even by parents, deceive themselves. Every man who mounts a platform or takes up a pen, therefore, with the determination not to be too fastidious, or "too particular" about accuracy, provided he can "help on the work," is a corrupter of youth, who puts the world back two steps for the one he helps it forward, and on whom a cup of hemlock, if it could be lawfully administered to him, would not be thrown away.

Correspondence.

RECONSTRUCTION AT YALE COLLEGE.

To the Editor of the Nation:

It is not probable that a careful reader of the letter in your issue of the 13th inst. upon "President Woolsey's Reconstruction Policy" will be misled thereby; but yet it may be well to briefly notice some of its misleading statements or implications.

1. That, "not content with his proper glory," but possessed by "the Haussmann mania for demolition," President Woolsey originated the plan which involves the removal of the long row of brick buildings which "Academia" describes as "toned down with age to a warm and sober brown," but which, to less imaginative minds, are dingy red in hue, and the erection of stone structures on the sides of the college plot. Neither President Woolsey nor any other single individual is to be credited with said plan, but the necessities of the case. The present chapel, recitation-rooms, and dormitories have long been felt to be inferior to what the best interests of the college demand, and their removal has only been a question of how and when. The general opinion of those acquainted with the college "parallelogram" is, that to have the four sides occupied with appropriate buildings, and an open space in the centre, will be the best economy as to space, and will produce the best architectural effect.

2. That not "to destroy the ancient convenience (?) and beauty (!) of the college arrangements" "would leave a generous fund to endow the library and pay first-rate instructors." The money now at the disposal of the college for the proposed new structures was donated for this especial purpose, and cannot be used in any other way. However much the college authorities might desire to use these funds for the improvement of the library and to increase the inadequate salaries of the professors, they have no choice left them. The money was given for the erection of new buildings (in one instance, at least, for their speedy erection), and cannot honestly—probably not even legally—be used to other ends. It is undoubtedly true that the library needs a more liberal endowment, and that the "first-rate instructors" who now so faithfully serve the college are entitled to much larger salaries than they receive; but some other way must be found to accomplish these desirable results, as far as relates to the funds in question, than by a delay in the erection of the structures they were given for until after this present doleful period of a "low state of architecture and high price of building." The cost of building at present, undeniably, is "high," and the state of architectural knowledge must be "low" when so authoritative a critic as "Academia" can describe Alumni Hall as Gothic; but his plan for providing a proper support for such men as now compose the college faculty, and for the needed enlargement of the library, is hardly practicable. The result of his plan might be a "generous fund" for the ends named, but certainly would not be a just use of the money, and the college authorities are not men who are inclined to be generous (especially not to themselves) at the expense of injustice to others.

3. That the proposal for a change in the membership of the college corporation emanates from a desire to increase the clerical influence therein. The practical effect of the change which President Woolsey suggested in the New Englander of October, 1866, would be just the opposite to that which "Academia," ringing the changes on church and state, suggests. At present the corporation is composed of the president of the college, ten clergymen of the State of Connecticut, who elect their successors, the governor and lieutenant-governor of the State, and the six senior members of the Senate. It very often happens that these senators feel no interest in the affairs of the college. They have only cared to be senators of the State of Connecticut, and not at all members of the board of corporation of Yale. The former office they have striven to obtain—the latter they only accept as an unavoidable adjunct of the former. However attentive to their duties as senators, they give scarcely any attention to their duties as members of the corporation—in the majority of cases do not even attend the meetings of the board. There have been honorable exceptions, but the statement just made has been too generally true. Thus, in practical operation, the corporation has been chiefly clerical in its constitution, and by the requirements of the college charter the clergymen composing it have all been from the one State of Connecticut. However well this has worked in the past, when Yale was less of a university than it is fast coming to be, there are obvious reasons for a change in the future. The change proposed is to substitute for the six senators six graduates of the college, chosen, without regard to their occupation or location, by the whole body of the graduates. This, plainly, will give the graduates more control than they at present possess over the college, will naturally tend to maintain their interest in it, and, by bringing into the corporation picked men from different parts of the Union, and of varied experience as to men and affairs, will inevitably serve to make the college more national and universal in its management than can be expected at present.

Although "Academia's" eye for color and architecture appears to be strangely constituted, he can probably see that the proposed change will not at all tend to make the corporation of Yale (and this, and not an "autocratic" faculty, is its controlling power) more clerical than, contrary to the intention of the charter, is now the case, and that it only promises benefit to the Alma Mater which doubtless he loves. E. L. H.

August 17, 1868.

---

To the Editor of the Nation:

Now that your correspondent "Academia" has introduced the subject of the Yale College buildings, I wish you would give me space to say a few words that seem to me to need saying.

As a graduate of the college, I am interested in its prosperity and have a right loyal love for it. More than that, I hope to place my own sons under its training. And, therefore, I do most earnestly beg that no other building may ever be erected for college purposes on the present grounds.

The desirableness on some accounts of a change of location has been felt and admitted by a large number of the alumni, and others taking an interest in the college, for a number of years; but the imperative necessity for a change, and the feasibility of it, do not seem to be at all comprehended by the governing powers of the college, whoever they may be. And, with "Academia," I wish there might be some way of making them understand and feel the influence of the sentiments of the great body of the alumni and other friends of the college living at other places than New Haven.

It would seem as if it ought to be sufficiently clear on mere inspection that the college has outgrown its present limits. It has not even a comfortable ball-ground which it can claim as its own; and the students are only allowed, by an unwilling sufferance, to make use of a portion of the public green for that purpose. The college is in the heart of the city, in the midst of noise and dust, and a student cannot find a place sufficiently retired for rehearsing freely in the open air without a walk of a mile or more. In short, all modern ideas of comfort and propriety require for such an institution abundant room, which Yale College has not.

But, setting aside all these things as not worth what such a change is likely to cost, there are other reasons which to my mind are conclusive and overwhelming. These are the unfavorable sanitary conditions of the present location. I would say nothing to create needless alarm, but the present position and condition of Yale College are unhealthy, and are growing more so every year.

The city of New Haven has now a population of 50,000 or more. It lies on a plain only a few feet above the level of tide-water. Its only outlet to the sea is a shallow harbor five miles in length. It has no natural advantages for good drainage, and up to the present time there are no indications of any systematic effort to supply the deficiency. Public water has recently been introduced, and the free use of this on the streets and about dwellings, which, with a proper system of drainage, would undoubtedly conduce to health, without such a system does exactly the reverse. It is true that a few (not more, I think, than two or three) of the main streets have sewers for taking off the surface-water and such wastage as occurs along their lines, but these have been only very partially availed of, so that all the filth, garbage, and exuvial matter of 50,000 people goes into the soil to come back again as miasma. Fevers and dysenteries are common. Contagious diseases are not easily checked. Fever-and-ague is by no means so rare as it once was, and that this state of things is growing worse is undeniable.

The remedy is not easy; the city, for one of its size, is not rich; its government is controlled by men who are not likely to appreciate the importance of sanitary precautions, and a majority of its voters are of that class who would not be likely to support them if they did. Any thorough system of drainage would necessarily involve heavy expense; the engineering difficulties are considerable; and it is not likely that anything short of pestilence will fully arouse the people to a sense of their necessities in this regard. In the midst of this city, and partaking of all its disadvantages, the college is now located.

Within a mile of its present site are high and dry lands, healthful, easily drainable, easy of access, not too far removed from the city for all purposes of daily convenience—though the college ought in any case to have its own independent post-office, and perhaps telegraphic and other facilities. I have understood that the college already owns a considerable tract of this sort, but this may be a mistake.

Now, what are the obstacles to the change? First and greatest, I fear, is the conservative obstinacy of two or three individuals whose position and strength of will threaten to make them omnipotent in this matter. But the ostensible objection is the expense—mainly the necessary sacrifice of buildings now on the ground. Now, the only new and valuable buildings on the present site, and the only ones which it is proposed in any event to retain, are three—the Street Art building, the Library, and Alumni Hall. In regard to the Street Art building, it is so little connected with the academic course that, even if the college were removed, it would be better on all accounts where it is, for, though under the care of the college, it was never intended for undergraduates, but for the public at large, including the advanced students, and for students of art. That question, then, is readily disposed of.

The Alumni Hall, on the other corner of the lot, is an ugly pile, but roomy and substantial, and could easily be turned to any secular use without the least sense of desecration or unfitness, and would bring its full value for some such purpose.

The Library building is the worst elephant of the lot, and might have to be got rid of at some sacrifice. Then the whole College street front could be sold, judging from values of neighboring property, for a sum many times greater than the cost of a suitable site, supposing the college not to own one already. But I must not waste your space with details. The question is—How can we graduates and friends of the college, who want to send our sons to a healthful, pleasant place, and regret to turn our backs on Old Yale, get this change brought about? Let us at least hear from each other.

A Graduate.

Notes.

LITERARY.

J. B. Lippincott & Co. add to their announcements "The Unconscious Truth of the Four Gospels," by Rev. Dr. H. W. Furness; "A Few Friends," by M. E. Dodge; and "The Maternal Management of Infancy," by F. H. Getchell, M.D.——J. C. Garrigues & Co. announce "Life Scenes from the Old Testament," by Rev. George Jones, who for many years has been a chaplain in the U. S. Navy.——Leypoldt & Holt, among many promised additions to their stock of text-books in foreign languages, announce these works of general literature: Madame de Staël's "L'Allemagne" and "Corinne;" "Œuvres Choisis de Racine," including "Bérénice," "Bajazet," "Phèdre," "Esther," "Athalie," "Mithridate," and "Iphigénie;" Madame Cottin's "Elizabeth" and "Claire d'Albe;" and Bernardin St. Pierre's "Paul et Virginie" and "La Chaumière Indienne."——Robert Carter & Brothers announce "Wind-wafted Seeds," by Dr. Guthrie and Dr. McLeod.——G. W. Carleton announces "The Ring of Polycrates," by an anonymous writer; "The Art of Reading," by Sidney A. Cox; and "A New Juvenile," by Mrs. M. J. Holmes.

—We have discussed elsewhere the use of slander in the service of good causes, and have cited an amusing example of it from Pascal. We have found since the article was written another illustration, almost as good, in a report of the proceedings of the San Francisco Board of Education. A Mr. Cobb, one of the members, insisted on the immediate dismissal of one of the teachers, Professor Williams, on the ground that he "had rudely shoved a teacher;" that "he had no control over his temper, words, or actions;" and that to keep him in his place under such circumstances "would be cruelty to animals." A day or two later, however, an investigation having been made in the meantime, Mr. Cobb read the following declaration before the board:

"The school" (Professor Williams's) "is a credit to the department, and Professor Williams shows himself entirely competent and capable in every respect; wherefore, any charges made are withdrawn, having been made naturally under the circumstances, but later developments having shown that no good could arise from further pressing them; and it is admitted that the same would not have been made if as much had been known at the commencement as now."

—Among interesting new English books recently issued or soon to be issued we see the names of these: "The Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, based on Contemporary Documents preserved in the Rolls House, the Privy Council Office, the British Museum, and other MS. Depositaries." The work, which is still in press, and may not be issued for some time by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., is by Edward Edwards, Esq. The Rev. F. D. Maurice is the author of "The Conscience, or Lectures on Casuistry," which seems hardly the book for him to do well with. Mr. F. T. Palgrave's name is put to a book with the title, "Entertainments at Wentworth Grange," of which we have no more than the title, but it cannot be Mr. Palgrave's and be bad. Mr. Crabbe Robinson, not long since deceased, was for many years intimate with the set of which Coleridge, Lamb, and Keats were the chief men, and also with Blake the artist, Rogers, and many more. He left behind him memoirs which it is now proposed to publish, and which will assuredly be very entertaining, interesting, and valuable. "Salient Points of Scripture History" is a book that our clerical readers will find of use to them. Zebina Cooper is the author, or rather the compiler, of it; and what the work will be may be gathered from the descriptive title of Part I.—"The Pentateuch, with a short account of the ancient versions and of the English translations, from that of Wickliffe to the authorized version, genealogical tables, tabular views of the wanderings, the great Jewish feasts," etc., etc.——"The Memorials of London and London Life in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Centuries"—a work prepared by order of the Corporation of the City—contains a series of extracts, local, social, and political, from the City archives. It ought to be a treasure to the novelist, and certainly not valueless to the historian, and the Corporation merits praise for its liberality.——The next volume of the pretty little Bayard Series, of which we have several times spoken, and of which we intend speaking again before the holidays come, is the volume on which Mr. Morley was at work when he discovered the supposed Miltonic poem. The title is, "The King and the Commons: Cavalier and Puritanic Songs." It will contain a photographic fac-simile of the "epitaph," and a temperate summary of the internal and external evidence bearing on the authorship—a task which, we have no doubt, will be well performed by Mr. Morley, though he is one of the parties to the dispute. Other books of the same series that are announced as forthcoming are Johnson's "Rasselas;" Horace Walpole's brummagem "Castle of Otranto"—brummagem, but as stable and dear, for all that, as the best castle that ever was in the air; and the "Table-Talk and Opinions of the Duke of Wellington," a work which, if it is well compiled, will be well worth having. ——We may mention here that a Bristol and London house is announcing the sixteenth thousand of "The Girl of the Period," "reprinted verbatim, by permission," from the Saturday Review—which will be encouragement to Mr. Redfield to go on with his scheme of republishing that and its sister articles in this country. By the way, a letter comes to England from India which says: "Did you see that article in the Saturday Review, some time ago, called 'The Girl of the Period'? It was spiteful and untrue; but Captain —— tells me it has done an immense deal of harm out here. It has been translated into Hindostani, and the people are all saying, 'Why should they educate their women if that is the result of the education of English women?'" Another one of the Saturday Review's articles—that entitled "Mr. Gladstone Descends into the Gutter," which the Spectator thought a disgrace to journalism, and which probably was of the nature of a spiteful stab—is now in circulation throughout Lancashire, where Mr. Gladstone is on the hustings fighting all the Stanleys, who, however, are not to be supposed guilty of mailing the diatribe in question.

—As for English books which are more particularly interesting to Americans as Americans, we may mention these: Mr. John McMullen is the author of an octavo "History of Canada, from its First Discovery," etc. —a work which ought to have some attractions for American readers, as being the only tolerably good history of their nearest neighbors that is extant. A new edition of Professor C. D. Cleveland's "Concordance, or Verbal Index to the whole of Milton's Works"—a book that has been much thumbed of late in England—is announced by Sampson Low, Son & Marston; "Artemus Ward, his Book" and "Major Jack Downing's Letters" also appear in new editions. Trübner & Co. have put on the English market Mr. D. G. Brinton's "Myths of the New World" and Professor James D. Dana's "System of Mineralogy." Mr. J. W. De Forest's "Miss Ravenel's Conversion," a lively, sensible, satirical novel, which our readers will recollect, is well spoken of abroad; but so is Mr. Bishop's "First Book of the Law," which somebody in the Saturday Review seems to have criticised without opening it at all!

—To many persons belonging to that highly respectable body of American citizens known as "the intelligent reading public" Signor Cibrario will stand as a mere name; others, however, will at once recognize Cibrario as a man of some note as a statesman, but still better known as the author of a "History of Political Economy in the Middle Ages" ("Economia Politica nel Medio Evo"), which is regarded not only in Italy, but also in France and Germany, as a work of the highest authority. The treatise on "Slavery and Servitude" ("Della Schiavitù e del Servaggio, especialmente dei servi Agricoltori"), by the same author, is to comprise three volumes, the first of which has just been published at Milan. It differs from the writings of Muratori, Guizot, Savigny, Laboulaye, De Tocqueville, Wolowski, Golesco, and the many other eminent men who have discussed this subject, in the fact that the latter have treated the question of slavery in some one of its particular phases—social, economical, or national—whereas Signor Cibrario gives a general history of servitude in all its forms, and the gradual modifications which it has undergone in ancient, mediæval, and modern times. The moral, legal, political, and industrial aspects and influences of the institution are also fully considered. A very interesting portion of the book is the detailed account of the traffic in children which, during the Middle Ages, was carried on by the maritime states of Italy, and especially by Venice. These children (called anime) were usually brought from the coasts of Dalmatia and Istria, or from inland cities like Verona and Brescia, and sold for a term of years, and became free on attaining the age of twenty. This peculiar traffic began in the twelfth century; in the fourteenth century it was considerably ameliorated by a decree of the Venetian Senate providing that all anime should have the right to purchase their freedom by the payment of six ducats, and that they should in no case be held to involuntary service for a longer period than four years. These and other enactments of a like tendency so diminished the profits of the inhuman commerce that towards the close of the fifteenth century it ceased altogether. Among all peoples, and in all ages, the most numerous and important class of slaves have been servile tillers of the soil (servi agricoltori, or colonati). In the present volume Signor Cibrario simply notes the various forms assumed by this species of servitude in ancient times, and the different juridical problems to which it gave rise. In the two subsequent volumes of his work he promises to give a more extended treatment of this branch of the subject, and to trace its history through the Middle Ages down to the present day.

—A recent number (Vol. XXII., p. 249) of the "Journal of the German Oriental Society" ("Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft"), edited by Dr. Krehl, contains an account of the founding of a new university at Pekin, not only with the sanction but also under the patronage of the Chinese Government. The project originated with Prince Kung, whose memorials to the Emperor on the subject are given in full in the above-mentioned journal. A large space in the programme of study is devoted to astronomy, mathematics, the natural sciences, and the mechanical arts. The necessary buildings have been erected, with an observatory constructed after European models and equipped with the best instruments. The professors are mostly French and German. These gentlemen are already in Pekin studying the Chinese language and otherwise fitting themselves for their peculiar work. The innovation, of course, meets with the most bitter opposition from the learned caste, which has hitherto enjoyed a monopoly of erudition; and Prince Kung is accused of treason against the venerable traditions of the nation and of disgracing the Celestial Empire by introducing foreigners as instructors. The institution is expected to go into operation in about two years, and if well managed will produce very important results. Prince Kung, in his last memorial and proposals addressed to the Emperor, refers to a general petition which had been presented previously, and which we believe set forth pretty well the principles on which the new institution is founded. If so, there is to be an examination of candidates before admission; the pupils are to live in the university, so that they may be within easy reach of their masters and out of the reach of temptation; there are to be monthly examinations; every three years there shall be a general examination; successful students shall be admitted into the public service. One regulation—proposed but not, so far as we are aware, adopted—is to the effect that "the students shall be properly paid while pursuing their studies; and this pay shall consist not of board and lodging merely, but also of a sum of ready money monthly, in order that the pupils may not indulge in melancholy reflections which are fatal to mental activity."

—That publishers' advertisements cannot always be implicitly relied upon is a truth known to all book-buyers. A fresh illustration of it we had lately on ordering, from Germany, according to an unqualified announcement, the fifth edition of that very valuable and very comprehensive cyclopædia, "Pierer's Universal Lexikon der Vergangenheit und Gegenwart, oder Neuestes encyclopädisches Wörterbuch der Wissenschaften, Künste und Gewerbe," now being issued at Altenburg. This new edition is not only advertised, but also marked on the title-page as "fünfte durchgängig verbesserte Stereotyp-Ausgabe." Receiving the first three volumes, we were curious to know to what extent and with what degree of accuracy the newest and latest information is being incorporated in this "thoroughly revised edition" of the "Newest Cyclopædic Dictionary" of the "Past and Present." We turned to the letter B. General B. F. Butler is certainly a unique general and statesman. What of him? Not a word. Burnside, too, though one of the commanders of the famous Army of the Potomac, is totally ignored. So is Beauregard. We knew Pierer to be far from fastidious in the selection of his immortals, and the thing began to look suspicious. One more test of the same kind we applied; John Brown we sought for. He, too, was wanting. We were now convinced of having been deceived. We looked for decisive proofs, and found them in abundance. Carlyle's earlier writings, great or small, are all enumerated; but there is no mention of his "Frederick the Great." If we may believe Pierer, D'Azeglio is still living; Von Beust still Minister of Saxony. The respective histories of Australia, Baden, Bohemia, etc., are brought down to 1857 only, the year of the publication of the corresponding articles in the fourth edition. Only here and there, where a change could most easily be made, a few words have been inserted—as in "Bismark"—or a new population figure—as in "Brooklyn"—to base the claim of Verbesserung upon. Caveant book-buyers.

—The second volume of Cav. De Rossi's "Roma Sotterranea Cristiana" has been just published by the Cromolitografia Pontifica at Rome. It is accompanied by a chart of the latest explorations, representing in different colors the several divisions of the catacombs, and thus enabling the reader to follow the author through the subterranean maze with comparative ease. The present volume (like the first, which appeared in 1864) is devoted to the exploration and rehabilitation (if such a term can be applied to a tomb) of the famous cemetery of St. Calixtus. The author aims to prove by monumental evidence that primitive Christianity was not wholly confined to the poor and plebeian classes, but that it had its representatives among the wealthy and aristocratic families of ancient Rome, and particularly in the celebrated Gens Pomponia. Many things which in the first volume were thrown out as simple conjectures are here verified by inscriptions. On the whole, this work is the most clear, full, and scientific account of the catacombs that has ever been published.

—That witty writer, of almost unprecedented fertility in prose and poetry, August Heinrich Hoffmann von Fallersleben, has now concluded, with the sixth volume, the recollections of his "Life"—a work of unusual interest to the student of our times. The author is now in his seventy-first year. His work is published in Hanover.——L. Spengel has issued, at Munich, the third part of his "Aristotelische Studien," embracing "Politics" and "Œconomics."——Of two comprehensive geographico-statistical works by the Prussian Minister of War, Albrecht von Roon, one—"Anfangsgründe der Erd-, Völker- und Staatenkunde"—has, within thirty-four years, reached its twelfth edition. The first edition appeared in 1834. The merits of the author in this field and as a writer on military science are generally regarded as being of a high order. German political newspapers quote from this, his latest publication, various passages on the political condition of the principal states of Europe—utterances to which the position of the writer and his participation in the late great events in Central Europe lend a particular interest.——G. F. Kolb, the author of the "Handbuch der vergleichenden Statistik," etc., which we noticed lately, has issued, at Leipzig, the first number of a universal history of civilization, entitled, "Culturgeschichte der Menschheit," etc. The work is to consist of two volumes of moderate size, the one embracing an "Introduction" and "Antiquity," and the other "Middle Ages" and "Modern Times." It is a book of no mean pretensions, being planned to become a kind of philosophical history of mankind in its various developments, physical, intellectual, moral, and political. The little that is before us allows of no decided judgment concerning its merits.

—At the time of the French Revolution the women were in much the same ferment that we see them in now; and then, as now, they had their champions who said sensible things, and their champions who were on the same intellectual level with the writers in the paper called the Revolution. "The gallantry of Frenchmen," says one of the petitions of the women to the States-General—"the gallantry of Frenchmen should now give a grand example to the world. Women, forming the sounder and the larger part of the people, should compose a fourth order in the States-General. Their graces would not be without their use in inducing the clergy to let the church property be sold" (as was afterwards done, we regret to say, without the aid of the ladies' charms), "and in inducing the nobility to renounce their privileges. What is the great wealth of a country? Population. Whence comes population? From marriage. Suppress, then, the bachelors. Accord no rank as a citizen to any man who is not married and has not at least one child," etc., etc. Another "requête des dames" of the period cries out in an equally threatening manner, "You intend to abolish the privileges of the nobility! Abolish also those of the masculine sex." It is, perhaps, worth remarking that there was then the same (comparative) scorn and contempt of the African in the female breast that was volubly expressed in Kansas a while ago. "There is talk," says Madame B. B., in her "Cahiers des doléances et réclamations des Femmes"—"there is talk of enfranchising les nègres: why not enfranchise the women also?" The negro is ahead, sure enough. Madame B. B. says, however, many sensible things, and is by no means a writer to be laughed at. Among the rest, she says—it is less true to-day, but nearer the truth than it should be—"It is all-important to change our rules for the education of young girls. School us no more as if we were destined to the pleasures of the seraglio. We must one day partake your good or bad fortune. Do not deprive us of the education which will enable us to aid you either by our counsel or our labor, or to replace you if by a natural or premature death you should leave us charged with the maintenance and education of your children."

MONTLONG'S MEXICAN REVELATIONS.*

EARLY in February, 1867, a few days before Maximilian set out on his fatal march from Mexico to Queretaro, the city which, after a seventy days' siege, was to witness his downfall on May 15, and his execution on June 19, he entrusted Wilhelm von Montlong, an officer of his staff (it is this officer and his friends who state it), with the task of elaborating, from official documents, an exact and detailed account ("noticia exacta y pormenorizada") of the conduct of the French army during its stay in Mexico, the evacuation of which it was then completing. The task was executed after the death of the Prince with devoted zeal, but without the aid of materials sufficient for an exhaustive work on so interesting a topic. The book which embodies the results of what is introduced to us as a labor of love and devotion to the memory of "the unfortunate monarch" is too fragmentary, and the documentary evidence adduced to support some of its most important assertions hardly ample enough for their corroboration. But even so, these new "Revelations" are an interesting contribution to the history of our time and continent. Written not "sine ira et studio," they have, at least, the merit of strengthening opinions generally current in camps hostile to that of the author.

"The empire began with treason," says Major Montlong, "and treason brought about its end." Maximilian, he believes, would never have accepted the crown carried to him at Miramar had he not been most artfully and treacherously deceived concerning his election as emperor. This may be true only to a degree, but the grossness of the deception which was to serve as the basis of a new throne and dynasty is revealed in the following: The principal inhabitants of Monterey having been assembled by the French General Jeanningros—who acted precisely as others did in other towns—he addressed them in these words: "The Emperor of the French, always anxious to promote the welfare of all unfortunate nations, and desirous to establish your happiness, has determined to transform the Mexican Republic into a rich and flourishing empire, and has selected for your emperor the most liberal and enlightened prince of Europe, the Archduke Maximilian of Austria. But Napoleon wishes Maximilian to be elected by the general vote of the nation. I have called you here, therefore, to receive your votes." And advancing a few steps towards the assembled Mexicans, he added, with a threatening countenance: "N'est-ce pas, gentlemen, you accept the prince whom the Emperor Napoleon sends you?" To which the assembly, intimidated by a squad of French troops posted in front of them, answered, "We do," and the general, turning to an officer of his staff who collected the protocols, said: "Write, sir, that this city has voted unanimously for the empire, and let these gentlemen sign the document." The notables of San Luis Potosi, who refused to sign a similar declaration, were thrown into prison, kept for thirty-six hours without food, and thus compelled to submit.

This is an example of the political dealings of the French invaders in Mexico. Of their military deeds in that country we learn some that hardly redound in a higher degree to the glory of "the great nation." General Mangin having on the occupation of the village of Montealto found out the suspicious disposition of its inhabitants, he had forty-six of them, noted as the most "liberal," arrested in the night and shot without trial or sentence. This ferocious act may be ascribed to the prompting of incipient insanity, as the general shortly after lost his reason; but other barbarities are related for which, unfortunately for human nature, no such plea can be raised. A Captain Charrier, of the Foreign Legion, is charged with having, by threats of execution, forced the prefect of a small town to sign the death-sentence of his own brother, whose only crime was his attachment to the liberal cause. According to our narrative, however, atrocities like these were much more frequently committed by the "liberal" Mexicans than by the French champions of "civilization." The native allies of the latter naturally make no exception, and in a retrospective glance a butchery of almost unparalleled atrocity—executed at Tacubaya in 1859—is related in which the future Imperial generals, Miramon and Marquez, were the chief actors. Miramon—we read—in an order concluding with the words "God and law!" decreed the execution of all wounded officers found in the hospital at that captured place, and Marquez included in the hecatomb the seven physicians whom he found administering to the wounded. And yet Miramon is one of those few Mexicans of whom our author occasionally speaks with admiration, a sentiment which Maximilian must have fully shared if it be true that, a few minutes before their common execution, placing him between himself and General Mejia, he addressed to him these words: "Even monarchs must admire the brave; before dying I cede to you the post of honor." Miramon himself, who energetically protested his constant fidelity to the cause of order, died with the words "Live the Emperor" on his lips. The Emperor lived a few seconds longer, during which he vainly tried to recover breath after the deadly volley. His last words and acts—his enemies acknowledged it—were worthy of a better cause than was his, viewed in the mildest light. Mejia alone sank in silent despair, having, a moment before, seen his wife in mad anguish running through the streets of Queretaro with her baby in her arms.

The men of whom our author speaks with almost unqualified contempt are Marquez, Lopez, and Marshal Bazaine. In Marquez's tardiness to relieve Puebla, then besieged by Porfirio Diaz, he sees the main cause of the disasters which terminated the last struggle of the empire. His obstinately-prolonged defence of the capital after the fall of Queretaro—a defence made possible only by atrocious deceptions practised on the decimated and starving garrison—he ascribes to purely selfish motives. The treason of Lopez who is stated to have sold Queretaro to Escobedo—yet with the intention of aiding in the flight of Maximilian—is represented as a fact the authenticity of which is proved by a mass of irrefragable evidence. Bazaine, whose impeachment before the tribunal of public opinion and of history seems to be the main object of the book, is charged—not without proof—not only with sordid selfishness, extortion, peculation, and cruelty, but also with duplicity, intentional abuse of instructions, falsity to the interests of both France and Mexico, hostility to the cause of Maximilian, and even conscious military treachery—the motive being the marshal's secret intention, fomented perhaps by his Mexican marriage, to make himself master of Mexico as president or otherwise. The bloody Imperial decree of October 3, 1865, is represented as having been extorted by the heartless Frenchman, and made doubly fatal by his still more sanguinary secret instructions concerning its execution. These are certainly no isolated accusations, broad as they are, but, as we have stated, they are not sufficiently substantiated by the documentary evidence.

The little that is said in the book of Juarez and Porfirio Diaz betrays, if it does not display, the writer's antipathy to the former and esteem for the latter. He detests most of the Mexican leaders in both camps, unveils the corruption and treachery that doomed the Imperial Government to barrenness and precocious decay, excuses the crimes of one party only by those of the other, and finds the Mexican people, with their bandit warriors and ignorant and profligate clergy, "utterly demoralized by a civil war of forty years' duration, which has broken all the springs of the machine of state, distracted all minds, and adulterated every sentiment of duty, honor, and social integrity." He considers the Conservative party, both in Mexico and Central America, as doomed, finally, to succumb to the Liberal, and that—the late Mexican Imperial officer acknowledges it without hesitation—on account of its greater rottenness. And yet he is convinced that Maximilian undertook the gigantic task of regenerating such a nation with the aid of such a party in good conscience and from noble motives, and that his victory alone could have secured to the distracted country the blessings of peace, order, and civilization. But was this victory possible after the downfall of the Southern Confederacy, even if Bazaine and the Mexican Imperialists remained faithful? Was it still possible in the latter part of 1866, when the French commenced their retrograde movements, preparatory to their return to France? Was it still possible when Maximilian returned from Orizaba to the capital to continue the struggle single-handed? Was not the gallant stand made at Queretaro as useless a waste of blood—for honor's sake, perhaps—as was the post-Imperial defence of Mexico by Marquez, from less honorable personal motives? Did princely or military honor command the leader and his enthusiastic Austrian followers to cling to the last to a cause which was already known to them to have been conceived in treason, and, if not criminal from the beginning, had certainly become a "lost cause"? To none of these questions does our author attempt to give an answer. We can certainly find no explanation strong enough to exculpate his hero from the guilt of reckless adventurousness—a guilt which he may have nobly expiated with his blood, though without repentance. It was a strange Nemesis that carried a scion of the house of Austria, three hundred years after the death of Charles V., to the shores deluged with Aztec blood by that monarch's conquistadores, to perish by a bullet at the hand of an Aztec chief!

* "Authentische Enthüllungen über die letzten Ereignisse in Mexico. Auf Befehl weiland Sr. Majestät des Kaisers Maximilian, nach Dokumenten bearbeitet von Wilhelm von Montlong, k. mexic. General Stats-Major, etc." Stuttgart. 1868.

RUSKIN'S MODERN PAINTERS.*

ALL the more important of Mr. Ruskin's writings have been republished in America by Mr. Wiley's house, though in a form very different from that of the beautiful English editions. The appearance of a new issue of the reprint of "Modern Painters" gives occasion for a brief review of the author's work as artist and writer upon art. It is our purpose to abstain from all consideration of those writings upon ethics, government, and society which have given Mr. Ruskin a wider and, for the present at least, a less enviable notoriety than his artistic labors. His largest book, that mentioned above, with twenty-five years between the dates of its first and its fifth volume, begun for the purpose of proving and establishing an important fact in modern art history, never forsaking its original end, but, in the task, ranging over earth and the world of thought in search of the profoundest truths of nature and spirit, is in itself an embodiment of Ruskin's mind from early manhood up to a mature age. During those years through which there went on the slow growth of "Modern Painters" other books were produced which are nearly as well known. The "Seven Lamps of Architecture," the "Stones of Venice," several smaller books, and many lectures, pamphlets, articles, and letters received and contained the surplus matter, the outside accretion of thought which found no proper receptacle in the central book itself. In all these we find the same strong conviction that good in art is much like good in other things, not a creation of law, but the reason why laws are created; an absolute thing which, indeed, one may fail to reach and yet be forgiven, but which is never to be ignored or denied without ruin following. It is not without an effort that the author keeps to his self-allotted task; the truth outside of the world of art seems to him not altogether distinguishable from truthfulness in art itself; so that his peculiar views upon political economy occasionally find brief utterance. But up to the close of the fifth volume of "Modern Painters" the thought upon these subjects is confined to generalization, and does not crystallize into those sumptuary laws the unskilful promulgation of which has made even the admirers of the author stand aghast.

The first object of Mr. Ruskin's life as a writer was to claim for Turner, the landscape painter, then an old man and past his artistic prime, the place and character of the greatest of all landscape painters, and a genius fit to rank with the few great painters of the world. To this task he was called by his own impatience at foolish, captious, and ungrateful fault-finding—a tone of discussion adopted by the English press of the time in regard to Turner's noblest works, too narrow and inconsiderate to be called criticism, too absurd to be worthy of serious refutation but for the mischief it was doing. During the half-dozen years before the appearance of the first volume of "Modern Painters" the most magnificent of Turner's works had been exhibited upon the walls of the Royal Academy, and had been greeted with unanimous abuse and foolish jesting by press and people. To Ruskin the pseudo-criticism of the wiseacres of the day was in every way horrible. As a constant student of landscape and of all natural beauty—as a lover of good art and of verity of every kind, he hated to see such falsehoods circulated in regard to noble pictures; as a lover of men, he chafed at the folly which kept his countrymen from a pure and lofty pleasure; as a personal friend and devoted admirer of Turner, he suffered from the attacks which were wearing out the soul of the great artist. He commenced a letter to the editor of some review—a mere protest against foolish carping at Turner. The letter grew into a volume. It was published as Volume I. of "Modern Painters," and received with great interest and more general approval than has been given to any of Ruskin's subsequent works. People had not then found out how many vested interests were attacked, and how many favorite old humbugs were endangered by this new Quixote.

The publication of this volume, and the fact that it found readers, seem to have startled the author into recognition of the truth that he had made himself an art critic without sufficient preparation. It was one thing to cry out against the gabble of the newspapers and show that Turner was the greatest of living landscape painters; to a practised draughtsman and close observer this was easy; it was another thing to establish Turner's claim to a seat beside Titian and Leonardo. He had not proposed to himself the devotion of his life to the study of art; but now something very like that was forced upon him. The work upon "Modern Painters" was suspended, and in the prime of early manhood he went at the study of the fine arts with the same energy and devotion which most men give to money-making business. Already a skilful draughtsman, his power grew with every day's work; already familiar in more than the usual sense with the greatest works of art in Europe, he studied them now as other men study the markets and the tendencies of trade. His notion of studying Lombard architecture was to copy line by line its most precious remaining buildings, and stone by stone its loveliest sculpture. If he sought to know Florentine painting, it was by setting up his easel and copying the precious originals in form and color. In this way he studied art for ten years, while still retaining his hold on nature by that careful drawing out of doors, both in black and white and in color, which had been familiar to him from early youth.

One interest grew out of his study on the continent of Europe which threatened to put to one side the interpretation of Turner to the world, and did delay that primary work. The fancy for Gothic architecture which was then taking hold of the educated classes in Europe was causing the ruin, under the name of "restoration," of some of the noblest buildings left from the Middle Ages, while it had not availed to save any of them from destruction out and out to make room for modern buildings. Tortured every day by the sight of this hopeless and remediless destruction going on around him, busied in making careful drawings of parts of buildings which the morrow would see dashed to pieces, powerless to prevent or delay the annihilation of works of art which could never be replaced, and of which perhaps the only record would be left in his own drawings—he turned more and more towards this part of his work, and for a time followed the study of ancient architecture as an end instead of a means. The attempt to awaken a living interest in Gothic architecture, an interest which should suffice to save his beloved monuments from destruction, became a secondary duty, not conflicting with the primary object of interpreting Turner and his relations to landscape painting, but pursued side by side with it, and never relinquished until years had shown the utter futility of the task. Some little good has come to modern building through the exertions of Ruskin and his followers, but for the preservation of the noble buildings they loved it has been in vain that they strove. Within thirty years half the best architecture in Europe has been swept off from the face of the earth and the remainder mostly renovated into nothingness.

Books so large as "Modern Painters" and "The Stones of Venice" find but few readers in our days. Even the charm of the illustrations cannot keep many men or women attentive to the text through hundreds of large octavo pages. It is because of this that these books fail of their effect. There are few men who have read "Modern Painters" carefully through, and yet no one but he who has can be said to know much about Ruskin's writings. The smaller books are generally inferior, the lectures notably so, and, though crowded with information and suggestion, are incomplete in reasoning, sometimes hasty in assertion, and nearly always unfortunate in expression. But "Modern Painters" is of a completeness and gravity not attained by any part of any of the smaller works except one. It grows, as Mr. Ruskin himself has said in another case, like a tree, branching in many ways, but developing always into fuller life. One who wishes to be lead into a true feeling for art ought to read and re-read "Modern Painters."

The general tendency of Ruskin's teachings in art is always right. The separate and detached expressions of opinion are always worthy of careful consideration, and are nearly always stimulating to thought, but are open to question as to their complete or partial rightness. In saying this, we mean not only the early opinions which maturer thought has modified, as in the notable instance of the relative rank given to Venetian painting in the first and in the fifth volume of "Modern Painters." These changes are the best proof of real because growing knowledge, and of that flexible-mindedness essential to the investigator. We refer rather to hasty generalizations, and assertions too sweeping because too hotly made. But this consideration does not prevent us from giving this advice to the student of art about to visit Europe—copy every piece of description and of criticism of pictures, statues, buildings, and scenery from all Ruskin's writings, classify them geographically, and study each thing commented on with the aid of the comments. It is not too much to say that it is altogether impossible to study art aright, nowadays, without seeking aid continually from Ruskin's books. And as to the questionable accuracy of some statements, it is safe to say that the student had better take them all at first as absolutely true, and gradually learn to discriminate, than to close his eyes and ears by too much doubting.

* "Modern Painters. By a Graduate of Oxford." New York: John Wiley & Son. 5 vols. 1868.

HOSPITAL DAYS.*

"In the autumn of 1865, when the new Peace on all the hills and fields made them seem so sweet and fair, we found ourselves, a family long parted, exploring the by-roads in the north New Hampshire country. Following, one day, a winding green wagon-track, far from the main road, we came upon a desolate rough farm half way up the lower slopes of the Bartlett mountain. A dozen sheep were scattered over the stony field, and among them sat a man in the full uniform of a Zouave, baggy trousers, gay-braided jacket, cap, tassel, and long bright crimson scarf, complete. He had but just got home from some distant post with very little back pay in his pocket for the sick wife, and none at all to spend in sober clothes, and had gone at once to work upon the obstinate farm, all in his gay attire. He seemed a little stunned by the silence round him. He 'missed the drums,' he said. We had a little talk over the old days already so distant although so near, and left him, the sun touching the red and the blue of his bright garments, tending his sheep under the solemn hills.

"One who sits and listens for the drums to-day seems like the Zouave among the sheep crofts; the flags and the music have marched so far away. And yet there may be some in these times of gain-getting, pleasure-seeking, and 'reaction' who are not sorry to look backward a little, now and then, and refresh from the old fountains their courage and their love of country."

This charming little bit of prose—picture and music in one—is the introduction, or rather the prelude, to a delightful book, which we should be glad if all our readers could see. Nothing nearly so good has been written by any one else of the many who have told us about the life led by the wounded and sick and their nurses in the Union hospitals. The author's style is admirable; hardly anywhere else, perhaps, so elaborately finished as in the passage we have just read, and perhaps not the worse for that; but those whose taste is not entirely pleased by a polish quite so high will be readiest to remember that the native texture of the material must be firm and fine before such polish is possible. Throughout the book itself, when once we get into it, we have almost unfailingly the elegant but unbookish and not too precise English which, as somebody says, cultivated women naturally talk in its perfection, but to write which is to give a proof, not much oftener given by women than by men—confessedly incapable of it—of possessing a rare and excellent literary taste. We intend, however, that the book, which is privately printed and will be seen by only a few persons, shall speak its own praises both in this and in other respects. But first it is proper to say a word or two concerning its writer. She, with one of her sisters, offered herself as a nurse in the army hospitals, and set out for her post, as the introduction says, "on a blue-and-gold day in the edge of November, a hundred years ago"—which is to say, in the year 1862, in the first days of the war, since when so many of us have lived so long that those times may indeed almost be spoken of as if they were a hundred years ago. She was made superintendent of the hospital at Fairfax Seminary, at Alexandria, within eye-shot of the dome of the Capitol; —"and on the left, looking through miles of airy purple, hung in the smoke of the city and the autumn vapor, the wonderful white dome not yet lifting aloft, nor having the right to lift, the finished figure of Liberty." There, in constant attendance on the wounded, she remained until after the grand review of Sherman's and Grant's armies and the breaking-up of the hospital—three laborious, anxious years. This is the description of the beginning of them:

"The morning after their arrival, the newcomers, who had already been formally mustered into the service of the United States, were put on duty in published orders, and were waited on in the store-room by the women-nurses in a body, somewhat prepared to resent if occasion offered, but soon melting and smiling on observing the unformidable aspect of the new authority. 'Them dear lambs!' said old Mrs. B. afterwards, 'what I was afraid of was caps.'"

It was a happiness that too few of our wounded men could have known to be waited on by nurses who brought into the melancholy wards such cheeriness and brightness as, one would say, must have attended the presence of our story-teller. The humorous stroke which closes the passage we have just quoted is one of a hundred like it that are to be found in these pages; constantly recurring, they give to the narrative, despite the pathos and pain of much of it, a general tone of cheerful courage which, it is hardly doubtful, faithfully represents the general tone of the superintendent's intercourse with her patients. Speaking of her, we mean to be understood of her sister also, whose letters, two or three of which are given, show the same fortunate disposition. Here is another illustration of it. She has previously described the way in which the food is put into a car which, drawn by a double team of stewards, runs on a wooden track from the kitchen to the various wards:

"The superintendent follows in the wake of the diet-cars. Such is the celerity with which the Defenders, even when ill, swallow their food it is impossible to be in more than one or two wards while eating is actually going on. But by beginning at a different and unexpected ward and meal every day the objects of an inspection are pretty well secured. 'Was the gruel right?' 'Did you get a full tumbler of punch?' 'You are tired of the beef-tea?' 'Grumble as much as you like.' 'But I don't want to grumble; I ain't got no complaint to make—only'—(aside to G——) 'I'd as lief see the devil coming up the ward as that beef-tea.'"

The following amusing sketch occurs in a chapter on "Women Nurses," of whom in general the author has a good opinion:

"Mrs. M—— announced with dignity at our first interview, 'I am a Daughter of Pennsylvania. You must have heard of Curtin's Daughters. I have been in the field with the —— brigade, in such and such battles and such and such skirmishes. All this may be found in my journal.' Then, after a little conversation, she revealed that she had given us the 'sign' or password of two or three orders, and as none had been 'taken up' she inferred we 'was all right.' She had registered a vow not to serve with any 'sisters,' or with members of any secret society. She gave also the details of an interview with the general superintendent who had visited the hospital not long before. The nurse corps paraded. 'Here,' said the child of the Keystone State. She looked hard at me, and says she, 'So you're the regiment woman!' at which I drew myself up, and looking back as good as her, says I, 'No, madam,' says I, 'I am not the regiment woman; I am the brigade woman.' Whether the new administration was disappointing, or fresh fields of laurels unfolded elsewhere, I do not know, but in a few weeks 'letters requiring her presence at home' arrived, and the Daughter of Pennsylvania was seen no more."

Still more amusing, we regret to say, is this account of a pretty bad young man, whose sickness had not, apparently, brought him at all into a right way of thinking:

"The extempore speech and prayer sometimes took odd turns. I was present at a meeting when a Defender rose and said he wished to confess to the brethren some particulars of a sinful life. There was once, in such a town, a godless youth, said he—and went on to paint his career: how at the age of twelve he smoked cigars and threw the Bible at his grandmother; at fourteen he played tenpins and went sailing on Sunday; at sixteen he ran away from home, etc., etc.; and when we expected the usual conclusion, 'and I who address you to-night, my friends, am that forsaken lad,' he surprised us by clapping his hand on the shoulder of an innocent, blushing youth in front of him, one of the steadiest boys in camp, and shouting his climax, 'which his name is Asy Allen, and here he sets!'"

There must have been need, surely, of whatever light-heartedness and enjoyment of fun one could get. After all, and at the best, it was the house of mourning; very far within the valley of the shadow of death. Companionship with dreadful wounds, with sufferings the sight of which was all the more affecting because they were borne with a quiet courage that gave one fresh respect for human nature, with the mortal illness of the young, with the grief of parents who came too late—this must have made up much of the superintendent's daily life. She says in one place:

"The men were all fond of flowers. Hot-house flowers sometimes came down to us, and the lovely white and crimson carnations were a delight to a sick sergeant, who touched and fondled them, and had them fastened to the frame of the bedstead close by his head, and died with one clutched in his thin fingers. One spring morning I carried a bunch of the first lilacs to a very sick New England boy. 'Now I've got something for you,' I said, holding them behind me, 'just like what grows in your front door-yard at home; guess.' 'Lalocs!' he whispered, and I laid them on his folded hands. 'Oh, lalocs! How did you know that?' The lilacs outlived him."

With this following extract we must take leave of a book every page of which we might quote and give pleasure—giving not more than we should feel. Not pleasure alone; for the good it could not but do to every reader, as well as for the pleasure it could not but give, it is to be wished that it might be widely published instead of being merely printed for the eyes of a few:

"I heard a strange moaning in the lower hall one day, like the cry of some wounded creature, and going quickly down the staircase found S.'s poor old mother, who had come alone from far out West to see him, not knowing how rapidly he had failed. She had stopped at the registry office door, and giving in the name, was thoughtlessly answered by the clerk in one word, 'dead.' We got her up-stairs and made her some tea, and she sat in a chair by the window, bending to and fro, and moaning softly all the afternoon, and saying not a word. Only the next day she was able to hear how good and faithful he had been as a nurse to his comrades, and how peaceful in his death."

* "Hospital Days. Printed for Private Use." New York: D. Van Nostrand. 1868.

Or perhaps it is better to close with this passage taken from one of the letters—simple enough many of them, like this one—which the men used to send back to Alexandria when they had reached home and friends:

"I can never forget you. My daily prayer is that God will spare your life to labor for the poor soldier. The day never passes but I think of the many favors received from surgeon in charge and officers. I was nowhere since I left home where I felt so satisfied as at the hospital. May the Lord bless you and all those who labor with you, and at last may you hear the sweet voice of your Saviour say, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me.'"

MAGAZINES FOR SEPTEMBER.

Mr. Bayard Taylor describes for the Atlantic a visit that he has recently made to the Islands of Maddalena and Caprera. The latter, as all the world knows, is the home of Garibaldi, to whom Mr. Taylor had excellent letters of introduction. His wish to see the hero was very far removed, he makes us understand, from the mere ordinary man's vulgar desire to make the personal acquaintance of distinguished men. He would by no means have sought an interview with the general directly after the glorious Sicilian and Calabrian campaign, when all sorts of cheap persons would have risked their necks, in fact did risk their necks, in order to get a sight of the great man of the day. But after Mentana, in Garibaldi's day of defeat and neglect, then Mr. Taylor, being in no fear of confounding himself with the multitude, the summer friends, the "flies of estate and sunshine," felt free to present himself before the exile. Garibaldi, as it appears, was for some unknown reason unwilling to see Mr. Taylor, who could get no more satisfactory reply to his overtures than a statement that the liberator was not well and could not receive him. Mr. Taylor explains this awkward-looking affair by giving his readers an impression that a certain doctor—described as a base hanger-on of Garibaldi's, an eater of his substance, a braggart, and a humbug generally—had, by natural antipathy, conceived a deep dislike of him (Mr. Taylor), and by secret machinations had, out of hatred or a thirst for revenge, prevented his seeing the chief.

Mr. De Forest, whom we are always glad to meet in the magazines, has a sprightly paper in this month's Atlantic on "The Man and Brother." It is the first of a series of papers on the same subject, and judging them by this first one and by other things that Mr. De Forest has done, we feel able to recommend them almost unreservedly to such of our readers as wish to understand our new Southern citizen. We, for our own part, should make some abatement, we think, from Mr. De Forest's high estimate of the truthfulness of the average colored witness. We speak from experience; an à priori reasoner on the subject, recollecting that lying is the vice of slaves, would probably easily find himself at one with us, and incredulous as regards the statements of "the Bureau Major." On the whole, however, he seems to us, as we have said, a safe guide; where to look for a safer we should hardly know, and he is always lively and agreeable.

Miss Agnes Harrison's story, "St. Michael's Night," still keeps the reader interested and pleased. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, who is an authority worth listening to, makes a good article on "Modern Methods of Studying Poisons," and gives much information new to the magazine reader in regard to the vegetable poisons woorara and corroval, as well as in regard to the means which the physiologist takes in order to learn the way in which those agents act on their victims. Mr. Whipple is better than usual in dealing with Raleigh and Sidney; but we should say that to speak less about the men and more about their works would perhaps have been a more useful line for Mr. Whipple to take than the one he is apt to take, and has taken in this instance, because the readers who profit most by his criticisms have not, as a general thing, a very familiar acquaintance with the subject-matter of them. "The Face in the Glass" is one of one million such stories alike in all essential respects; but the writer of it knows very well the business of putting them together. Quite a different affair is the critical essay on "The Genius of Hawthorne," by an anonymous writer, in which thoughtful study is more plainly to be seen than literary practice, although the writing is good too. We have not much hesitation, let us remark, in saying "No" to the author when he—or rather she, it seems to be a woman—asks the question whether it was not a master-stroke of genius in Hawthorne to make Miriam, in "The Marble Faun," symbolize Italy. Anything symbolizes anything. If Miriam symbolizes Italy, it is very well; but she exists for other purposes, and, as we suppose, no master-stroke had anything to do with relating her to anything but the incidents of her life and to the men and women with whom she is surrounded. But, on the whole, the critic keeps closely to the work in hand, and lovers of Hawthorne will be extremely well pleased with this aid to their study of him. For poetry this last Atlantic has pieces by Miss Celia Thaxter, by Dr. Holmes, and by an anonymous writer. Dr. Holmes's "Bill and Joe" is the heartiest and most simply natural expression that he has ever given, so far as we can recollect, to the sentiment which pervades so much of his verse—the man's fond looking-back to the things of youth. It will be read with pleasure. We ought not to forget the "Siberian Exiles" of Mr. T. W. Knox, which contains new information, nor the reviews at the end of the magazine, in which a poor book by Dr. C. B. Boynton—"The History of the Navy"—is well shown up by a critic who is evidently very well read and very intelligent, and in which appears the best criticism of "The Spanish Gypsy" that we remember to have read. That poem, by the way, has been handled with far more fairness and impartiality by American critics than by English.

Of Lippincott's for September it is not necessary to say much. A new contributor, with what seems to be the pseudonymous name "Augustus Adee," furnishes a touching little Parisian sketch, quite cleverly done, called "On Essaie Tous les Gants." Mr. C. A. Bristed begins a set of articles on the "Dispute about Education," but has not yet got far enough into them to make it worth while to pay attention to him as yet. "Nantucket" we found amusing, and so, in another way, was the "Pre-Raphaelite at Saratoga," which has all its jokes italicized and made very easy. Mr. Bayard Taylor is the only writer who signs his name to poetry in the September Lippincott's, though there are two or three pieces besides his. His is smooth, and otherwise up to Mr. Taylor's level. By the "Vigil," a piece of blank-verse, we are reminded to say that the proof-reader of Lippincott's is a little careless this month, as witness pp. 300 and 326.

Putnam's as well as Harper's has something Siberian: Mr. George Kennan gives us a well-written account of sledging in a tremendous snow-storm. Dr. H. Grünbaum's "John and Bridget" is a talk about the derivation and meaning of names, and will be found very unlike the ordinary papers on the same subject, which usually go on repeating each other indefinitely, seldom containing anything that has not, time out of mind, been the property of all the Ladies' Magazines. Dr. Grünbaum brings much learning to bear on the subject, rather too much, perhaps, for he treats of many names that most of his hearers have never heard of. And we must say, we think he is to be warned to shun sportiveness and the tossing of the light joke. Mr. William Young gives us this month the third of his series of articles on Mr. Old's collection of autographs. The letters he copies tend strongly to confirm—Veuve Beauharnais and Mozart being witnesses—the old scandal that the widow was at least well enough inclined to be wooed and won by young General Buonaparte, and the story of the mysterious stranger who engaged Mozart to write him a requiem, and afterwards used to call on the composer urging the completion of the work, till at last Mozart, his sensitive temperament worked upon by the singular circumstances of the engagement, came to regard this requiem as his own funeral dirge, and died before he finished it. Mr. Young gives us also copies of characteristic letters by Oliver Cromwell and Charles the First. The Rev. Dr. Vinton tries to reopen the Eleazer Williams controversy by offering himself as a person convinced of the justice of that gentleman's claims. But he offers, too, the evidence which convinced him, and it is all either absurdly weak in itself or utterly unsupported, or both. The editorial notes to the article are done very gravely, but seem to be really a parody on the notes of editors of real historical documents. "The Situation and the Candidates" is one of those extremely impartial political articles the writers of which see little difference between this and that or that and this, because really they see nothing. "French Newspapers" will be found readable, and so will "A Three-Horned Dilemma." Putnam's poetry is almost never good; but this month, if we except Mr. A. B. Street's "Pine," and Mr. Calvert's "Threescore," and Mr. Hatfield's "Organ Chant," it is pretty and good.

"Parole d'Honneur" in Harper's continues as well as it begun, and is a vivid picture of the life—or a part of it—of a Southern court-house town, and of the lawless wilderness that so often surrounds it closely. "Women's Work and Wages" contains useful statistical statements, which must represent personal investigations made by the writer among the large work-rooms of the city. The leading pictorial article is another screed by Mr. Parton on the Gorham Manufacturing Company's silver-ware. It is not so well done as a former article on the same subject in the Atlantic, but it makes rather better than ordinary letterpress to accompany the illustrations. Other illustrated papers are on "Travelling in Siberia;" "The Unwelcome Guests of Insects;" "The Last Years of Kosciuszko;" and some chapters of Mrs. Craik's novel. The "Easy Chair" has something to say on foreign travel—in which a good word is spoken for Byron—on Mr. Longfellow's reception in England, on Mr. Evarts's not very civil or dignified speech at the dinner given to the Chinese embassy, and on William Morris's "Earthly Paradise." It is all good, and shows Mr. Curtis at nearly his best in his various capacities of sentimental essayist, literary critic, and censor of minor morals.

In the Galaxy Mr. Grant White criticises Mr. Morris fairly well. He appears to be ignorant of the fact that Mr. Morris came before the public when a young man. In his appearances in the Germ he hardly can be said to have got before the public; but the "Defence of Guenevere, and other Poems" has been for years well known to such readers as are familiar with late English poetry, and ought to be read by the critics of his more recent works. Mr. White tries, we see, to reintroduce the use of the past-participle in en—"sitten," for example—and disfigures his own writing without compensation, unless in his own virtuous consciousness of philological duty performed in the face of an indifferent or sneering world he can find his sufficient reward.

Dr. John C. Peters compiles from books on India a readable account of the way in which cholera begins its march from the holy places of the Hindoos. "For Life" is a story by Miss M. L. Poole, who seems to be improving slightly. Her hero's complexion is still a little too clear an olive, and his eyes more darkly passionate than is very common, and his face a trifle too clear cut and sensitive, and the heroine has more and duller dull pains at her heart than if she were really alive; but on the whole the story "For Life" may be read without that mental goose-flesh which the near neighborhood of stories of this school usually produces. "Great Awakenings" is a feeble article on revivals of religion. "The Galaxy Miscellany" is composed of Mr. N. S. Dodge's spirited account of the collision of two Cunarders off Newfoundland; an agreeable tale about "The Mud Baths of Franzensbad;" "An Old Newspaper," by Mr. C. P. Cranch; some of Mr. George Wakeman's padding made out of old scraps of newspapers; and an article, not of great research, but readable, as such articles are apt to be, by Dr. T. Edwards Clarke, on "Slow and Secret Poisoning." The Galaxy "Driftwood" is made up of some sensible talk from Philip Quilibet on "Political Candor," and some conjectures as to the probable effect on the Yankee character of the admixture of German blood which the American race is now undergoing. But it would require a profounder ethnologist than the writer to do more than deal in conjectures on this subject. "The Annals of Angling," by Mr. Charles Lanman, contains a good list of recent English works on fishing.

In Hours at Home, the Rev. W. W. Patton addresses the religious world in a way that will probably not find much favor among those who speak for the religious world about amusements. But the young men and women who by and by are to be the Church, Mr. Patton has on his side, and what he has written and may write will not be without fruit. Another good article in this month's Hours at Home is Dr. D. B. Simmons's "Religion of Japan." "A Chat with Adolphe Thiers" is translated from the German of a gentleman who seems to have been profoundly impressed with respect for the little historian with his big house and big ways; Mr. J. W. Phelps gives a description of the Lincoln College for colored students; Miss Alice Gray, a new writer, tells a pleasant story entitled "Julie Dean;" there is a discourse by Dr. Bushnell, to whom we decline to listen when he preaches on architectural subjects; there are some pretty verses by Grace Hinsdale; there are more chapters of "The Chaplet of Pearls;" there are some agreeable "Leaves from the Unpublished Journal" of a Revolutionary minister, who journeyed all the way from Essex, in Massachusetts, to Philadelphia, where he saw Dr. Franklin—and so the magazine is made up.

The Catholic World's most striking article this month is an abusive review of Archbishop Purcell's "Vickers and Purcell Controversy," or rather it is an article for which the archbishop's book is made to stand as a text; there is no reviewing done. Mr. Vickers is declared to be not a clergyman, but a pantheistic lecturer; a "young gentleman;" "coolly impertinent;" a person "paternally castigated" by the archbishop; a victim of "lawless intellectual activity," and so on. The fact of the matter is, that the archbishop, who is better fitted morally than mentally to acquire the respect of his neighbors, was worsted in argument with Mr. Vickers a while ago, and some friends of the esteemed prelate cannot miss this opportunity of abusing the impertinent young gentleman, who "passed a few years in Germany studying what he calls science." Nothing at all is said of the matter in dispute, and the article in question is a perfect model of the misrepresentation that comes of non-presentation. The non-partisan reader will find in the September Catholic World not very much nutriment. "The Holy Shepherdess of Pibrac" will amuse him, and he will be profited by reading "European Prison Discipline" and "Gheel, a Colony of the Insane," both of which articles are well worth attention; and the account of Madame De La Fayette (translated) is a beautiful picture of conjugal love; but there is nothing besides, we believe. However, three good articles seem to be not a poor allowance, as the magazines go this month; none of them is more than fairly good; none, perhaps, quite up to its own standard.

A MAN IN EARNEST.*

THE subject of this memoir was born in Vermont, in the year 1811. He died in the hospital near Murfreesborough, Tennessee, in February, 1863. Anything concerning him which lay between these two dates and was of vital importance to his fellow-men might, we should say, have been very fully told in half a column of the space devoted by the religious weeklies to obituary notices. As his biographer, who has had five years in which to consider the matter, thinks differently, it may be worth while to lay before the curious reader some account of the facts of Mr. Conant's life, of the opinions he held, and the kind of work he did to earn the title of "A Man in Earnest."

Up to his nineteenth year Mr. Conant seems to have been a reasonably good boy, of whom nothing noteworthy is recorded but that at some very tender age he bore an unjust whipping rather than betray a playmate. But at nineteen Mr. Collyer finds this "bud of promise on the tree of his life": "July 14, 1830.—I, Augustus Hammond Conant, do this day resolve to break myself of every evil practice, and to forsake every sin as revealed to me by the light of reason. So help me God!" In 1832, "starting from Whitehall in the canal-boat Missanic, Mr. Conant went by Fort Ann and Fort Miller to Saratoga." Thence he went on out West. Mr. Collyer devotes eight or nine pages to slight geographical notes of this important journey; and as they are about as significant as anything else that he records, we will transcribe one or two of them: "Jonesville he found a town of two frame and four log houses." "On the Sunday he came to White Pigeon, where he attended meeting all day." "Keokuk he found, in those early days, a sink of depravity—by far the most wicked place he had ever seen in his life." "Marietta, Mr. Conant found a very handsome place indeed; Wheeling, a mile long, built of brick, and containing 8,000 people; Steubenville, flourishing exceedingly; and Pittsburg the wonder of all that his eyes had ever seen since he left home, for elegance, grandeur, and business."

In 1836 we find Mr. Conant on a farm of his own, within twenty miles of Chicago. Beside his farm work, he did nothing very important except keep a diary, from which Mr. Collyer quotes liberally—selecting, however, he says, only such extracts as "will preserve the essential spirit of the entire work." Judging from these extracts, Mr. Conant seems to have had a fondness for brief and concise statements, which appears to have failed of producing its most natural effect upon his biographer. Let us give a specimen or two:

"Sept. 16.—Attended meeting, and read a sermon of Channing's.
"Oct. 16.—Went to the mill.
"Oct. 21.—Returned from the mill.
"Nov. 13.—Went to the miller's to read Channing. Unwell; so wrote temperance address. Temperance meeting; delivered my address. Read 'Statement of Reasons.' Circulated subscription paper for a school. Mended boots."

There are several pages of this kind of thing, of which Mr. Collyer says: "These extracts need no comment; they speak for themselves"—which they do.

About this time Mr. Conant, who appears to have been agitated in a mild sort of way on the subjects of temperance and slavery, fell in with the Western Messenger, which was then edited by Mr. James Freeman Clarke, and afterwards with some of Channing's sermons. "The great positive doctrines of Unitarianism" took immediate possession of him. He gave up his farm, sent his wife and children to Vermont, and betook himself to Cambridge, where he passed a year in preparing himself for the ministry. In Cambridge he taught Sunday-school, delivered temperance addresses, heard Dr. Gannett preach, began the study of Greek (which, however, he considered of doubtful utility), wrote letters to the Western Messenger, which, he says, had "made him acquainted with some of the master spirits of the age," and had his head examined by a phrenologist. One is not surprised to find that the examination made a considerable impression on him.

* "A Man in Earnest: Life of A. H. Conant. By Robert Collyer." Boston: H. B. Fuller; Chicago: John R. Walsh. 1868.

The year ended, he returned with his family to Illinois, and settled in Geneva, where, for the next sixteen years, he preached to a small Unitarian congregation. In 1857 he left Geneva to go to Rockford, and remained there in charge of another church of the same denomination until the war broke out. His life at Rockford appears to have been marked by no specially remarkable incident except the celebration of his silver wedding, an account of which, about as suggestive as such accounts are apt to be, is copied into the biography from the Christian Inquirer. In 1861 Mr. Conant resigned his charge, to take a chaplaincy in the Nineteenth Illinois Regiment. He seems to have enjoyed himself pretty well in this position, and to have done much serviceable hospital work—not to speak of sundry little odd jobs of carpentry which added much to his own comfort and that of other officers of the regiment. He was a good deal troubled at one time by a Mr. Moody, a Methodist preacher, who insisted on praying and preaching in an uncomfortably loud voice, who commented roughly on what he thought Mr. Conant's want of zeal, and who carried away into the prayer-meeting many of the latter gentleman's flock. In 1863 Mr. Conant died in the hospital, of an inflammation of the lungs. Mr. Collyer preached his funeral sermon, and now prints it as the concluding chapter of this memoir. As to the memoir itself, if Mr. Collyer were not in such evident sympathy with the subject of it, we should describe it as a painful and laborious effort to make something out of nothing. As it is, that description will answer well enough for the work performed by Mr. Collyer's readers. The fact of the matter is, that while Mr. Conant was a good man, an estimable member of society, an endurable preacher, a person of much bodily activity, his acts and opinions are of not the least consequence to his fellow-beings generally. It is only Mr. Collyer's love for a telling, or "meaty," or "savory" expression that makes him think the term "an earnest man" in any special sense applicable to Mr. Conant. Earnestness is of the spirit and mind; and before it is proper to call a man "earnest," it is better to require of him a rather less arid spirit and a rather stronger and wider mind than Mr. Conant could lay any claim to possessing. However, Western Unitarians who knew and liked the subject of this biography—to say nothing of those who know and like the biographer—will be interested in reading the book, and may very probably be profited by reading it. They will, at all events, get not much harm—though, of course, it is bad to hear exaggerated praise and to learn to use false standards.

The Gordian Knot: A Story of Good and of Evil. By Shirley Brooks author of "Sooner or Later," "Aspen Court," etc. (London: Bradbury, Evans & Co. 1868.)—The tone of Mr. Shirley Brooks's novel is so decorously proper and conventional that it seems almost a pity not to be able to draw from it any profounder lesson than that people who wish to attain any very respectable moral altitude would do well to be born of disreputable, or even actively vicious, parents. Perhaps this was not the precise teaching which the "Gordian Knot" was intended to convey; and the reader, if he be a young married man addicted to clubs and billiards, and coming home late at night, may reasonably hope to profit by Mr. Brooks's exposition of the deleterious effects of such practices on home life and the happiness of wives. For our own part, being prejudiced in favor of the view that there are certain kinds of literary and artistic work which no man of sound mind is justified in undertaking unless he is qualified both by nature and cultivation to produce something which shall at least approximate the best of its kind, we find this novel grievously flat and unprofitable. Mr. Brooks is a man of such evident cleverness that it is the less easy to pardon him for neglecting the absolutely necessary work which may be done with a pen and ink, and to which a man can devote himself as to a business which may be learned by the help of ordinary industry, in order to produce books such as this. What good reason is there why any one should write a novel like this, with not one stroke of genuine character-painting in it, with a story of no conceivable interest or importance, with an objectionable moral and plenty of trite moralizing?

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Prices. | |
|---|---|---|
| Adèle Dubois: a Tale, swd | (Loring) | $0 75 |
| Addington (R. D.), The Sabbath of Life | (Am. News Co.) | 1 50 |
| Alcott (A. B.), Tablets | (Roberts Bros.) | |
| Field (Miss K.), Pen Photographs of Charles Dickens's Readings, swd | (Loring) | 0 50 |
| Holy Bible, illustrated by Doré, Part 30 | (Robert Turner) | 1 00 |
| La Fontaine's Fables, illustrated by Doré, Part 15 | (Robert Turner) | 0 40 |
| McPherson (E.), Political Manual for 1868 | (Philp & Solomons) | |
| Osborn (H. S.), Teacher's Guide to Palestine | (J. C. Garrigues & Co.) | |
| Rolfe (W. J.) & Gillet (J. A.), Hand-book of the Stars | (Woolworth, Ainsworth & Co.) | |
| Hand-book of Natural Philosophy, | " " | |
| Sartoris (Mrs. A. K.), Medusa, and other Tales, swd | (Loring) | 0 35 |
| Shenstone (W.), Essays on Men and Manners | (Roberts Bros.) | |
| The Confectioner's Hand-book, swd | (O. A. Roorbach) | |
| The Painter's Hand-book, swd | (O. A. Roorbach) | |
| The Workshop, No. 7, swd | (E. Steiger) | 0 50 |

HEBREW AND JEWISH BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS.

FREDERIK MULLER,

BOOKSELLER,

IN AMSTERDAM,

Will sell at his salerooms, Heerengracht K K, 130, 3d of November, 1868,

AN INCOMPARABLE COLLECTION OF

HEBREW AND JEWISH BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS,

5,600 NUMBERS,

Formed from the Libraries of GIUSEPPE ALMANZI, of Padua, Rabbi JACOB EMDEN, of Altona (died 1776), and Chief Rabbi M. J. LEWENSTEIN, of Paramaribo (Surinam), comprising about 2,900 books in Hebrew, among them the rarest editions—some printed on vellum before 1500, some before 1540, and many unknown to all bibliographers. The Jewish books, about 2,600 in number, comprise a vast and rare assemblage of works by Jews and Christians on Biblical and Rabbinical Literature and History, especially many very rare and unknown books by the Spanish and Portuguese Jews, as, for example, the Spanish book, with four plates by REMBRANDT. Among the manuscripts, a MACHASOR on vellum, from the 12th or 13th century, of the highest interest.

Catalogues to be had of Messrs. B. Westermann & Co., 440 Broadway; F. W. Christern, 743 Broadway; L. W. Schmidt, 24 Barclay street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the NATION kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston,

HAVE FOR SALE

The following Miscellaneous Standard Works:

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE, from the Commencement of the French Revolution, 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons, 1815. Latest and best edition. 23 vols. 8vo, and Atlas, 4to, half calf, extra. Edinburgh, 1860.

NOTES AND QUERIES; the three series complete, from November, 1849, to June, 1867. A handsome copy in 35 vols. small 4to, half calf, gilt tops. London, 1850-67.

LOCKE'S WORKS, with Life. By LORD KING. 11 vols. 8vo, sprinkled calf, marbled edges. London, 1824-30.

FULLER'S WORKS. Worthies of England, Church History, and Holy and Profane States. 10 vols. 8vo, polished calf, extra, gilt tops, edges uncut. London, 1840.

FROISSART'S AND MONSTRELET'S CHRONICLES. Best editions, in 24 vols. 8vo, and Atlas of Plates, 4to, half morocco, gilt tops, edges uncut. London, 1808-10.

NOUVELLE BIOGRAPHIE GENERALE. 46 vols. 8vo, half morocco. Paris, 1862-66. The best Biographical Dictionary published.

BRIDGEWATER TREATISES. Complete in 13 vols. 8vo, polished calf, extra, gilt tops, edges uncut. Wm. Pickering, London, 1833.

Also, elegant copies of the Aldine Poets, large paper; British Essayists, large paper; Grote's History of Greece; Strickland's Queens of England and Scotland; Encyclopædia Britannica; Smith's Dictionaries; The London Punch; Knight's Pictorial Shakespeare, original edition; Irving's Works, large paper; Scott's Waverley Novels, etc., etc.

NEW BOOKS.

I.

LIVES AND DEEDS WORTH KNOWING ABOUT, with other Miscellanies. By the Rev. W. F. STEVENSON. Printed on toned paper, crown 8vo, cloth, $1 50.

II.

THE FRESH AND SALT WATER AQUARIUM. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, author of "Common Objects of the Country and Sea-shore," etc. With eleven colored illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

III.

POEMS WRITTEN FOR A CHILD. By Two Friends. With sixteen illustrations. Square 16mo, cloth, gilt edges, $1 50.

IV.

THE WHITE COCKADE; or, Faith and Fortitude. A Novel. By JAMES GRANT. 12mo, boards 80 cents.

 Any of the above will be sent by mail, prepaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS,

416 Broome Street, New York.

Just published, and will be mailed free on receipt of a postage stamp,

CATALOGUE

OF

THE LIBRARY COLLECTED BY THE LATE PROFESSOR AMOS DEAN, OF ALBANY, N. Y.,

For sale, at the very moderate prices affixed, by

JOSEPH SABIN, Bookseller

84 Nassau Street, New York.

This Catalogue forms a volume of 186 pages.

LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE.

Now ready,

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

I. DALLAS GALBRAITH. An American Novel. Part IX.
II. SORRENTO.
III. PRE-RAPHAELITE AT SARATOGA.
IV. TWO AMERICAN PRESIDENTS.
V. ON ESSAIE TOUS LES GANTS.
VI. NANTUCKET.
VII. A VIGIL.
VIII. DISPUTE ABOUT EDUCATION.
IX. MY TWO.
X. AMERICAN IN WARWICKSHIRE.
XI. THE KITCHEN.
XII. WHO SHALL SEPARATE US?
XIII. EXPRESSION IN SCULPTURE.
XIV. OUR MONTHLY GOSSIP.
XV. LITERATURE OF THE DAY.

For sale by all Periodical Dealers.

Yearly Subscription, $4; Single Number, 35 cents.

Specimen number sent to any address on receipt of 35 cents by the publishers.

Just published,

THE HERMITS. By the Rev. CHARLES KINGSLEY, M.A., author of "Westward Ho!" etc. With three plates and colored vignette title. 12mo, extra blue cloth, $2; extra gilt, $2 25. Being Vol. II. of the "Sunday Library."

A SUMMER IN ICELAND. By C. W. PAIJKULL. Translated by M. R. BARNARD, B.A. With map and numerous illustrations. 8vo, cloth, $5.

JOHN WARD'S GOVERNESS: A Novel. By A. L. MACGREGOR. 12mo, fine cloth, $1 75.

THE HOLY LAND: A Record of Travel. By WILLIAM HEPWORTH DIXON, editor of the Athenæum, London. New cheap edition, illustrated with steel plates and woodcuts, from original drawings and photographs, 12mo, extra cloth, $3.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
715 and 717 Market Street, Philadelphia.

JUST PUBLISHED:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies, and the Home Circle.

By HOWARD KINGSBURY and Rev. A. A. GRALEY.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction. Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50.

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,
678 Broadway, New York.

J. B. FORD & CO.

HAVE NEARLY READY

THE GREATEST HORSE BOOK EVER PUBLISHED!

HIRAM WOODRUFF

ON

THE TROTTING HORSE OF AMERICA:

How to Train and Drive him, with Reminiscences of the Trotting Turf.

The results of the Author's forty years' experience and unequalled skill in training and driving, together with a store of interesting matter concerning celebrated horses of the American Turf; embracing, also, an Introductory Notice of the late Hiram Woodruff, by GEO. WILKES, and a biographical sketch by the editor of the work, CHAS. J. FOSTER, of Wilkes's Spirit of the Times. The book is a handsome 12mo, and contains a splendid steel-plate portrait of Hiram Woodruff.

PRICE, EXTRA CLOTH, $2 25.

Single copies sent on receipt of price.
Early Orders from the Trade solicited.
Canvassers granted a liberal discount.

J. B. FORD & CO.,
164 Nassau Street, Printing-House Square, New York.

Will be ready Saturday, Aug. 29,

MODERN WOMEN, AND WHAT IS SAID OF THEM.

A REPRINT OF A SERIES OF ARTICLES IN THE "SATURDAY REVIEW."

With an Introduction by
Mrs. LUCIA GILBERT CALHOUN.

CONTENTS:

Introduction.
The Girl of the Period.
Foolish Virgins.
Little Women.
Pinchbeck.
Feminine Affectations.
Ideal Women.
Woman and the World.
Unequal Marriages.
Husband-hunting.
Perils of "Paying Attention."
Women's Heroines.
Interference.
Plain Girls.
A Word for Female Vanity.
The Abuse of Match-making.
Feminine Influence.
Pigeons.
Ambitious Wives.
Platonic Women.
Man and his Master.
The Goose and the Gander.
Engagements.
Woman in Orders.
Woman and her Critics.
Mistress and Maid on Dress and Undress.
Æsthetic Woman.
What is Woman's Work?
Papal Woman.
Modern Mothers.
Priesthood of Woman.
The Future of Woman.
Costume and its Morals.
La Femme Passée.
The Fading Flower.
Pretty Preachers.
Spoilt Women.

In one volume 12mo, handsomely printed and bound in cloth, bevelled boards, price $2. For sale by all Booksellers.

Sent by the Publisher, post-paid, on the receipt of the price.

J. S. REDFIELD, Publisher,
140 Fulton Street, New York.

NEW BOOKS.

The Life of Jesus: An Answer to Strauss. By the late Dr. J. F. I. TAFEL, Librarian at Tübingen. Price, $1 50.

Letters to a Man of the World. From the French of J. F. E. LE BOYS DES GUAYS. Price, $1 50.

Deus-Homo (God-Man.) By THEOPHILUS PARSONS, LL.D. Price, $2 50.

The Authenticity of the Gospels. By A LAYMAN. Price, $1.

The Doctrine of Life. From the Latin of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. Price, 75 cents.

A Commentary on Matthew. By Rev. WM. BRUCE, London. An Exposition of the Internal Sense. Price, $4.

Swedenborg, the Philosopher. By R. L. TAFEL, Ph.D. Price, $2 25.

Who was Swedenborg? By Rev. O. P. HILLER, London. Price, 50 cents.

The Temple of Solomon. By Rev. T. O. PAINE. Plates. Price, $6.

The Growth of the Mind. By SAMPSON REED. Price, $1.

C. SCRIBNER & Co. — NICHOLS & NOYES.
J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. — CLAXTON, REMSEN & HAFFELFINGER.

BOCHSA'S

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE HARP.

In this work the author has brought the common harp and the harp with double movement into a comparative point of view, and united all their relations—constantly treating the latter as a sequel to the former, and clearly proving that whoever understands the one will in a short time be perfectly acquainted with the other. The general principles of fingering and the various means of attaining expression are completely developed and illustrated by numerous examples.

Price $3 50, mailed postpaid.

OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers,
277 Washington Street, Boston.

CHARLES H. DITSON & CO.,
711 Broadway, New York.

REPUBLICAN

CAMPAIGN ENVELOPES FOR 1868.

Unique, Handsome, Significant, True, Ornamental, Useful, and Historical.

ON THE FRONT—The names of the distinguished candidates, with the latest heart sentiment of each. ON THE REVERSE—A Complete Synopsis of the Republican Platform.

The Political campaign of 1868 is destined to be the most memorable of any since the foundation of the Republic. There can be no more expressive souvenir of the Republican aspect of it than these envelopes.

Every Citizen should have a few, at least, to keep for posterity. Copyright secured. Republicans will, of course, use and circulate them extensively as possible.

100 sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of $1.
400 " " " " " " 3.
1,000 " " " " " " 5.
5,000 sent by express, at $4 per 1,000.
10,000 or more, sent by express, at $3 50 per 1,000.

WM. P. LYON & SON,
Envelope Manufacturers,
537 Pearl Street, New York.

TEACHERS

Interested in History, Mythology, Anglo-Saxon, Early English, Hebrew, French, German, Italian, and Spanish are invited to acquaint us with their specialties and send for our catalogue before selecting text-books for the approaching season. Our principal publications in French, German, and Saxon are in use at YALE, HARVARD, WASHINGTON COLLEGE, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, and other leading institutions.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, New York.

MORE MYSTERY.

PLANCHETTE OUTDONE.

THE PENDULUM ORACLE!

Moves for everybody!

Answers any question AT ONCE.

Will tell your inmost thoughts, and astonish as we ll a amuse all who consult it.

PRICE ONE DOLLAR.

To be had at retail of SCHIFFER & CO., 713 Broadway.

Trade supplied by WALTON VAN LOAN, 111 William Street, New York.

The Nation.

This Journal commenced its Seventh Volume with the first issue of July, 1868. It has a well-established character as a political, social, and literary force, a medium for the best talent of the country, and a representative of national principles; while its absolute independence has, the Publishers believe, won it the respect and confidence of men of all parties. Its increased circulation among Clergymen of every denomination is proof of its value for the class of public teachers; and for the sake of its still wider diffusion among them the Publishers offer to send the paper free, and postage prepaid, for one month, to any clergyman wishing to make a trial of it with a view to subscribing.

The Publishers are constantly assured by Advertisers of the profitable returns from their advertisements in the Nation, the circulation of which is considerably larger than that of any similar weekly published in this country. Book publishers in every part of the Union, principals of schools, makers and exhibitors of works of art, will find it peculiarly to their advantage to advertise in the Nation. Full particulars of terms, etc., given by circular.

CONTENTS OF No. 164:

The Week.
The Next Step in Reconstruction.
The Probable Solution of the Greenback Controversy.
Thaddeus Stevens.
French Canada.
England.
The South and Democratic Success.
Literary Notes.
Mr. Bronson Alcott's Essays.
Chapman's Travels in South Africa.
Uhlhorn's Discourses.
Old Deccan Days.
The Opium Habit.
A Hand-book of Gymnastics and Athletics.
The Lost Cause Regained.
Hannah.
Folly as it Flies.
Books of the Week.
Portraits of Grant.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY AT
3 Park Place,
New York City.

 Persons wishing to dispose of the first seven numbers of Vol. I. can do so at the office of the Nation.

ARCHER, PANCOAST & CO.,

Manufacturers of

GAS FIXTURES,

COAL-OIL LAMPS, CHANDELIERS, ETC

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

Manufactory and Warerooms,

9, 11, 13 Mercer Street, N. Y.

T. G. SELLEW,

MANUFACTURER OF

D E S K S

AND OFFICE FURNITURE,

107 AND 176 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK.

 Library Furniture to order.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 166. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 181
EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Value of Southern Declarations.. 184
The Necessity of the Legal Tender Act 185
General Butler ..... 185
A Word with Prospective Ambassadors. 187
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Ballot as a Panacea ..... 188
The New School-Bill in Louisiana.... 189
NOTES:
Literary ..... 190
Ballad Books ..... 192
Popularization of Science in Germany. 193
A New Practical Hebrew Grammar.... 195
Réfutation de Force et Matière, Le Matérialisme Contemporain..... 195
Books of the Week ..... 196

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

IN the last few days of the canvass the Republicans in Vermont began to hope that their last year's majority could be increased by five or six thousand. Outsiders supposed them mistaken. The election comes in a busy time of the year for a rural population; the weather has been hot; the Democrats had not a ghost of a chance of carrying the State; and, altogether, it seemed likely that Republican carelessness would give "gains" for the World, and "Behold, how brightly breaks the morning!" would be in capitals in all the Democratic papers. But every Republican was out; in the heaviest vote ever cast the gain on last year's vote is probably nine thousand. This is because Hampton and Vallandigham were permitted to make themselves the present leaders of the Democratic party. Practically, the people are asked to say that we ought to give the negro back to his old owner, and substitute a South Carolina Black Code for the Civil Rights Bill. On that issue Vermont, at any rate, seems to have its mind made up. The effect will no doubt be good in Maine, and we dare say there are more Republican voters in Pennsylvania this morning than two days ago.

The South grows more, rather than less, disorderly, and unless there is truth in the story that the Northern Democrats are using all their powers of persuasion to keep the Southern brethren quiet till after the election, it seems as if we might very likely see Congress in session this month. It would be disagreeable for many reasons; but it may become necessary. Mr. Johnson's acts do nothing to make it unnecessary, and as for his words, he has recently been having one of his "conversations" with a Southern gentleman, which can hardly fail to increase the weekly number of murders in the South. He talked of removing Thomas from command in Tennessee, and putting Gillem, or Gordon Granger, or Rousseau, in his place. Thomas has declared in effect that civil war in Tennessee is imminent, and he of course may be relied on to support the Legislature and governor; Granger and Rousseau could probably be relied on to confront the state militia with Federal troops. But it is not likely that Mr. Johnson, however much it might suit his plans of future office-holding to put the Tennessee Democrats under obligations to him, will venture on doing what he talks about; but it is such talk that has done as much as any one thing to keep the South intractable. Just now it is wild enough without more goading.

The lower house of the Tennessee Legislature, we are glad to see, has passed the Militia Bill, and the Senate will do the same thing. It is said that more than 250 Republicans from various parts of the State have made affidavits before a committee of the Legislature that they, in their own persons, have been made the victims of shameful outrages of one kind and another, and further, they gave testimony concerning the sufferings of many others. Men, and even women, have been whipped, tortured, and murdered, for no offence but holding a political creed different from that of the Ku-klux Klan. This organization, or something practically the same, is at work throughout the South, and a branch of it seems to be ready to begin operations in Missouri. The story that comes from Arkansas to the effect that in three counties of that State there is open rebellion, and that there have been skirmishes between rebels and Union men (it is just as well to use the old names when we have the old things), we take to be exaggerated. It is true, however, that Arkansians in the North are not much surprised at the news. In Louisiana there have been no outbreaks as yet, but the quarrelling in the Legislature is very bitter. The agent of the Associated Press in New Orleans ought to be turned out of his place for his stupid and unbusiness-like partiality, which is so plainly shown in his reports that the reader is never inclined to believe more than half he says; but we take it that he would hardly tell a direct falsehood in stating matters of fact. If he has told the truth in regard to the ousting of Jewell, on suborned testimony, politics will not long be unmixed with pistol-shooting in Louisiana. Governor Scott, in South Carolina, has felt compelled to issue a circular denouncing secret armed associations. He promises "to exercise all his authority to keep peace;" but his means of enforcing his authority are small enough.

For the rest, in North Carolina 70,000 men are enrolled in Union Leagues; but it is not Union Leagues that begin disturbances, and it would be well for the South if there were at least 70,000 members of such organizations in every State. North Carolina, by the way, the only State whose political future seems secure, has just found the advantage it is to her that the belief to that effect is generally held. She has been able to borrow a hundred thousand dollars that she wanted, at six per cent., a rate of interest obtainable by no other Southern State. Georgia is talking of unseating all the colored members in her Legislature. When the constitution was adopted, it was freely said that although it gave negroes the right to vote, it made them ineligible to office. We have not a copy of that instrument, but if its effect should be as stated, it would be not the first piece of Republican legislation so bunglingly put together as to defeat the purposes of its framers. Florida has had one or two riots within the last week.

General Rosecrans has paid a visit to the White Sulphur Springs, and had long consultations there with various Southern generals, including Lee and Beauregard, on the state of the country. They were closeted together by the hour, and it is recorded, by way of giving some idea of the importance of the occasion, that one general who was about to leave, on hearing that he was wanted, "at once ordered his trunks back to his room." Of what was said at these interviews we know nothing, except from a brief sketch of General Lee's views sent to the Richmond Whig by a correspondent; and from this we learn that the popular notion at the North that the Southerners do not like the negroes, and would ill-treat them if left in their hands, is a pure delusion; that, on the contrary, the Southerners, having been brought up with the negroes, are very fond of them and would freely concede to them as many rights and privileges as would be good for them, and more. General Rosecrans has returned to the North, carrying in his valise, according to popular rumor, an address from General Lee and others to the nation at large. But in reply to enquiries made of him here by a Tribune reporter, General Rosecrans says that there is no such document in existence; that there was "much said" at the interviews in which he took part at the Springs, and that he would let the public know what it was when he thought proper; that he did not know whether the Southern leaders would "devote themselves to the task of restoring prosperity or not;" that he had not "considered the question of the payment of the Government bonds;" and that he had not "the slightest idea" what were Grant's chances for election. On the whole, we are inclined to believe that the meeting at the White Sulphur Springs will not exercise that powerful influence on the destiny of humanity which "Our Washington Correspondent" at first led us to expect.

The only fresh campaign story about Grant is that he stole a Shetland pony, which his son now rides, followed by two black grooms. This is the tale as Pomeroy tells it; but we cannot help feeling that he has suppressed a portion of it, and that if the whole of it were revealed, it would be found that the blacks are eunuchs, and force everybody they meet to lie down on his face on the side of the road till young Grant passes. About Blair, we have to record that after his expulsion from Yale he tried the University of North Carolina, from which he was also expelled; and it was after this that he made his appearance at Princeton and cut off the nose of a fellow-student. The way in which Colfax escapes the stories is something wonderful, and proves his popularity to be almost unprecedented. The only charge brought against him thus far is that of having, in order to pay attention to another visitor who sent in his card on a "silver waiter," snubbed a soldier who had asked for an interview. The soldier had been previously requested by a pampered menial to deposit his card on the same evidence of wanton luxury, but the veteran, not having his card-case about him, refused to comply, and the snobbish Colfax, disgusted with his vulgarity, haughtily refused to converse with him. This story Mr. Colfax disposed of by a peremptory denial, and added that he had never owned a "silver salver." Disheartened by the result of this first attempt, the party troubadours have ever since let him severely alone.

The Chicago Tribune is displeased with us for not marking, in our account of campaign stories, our appreciation of the essential difference between stories, such, for instance, as stories of Blair's drunkenness and stories of Grant's drunkenness—the former being true, and the latter false. Let us say, in the first place, that in every reference we have made to campaign stories in "The Week," we have noticed them simply as works of art, and not as instruments of persuasion. Of their utility we have not thought, and do not mean to think, in this place. We enjoy them, simply; to others we leave the task of analyzing them. If the Tribune chooses to take a cold utilitarian view of them, let it. We shall do nothing of the kind. Let us say, in the second place, however, that if, as instruments of persuasion, campaign stories do not count for much, one party is as much to blame as the other. The great reason why our stories of Blair's drunkenness do not produce much effect is, that some of us who now tell them told similar stories of Grant's drunkenness before he was nominated. Now, the public at large do not believe, as some newspapers appear to believe—we need not say we do not include the Chicago Tribune in the number—that it is in the power of a political convention to change the moral order of the universe, and make it all right to lie about one man, and all wrong to lie about another; so, having discovered that we lied about Grant, they are unwilling to believe that we tell the truth about Blair, and when we unpack our campaign stories, and bid the audience get their tears and their horror ready, they simply put on a broad grin.

Mr. Atkinson, of Boston, a week ago, demanded payment in specie for a ten-dollar greenback of Mr. Spinner, the United States Treasurer, who naturally declined to pay, and wrote the applicant a long letter instead, in which he excused the issue of greenbacks on the ground of necessity, but acknowledged that the necessity of not redeeming them in gold had ceased to exist; urged the opening of national banking to all who complied with the requirements of the law, and the issue of a new four per cent. loan both here and in Europe, to take the place of the present bonds, and to be deposited by the banks as security for the payment of their bills. Mr. Spinner treats the subject of resuming specie payments, as far as the Government is concerned, as one of will mainly, but we cannot help thinking that the supply of gold in the country has much to do with it, and that though it might be easy to begin paying in specie, it might not prove easy to keep on. But Mr. Spinner's letter is full of good sense and good feeling. We would rather, however, not hear him talk of lending money to the Government on patriotic or other sentimental grounds, because this gives the Butlers the idea that if they can show that a man lent money to the Government from purely selfish motives, the cutting down of his interest or principal is no sin.

There has been a good deal of speech-making during the week, the ablest and most solid and most useful of the campaign, thus far, being Senator Wilson's at Bangor. He performed in it very successfully the very difficult feat of giving his readers a condensed history of the secession movement, throwing out into strong relief the connection of the Democratic party with it, and sketching the plans and purposes of the Southern leaders, in a series of very light but very graphic strokes. One does not often read a more artistic piece of oratory for campaign purposes. Moreover, it has the merit of reading very well, and may therefore be made to do good service in print. Mr. Wilson's recent book doubtless prepared him for the effort, but even with the materials in his brain, there are not many men who could put them together on the platform so skilfully. The oratory of the canvass in general has thus far not been remarkably effective. There is in all of it that we have seen a little feebleness and uncertainty, owing to the differences within the party ranks about the public debt, and the soreness left by impeachment, so that nobody blows his trumpet with the full power of his lungs. Some of the leading party papers, too, rarely mention such champions as Trumbull and Fessenden without a sneer or malediction, and with this remarkable piece of tactics couple the equally remarkable device of praising to the skies General Butler—the great repudiator of the party platform. Of course, the "bawlers" of the party are not discouraged by this sort of thing, but the really earnest men who contribute its bone and sinew, are not encouraged by it. Considering that impeachment is no longer a part of the party policy, and that the maintenance of the public credit is a very important part of it, we would respectfully recommend that, as a matter of expediency, the depraved and guilty Seven be now let alone, and the representative of the Fifth Massachusetts district be allowed to travel as much as possible on his own merits.

Our readers may remember that when Mr. Washburne made the charges of having changed his name, and being a fugitive from justice, against Mr. Ignatius Donnelly, which drew from this last-named gentlemen his now celebrated outburst of blackguardism, there was a Congressional committee appointed to enquire into the truth of these charges. It reported, however, that since Mr. Donnelly's election to Congress it had detected no trace on his part either of a change of name or of a flight from the officers of the law, and that into his history before he became a member of the House it did not feel authorized to enquire. The matter then dropped, and from some expressions let fall by Mr. Donnelly we got the impression that he and Mr. Washburne had been reconciled. Since the Bingham-Butler reconciliation, we are, of course, prepared for any display of forgiveness on the part of Congressmen. It appears, however, that we were mistaken, and that the lofty natures of Messrs. Washburne and Donnelly are still rent by the old hates. Donnelly has just been treating his constituents to an account of his Congressional labors, which in many respects surpasses his famous Congressional speech, and reveals the same intense animosity to the Washburne family. This second effort makes Mr. Donnelly, beyond question, the champion ruffian of North America. If Brick Pomeroy is wise and enterprising, he will secure him as a "special contributor" for the Democrat at any price.

The difficulty the English liberals have—and will, we fear, continue to have for a long time to come—in acting with the Irish has just been well illustrated by the case of Mr. Mason Jones, who, though an Irishman by birth, has long been in political affiliation with the English radicals, and is a candidate for a seat in Parliament from Queen's County. But he is, like all English radicals, an opponent of the temporal power of the Pope, and a friend of Italian unity—so he has been summarily dismissed, the Italian question being a more vital one to the priests than any other question.

The women are going to make a determined effort to vote at the next election in England. The "National Society for Women's Suffrage" has issued a batch of instructions to claimants, accompanied by a form of claim. In several places women have already, through accident, oversight, or peculiarities in local usage, succeeded in getting their names on the register, but the general question of the right of female rate-payers to vote under the act of 1867 remains to be determined, and it will probably be determined adversely. It seems pretty clear, judging from the list of candidates now before the public, that there will be no material change in the composition of the next House of Commons. The members will be largely the same as those of the last, and such new ones as come in will be drawn from the same classes. The Economist, whose political judgments are always amongst the soundest, urges, however, that though there may be no change in the personnel of the House, there will be a marked change in its spirit; that ever since the overthrow of the Confederacy, and the triumphant issue of the North from its troubles, the conviction has penetrated the minds of English politicians, deeper than mere argument could have driven it, that the burden of proof lies on those who are opposed to reforms, whereas, under the Palmerstonian régime, it rested on those who proposed them. Accordingly, the writer predicts sweeping legislative changes through the instrumentality of the very men who have hitherto preached rest and thankfulness. In connection with this prediction, the fact is worth attention that all the rising statesmen are men of the middle class, and that the aristocracy is for the first time in its history ceasing to produce a supply of first-class men for the leading positions in the government, the only aristocratic politician who can be said to be a competitor for the highest prizes being the Marquis of Huntington, who is, however, after all only a second-rate man.

The Trades Unionists have been meeting with rather rough treatment from the courts both here and in England during the last month. Eight bricklayers were convicted at White Plains, in this State, the other day, for conspiracy in refusing to allow one William Dawson to work at his trade, he not being a member of their Union. We spoke some time ago of the argument before the English Vice-Chancellor on an application for an injunction to restrain certain members of a trades union from issuing placards or other notices warning operatives not to work for a certain manufacturing company. The injunction has been granted. Since then a batch of masons have been convicted of conspiracy at Leeds, in England, for enticing or intimidating men into leaving the employment of a master builder against whom a strike was pending simply because he had his stones dressed at the quarry instead of carting them in the rough state six miles to the building, and thus seriously increasing the labor both of horses and men. All attempts on the part of workmen to increase the labor of production are offenses not only against their own class, but against civilization. If they have not sense enough to refrain from them, nobody can regret seeing them go to jail for committing them.

On the other hand, there are plenty of signs that the reign of folly and ignorance is coming, though slowly, to an end. Mr. Briggs, of the Briggs Colliery, of which we have so often spoken, has made another report, in which he speaks more warmly than ever of the success of his experiment of admitting workmen to a share in the profits. The "Free Labor Registration Society"—an association formed to assist men who wished to escape from the tyranny of the trades unions in getting employment—have made their first report, showing the result of six months' operations, from which it appears that they have obtained employment for upwards of 1,000 men in various trades. In what is called the "Black Country," in Warwickshire, a large population of nailers are reduced to the utmost misery, and the trade nearly destroyed, through a series of strikes. Four years ago the plate-lock makers at Wolverhampton, in the same region, finding themselves threatened by the masters with a reduction of wages, instead of striking, formed, with the assistance of John Stuart Mill and Tom Hughes, a co-operative association which has been perfectly successful, and is now likely to receive large reinforcements of members, owing to another threatened reduction in wages. In this city the eight-hour bricklayers are slowly going to the wall before the influx of non-union men from Canada and other places.

The Lanterne excitement continues in Paris. M. Rochefort has withdrawn, it is said, to Belgium in order to be able to continue the publication of his paper, which the Government has not, under the new law, the power of suppressing arbitrarily, though it may seize particular issues. He has now two separate condemnations, with a separate sentence of fine and imprisonment attached to each, and it is not at all likely he will be able to show his face in France again under the present régime. His prodigious success, pecuniary as well as political, has produced a host of imitations of the Lanterne, all of them servile. Five of these little pamphlets now lie before us: Le Lampion, La Chandelle, La Petite Lanterne, La Veilleuse (night-light), and L'Eteignoir, selling at various prices from five to two sous, and all attempting to treat the questions of the day in short paragraphs in the Rochefort manner, and all failing miserably. The lowest-priced one is coarse and indecent, and the others labored and dull.

Those who imagine that the Government will be restrained by the law, however, in its mode of putting down offenders against its peace and dignity, are likely to find themselves grievously mistaken. Meetings for the discussion of politics or any other subjects in private houses are allowed by law, if each person present comes with an invitation from the owner. Two "reunions" of this character were recently called by opposition candidates at Nîmes and Alais, and were at once pounced upon and dispersed by the police, in one case with the aid of the military and with great and unnecessary violence. The newspapers have remonstrated as warmly as they dare; but there is no legal remedy. Suits, either civil or criminal, cannot be instituted against any functionary, high or low, without the consent of the Government, and we need hardly say such suits are, therefore, unknown in France. The exasperation of the authorities is likely to be increased to the highest point by the triumph, by a large majority, in the Department of the Jura, of M. Grévy, the opposition candidate, whose election to the position of bâtonnier of the Paris bar we spoke of last week. This defeat has occurred, too, in a purely agricultural district, and is therefore alarming, as it shows that the peasantry are not so sound as was supposed.

The stories about the success of the new loan are somewhat conflicting. There has been every outward sign of great eagerness for it, the subscription-offices being adorned with large queues, stretching far into the street from morning till night, and the official papers say that thirty times the required amount (nearly $100,000,000) has been subscribed for. The rule of subscription was that every person applying for a share in the loan should deposit with his application the amount of annual interest he expected to draw from his investment, and this, if the stories of the total amount of the subscriptions be true, would have swelled the deposits in the Bank of France by some $120,000,000; whereas the balance, as published the day after the subscription-books were closed, only showed an increase of about $5,000,000, which has led the ill-natured to hint that there is "a lie somewhere." But there is no doubt the loan has gone off successfully; the exact amount subscribed for, over and above the sum needed, is not a point of any importance.

Count Cambray-Digny has succeeded in carrying through the Italian Parliament a measure authorizing him to farm out to a company the monopoly of tobacco-selling and cigar-making, which the Italian, as well as the French, Government reserves to itself. The Italian Government has, however, produced such abominable cigars that the smokers are pleased with the transfer, feeling that it may better and cannot worsen their condition. In France, on the other hand, the assumption by the Government of the task of providing cigars for the French people has had such happy results that every smoker blesses it. The tobacco is selected by its agents with the greatest care, and the manufacture of the cigars is conducted at various points with extraordinary skill and elaboration. Every step in the process is the result of scientific experiments, performed day by day and week by week, by scientific men assigned specially to the work and highly paid for it, and all of them pupils of the École Polytechnique. Mr. Jenckes will be glad to hear that since the manufacture was placed in charge of the graduates of this institution, frauds and peculation have totally ceased. "Blood," it is said, "tells," but it does not "tell" as training does.

THE VALUE OF SOUTHERN DECLARATIONS.

Two hundred "influential citizens" of Charleston, S. C., have held a meeting and issued an address to the white people of the district, informing them, in substance, that the blacks have come to the conclusion that true happiness for the negro can only be found in "the most degrading vassalage of the white citizens of the State," and are "fired with a sentiment of hostility to the white population of the city and State," and prophesying that, unless "timely averted, the purposes of wicked men will be accomplished in deadly strife, and in the streets of the city scenes will be enacted which all good men will deplore." The document is written in what, considering the season at which it appears, may perhaps be called campaign English, and it is therefore impossible to say what its value is, either as an expression of feeling or as a description of a state of things actually existing. The account it gives of the sufferings of the whites and of the bad conduct of the blacks may have some truth in it, but the reader is furnished with so little means of guessing how much truth that he is almost driven into refusing it all credence whatever as the only safe course. What adds to his difficulty is that the picture the paper draws of white sufferings makes the advice to the whites to be "patient" and do nothing violent, with which it winds up, sound very like the famous admonition to the mob, on no account to nail the ears of the sheriff's officer to the pump.

No matter to what Southern source one turns for information as to the real condition, moral as well as physical, of the South, one finds one's self plunged in the same perplexity. It is not simply that the language of Southern speeches and articles is inflated, but the propositions they contain are in such direct opposition to familiar facts of Southern history that one could not believe them, even if the language in which they are stated were never so simple and direct. For instance, we find in the report of General Rosecrans's interviews with General Lee at the White Sulphur Springs, published by the Richmond Whig, that "as to Southern animosity to the negro, nothing could be further from the fact, and why should there be? Said he, there is no rivalry between the races, but a reciprocal interest, growing out of the fact that each is dependent on the other to a great extent," etc., etc. Now, whether General Lee actually said this or no makes little difference for the purpose of our argument. Southern men of his class are constantly saying it, and the newspapers keep repeating it, and it is such a clear evasion of the real question that, hearing it so often, one is almost driven to the conclusion that discussion with Southern men is useless, and that wild abuse of them, such as the Hunnicuts and Underwoods indulge in, is as good a way of dealing with them as any.

They are not enemies of the negro, it is true, provided the negro accepts their theory of his rightful condition. But looking at enmity in this way, it may be said with equal truth that nobody has any enemies. All any man has to do, in order to put an end to all hostility to him, is to accept the conclusions of those who do not like him as to the place he ought to occupy in society. A proud man, for instance, is disliked because he thinks he is superior to his neighbors, and lets it be known that he thinks it; but if he became very humble in his manner, and acted every day as if he was the inferior of everybody he met, his former enemies would soon get to love him, or at least cease to hate him. A close rich man is disliked, because people think he has acquired his wealth in an improper manner, and that the generous and kind-hearted would have his money if justice were done; so all he has to do to make everybody his friend is to divide his possessions amongst his neighbors, and leave himself poor and mean, as people think he deserves to be.

This same difficulty is at the bottom of most national antipathies. If Americans would frankly accept the English view of the American character, and of the part which Americans ought to play in the world, the English would like the Americans very much; or if the English could be got to see themselves as the Americans see them, warmer friends than the two nations would not be found on earth. So, also, the long-standing hatred between France and England has been due simply to the resolute refusal of each nation to adopt the other's view of its character, capacity, and rights. Cases of hatred, flowing from pure devilishness of disposition, are almost unknown in civilized life. So that when the Southerner tells us that he is the friend of the black man, he simply means that he is the friend of the black man as long as the black man remains in what he considers his proper place—that of the member of an inferior race, who is, for the benefit of his superiors, to be restrained and prevented from exerting all his faculties. In other words, the assertion is a mere quibble, and does not forward the discussion in the least.

The war arose out of the fact that the North and South held two widely different theories of society and government, and the existing strife and confusion is kept up by the fact that the South refuses to accept and apply the Northern theory as to the result of its defeat in the field; and yet in nearly everything the Southern press and orators say about their aims and intentions this fact is kept out of sight. The North finding, at the close of the war, that the South was unwilling to accept its social theory, applied the screw in the shape of negro enfranchisement and partial white disfranchisement. Now, this might be called, as the Southerners do call it, "reducing the Southern whites to 'vassalage,'" if it were done deliberately for the purpose of permanently degrading the whites; but it is done for precisely the same reason that cannon was used against the Southern armies in the war—to make them submit to the will of the stronger. To call it "vassalage," under these circumstances, is simply silly.

What we want from Southern orators and statesmen is a declaration of their feelings and intentions in language used in the same sense as that in which we use it. For instance, we want to know, from General Lee and others, not whether they are friends of the negro seen from their point of view, but are they his friends seen from our point of view? Are they willing to take him not as a black, but as an ignorant man of mercurial temperament, and lay aside, for the purposes of legislation, all their old theories as to his origin and destiny? To these questions no Southerner of prominence has, to our knowledge, ever given a definite answer. No Southern paper ever touches them in discussion. We are left to find out which theory most Southerners entertain, incidentally, by watching their conduct to the negro and listening to their talk amongst themselves about him. Everything we learn in this way makes it all but certain that the mass of the Southern people have not adopted—and will not, if they can help it, adopt—the Northern theory of society; and that their fair talk to us is due simply to their practice of using words in a sense of their own, differing from ours. Now, if they will say frankly, "Your social and political theory we will never adopt," they would not only do a manly thing, but would do much to clear the public mind on both sides of the line. Instead of this, they pretend to adopt it by a kind of equivocation.

What we know of the nature of the Southern view of the negro's place in society we learn not from the speeches of the Lees and Stephenses and Beauregards, but from the practice of the mass of the community, and the state papers of the governors and other public men; from the black codes of many of the States after the war; and from the actual legislation of Kentucky, which, not having been touched by the reconstruction process, gives us an idea of what would be done all over the South were it not for Radical intermeddling. There the negro is literally an outlaw, is dependent for life and limb on the humanity of any ruffian whom he chances to meet—his evidence against white men not being received in the courts, or, at all events, counting for nothing if it is received. Evidence of this kind, not being prepared, is worth volumes of addresses and conversations with distinguished Southern statesmen. There are, of course, the same things to be said against negro suffrage that are to be said against all voting on the part of ignorant men; but when you have said this you have not finished the argument. You have still to show how it would fare with the ignorant man if he were deprived of the right of voting. In highly civilized and highly organized communities like New and Old England, or France and Germany, where respect for life and property has become a habit of the popular mind, and where the law is executed with certainty and despatch, a non-elector may, and does, enjoy security and comfort. He does not impress his opinions or wishes on the policy of the state, but he is sure of justice in the courts and of the aid of the police against his enemies. He is not asked to rely on the pity, or even on the kindly feeling, of his neighbors for protection.

Now, no honest Southern man will pretend that the negro at the South will find the same justice and the same protection if left entirely in the hands of the Southern people that poor white men do. There is a prejudice against him at the South; there is contempt for him; and there is also a habit of showing prejudice and contempt by acts of violence which the courts are not ready to punish. On these points we do not need General Lee's opinion. We have the facts before us every day in the newspapers; and what we want to know of General Lee is not whether he loves the negro and wants peace, but whether he is willing to submit to the conditions imposed by the conquering party in the late war—one of which is the acceptance and embodiment in the law and practice of the land of the Northern theory of society and government.

THE "NECESSITY" OF THE LEGAL TENDER ACT.

THE New York Times commented at some length on Monday last on our recent attempt to forecast the decision of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the Legal Tender Act. We must remind the Times that we have not argued the case, or tried to show what, as a matter of law, the court ought to decide. We have simply expressed an opinion as to what the decision of the court will be, and have endeavored to point out the probable effects of that decision on the business of the country. The Times does not, it is true, profess to answer us; but we may say that, had it done so, the only proper answer would have been the production of some special reason for believing that the court will decide differently from what we have predicted.

The Times, however, does give reasons for thinking that the court ought to sustain the law; but they will not, in our opinion, bear examination. It does not base the Legal Tender Act on the power to coin money, but simply on the necessity of the measure as a means of carrying on the war. Now, not only the Legal Tender Act, but anything whatever that Congress chose to do, might be justified under this construction. In other words, the argument is too strong. Congress being the sole judge of what is necessary for the defence of the national existence, it might wipe out at one blow all private debts, or, on this theory, send half the males to the field to fight, and put the other half to work under the lash to raise supplies. Such a measure might be justified on high grounds of necessity; but a court of law interpreting a constitution would not take cognizance of necessity of this kind.

The clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to make "all laws necessary and proper" for carrying its powers into effect undoubtedly points to such measures as are not inconsistent with other parts of the Constitution, and which, in time of war for instance, will be proximately useful in the prosecution of the war. The obliteration of the governments of all loyal States might be remotely serviceable in the prosecution of hostilities, but no court would pronounce it "necessary" under the Constitution. Moreover, the Supreme Court has decided unanimously, in the Milligan case, that there are limits to constitutional necessity, by declaring that the President has no power to try men before military commissions in peaceful States, and a majority of the court, in an obiter dictum, declared that Congress did not possess this power either, while the minority claimed no such omnipotence for Congress as the Times does.

The argument of the Times, drawn from the probable consequences of the refusal of the Government to issue legal tender paper, if it proves anything, proves that in the absence of legal tender paper the war could not have been carried on without much greater popular discontent than it excited; but it does not prove or tend to prove that the war could not have been carried on at all without legal tender paper. The question was how much the people would bear. If the Government erred in thinking the people would not bear the struggle without paper money, we certainly have no right to find fault with it, because our wisdom comes after the event. But even if it was right on grounds of naked expediency in doing what it did at that time, it does not follow that we are right now in still adhering to its policy. It would be easy to produce several good reasons for believing that, had the Government issued its notes without making them legal tenders, their purchasing power would, on the average, have been as great as that of the greenbacks. We are not, let us repeat, blaming the Government for what it did. In judging it, we must not look at the problem it had to solve from the stand-point of September, 1868, but from that of September, 1861. We simply say that the constitutional "necessity" of the Legal Tender Act is not provable.

The main question in this controversy is, however, after all, Has not the Constitution prohibited the issue of paper money as legal tender? On this point, the argument of Judge Denio, in the New York Court of Appeals (1863), is to our mind unanswerable, and has not been answered. The gist of it is, that the control of private contracts is by the Constitution reserved to the States, and that they being prohibited from issuing paper money as a legal tender in payment of debts, there exists no power anywhere to do so. It is quite certain that the framers of the Constitution believed they had put a veto on paper legal tenders; and it is hardly likely they were mistaken. We do not know to what passage of Bowen's "Political Economy" it is that the Times refers when it says that he "declares that paper is the currency of all severe wars." But we must remind the Times that all he can correctly say on the subject is that paper has been the currency of some severe wars. If he has anywhere said more than this, he has fallen into a grievous error. Many very severe wars have been carried on with little currency of any kind, and that little metallic. Moreover, he knows of no case in which paper money was issued in a severe war by a government fighting under a written constitution, or existing in virtue of it. The kind of currency with which a war is carried on depends on the strength of the government, on its credit, its unscrupulousness, or the amount of popular confidence in it.

Political "necessity" means, of course, the highest public interest; and if this was a valid reason in 1861, in the eyes of a lawyer, for the issue of legal tender paper, it is now an equally valid reason for declaring paper to be no longer a legal tender. No matter on what plea you issue legal tender paper, the nature of the operation remains the same. It is essentially both a forced loan and an interference with contracts between individuals. The forced loan has been submitted to and its consequences are no longer perceptible. But the interference of Government with the obligation of contracts, and with the value of private property, continues as long as paper continues a legal tender. The value of every man's property, and the amount of his debts, may at present, as one of the effects of the Legal Tender Act, be altered arbitrarily and suddenly from day to day, every time a Cobb or a Butler can get forty or fifty demagogues to join him in an assault on the public credit, or every time a Banks or a Chandler chooses to meet the world in arms. If necessity, therefore, is now a valid consideration for either judge or statesman in regulating the currency, the greatest necessity of the day is that this thing should cease.

It is now more than three years since the war ended. We have been reducing our debt, buying territory, building railroads, sending holiday fleets to Europe, and living in luxury, but all attempts to get rid of the incubus of this inconvertible currency have failed. Nothing —absolutely nothing—has been done to remove this great national curse. Nay, to cap the climax, we are now, in the fourth year of peace, called on to discuss propositions to issue an unlimited quantity of it, and we find that it has exercised so injurious an influence on the popular imagination that there has been no difficulty in inducing a vast body of persons to approve of an attempt to use it in the perpetration of a gigantic swindle. When things have reached this pass, we may fairly say that necessity calls for a sharp and decisive remedy. We ourselves are, we confess, losing patience; we are ready to have any knife, be it that of Congress or of the courts, thrust into the tumor. It will certainly be a very painful operation, and will cause much suffering, but we shall enjoy good health afterwards. But we would not be misunderstood. We are not opposed to paper money, and especially not to Government paper money, but we want a paper money whose volume shall depend on the wants of the business community, and not on the votes of politicians.

GENERAL BUTLER.

GENERAL BUTLER is just now a candidate for re-election to Congress from a Massachusetts district. There is a good deal of opposition to his nomination amongst very good Republicans on various grounds, some personal and some political, and it has accordingly been felt necessary by several papers to undertake a more outspoken vindication of him than they have hitherto ventured upon or have felt to be necessary, and there are indications that he himself feels at present somewhat more strongly than usual the desirableness of standing well with the conscientious and scrupulous portion of the community. The mere fact that he is trying to get a Republican nomination in a State like Massachusetts is and ought to be considered an appeal to the moral and religious public to stamp his career with approval; and this being the case, his career becomes at once a legitimate subject for criticism. We propose to state, as fairly as we can—nothing extenuating, and setting down naught in malice—what, in our opinion, are the points which, in offering himself for re-election to Congress, he presents for the public judgment; and we consider the task all the more necessary, because every defence of him which has appeared studiously avoids meeting the real difficulties of his case, and treats the outcry against him as if it came from Secessionists and Democrats only, and were excited simply by his vigorous and peremptory, but otherwise legitimate and proper discharge of political duties. But this theory of the cause of his unpopularity will not hold water. The odium which surrounds his name, whether deserved or undeserved, is not confined to Secessionists or Democrats, or to any section of the United States, or to any particular party or class. We have seen many defences of him, both in the press and on the stump, but we have not yet met with a single Republican who spoke well of him privately, and we have tried the experiment in cases which close political sympathy, and even co-operation with him, made almost crucial. Moreover, although he has been harsh to the South, he has not been half as harsh as many other generals, whose names, whether at the South or North, are rarely mentioned by calm and intelligent men without praise. He inflicted no defeats on it, as Grant did; ravaged none of it, as Sheridan and Sherman did; and though he hanged a Southern blackguard, he did, in this, no more than nor as much as General Dix.

Nor will it do to ascribe his unpopularity to the severity of his administration at New Orleans. We have met, we might almost say, hundreds of good and wise men who admired and approved of that who neither admire nor approve of him. There is not the shadow of a doubt that any French, English, or Prussian general would, in Butler's place, not only have hanged Mumford, but half a dozen Mumfords. It was a righteous deed well done. Moreover, the order about the women was an ingenious, a merciful, and perfectly proper way of dealing with a disgusting nuisance. It was a device on which any foreign general would have been glad to hit; compared to the flogging of Madame de Maderspach, for instance, which did not exclude Haynau from the best circles in Europe, it was humane and civilized. And it justified itself, because it produced the desired effect without injury to anybody in mind, body, or reputation, and this is the best possible test of the value of penal legislation. The outcry raised against it at the time by the English and a portion of the Northern press was simply the product of the frenzy in which all things Northern were at the time judged. We hold, too, and we feel sure the enlightened public of every country holds that, in the main features of his rule at New Orleans, General Butler rendered a great service to civilization, because he afforded the world the now rare but always strengthening and edifying spectacle of force successfully employed in the diffusion of law, order, and health amongst a community demoralized and well-nigh ruined by its own vices. There could not have been a better place selected than New Orleans to show the ruffians of the continent that society was still too much for them, even in a trial of brute strength, and if General Butler was not the best man to select for the conduct of the experiment, it must be admitted that nobody could have performed it better.

Having said this, however, we have said all that an honest man can say in praise of his administration. The praise bestowed on him by the Tribune, of having paid all the expenses of the occupation of the city out of the pockets of the rebels, is not praise which the public of a Christian country can bestow till it knows how he levied the money. A Roman proconsul might have put this forward as a title to the applause of the senate or forum; but this government is not founded and administered on the same principles or with the same object as the Roman government. Therefore, when a general comes before us and says, "Your armies under my command have cost you nothing; they have lived on the enemy; I have a handsome balance still left to your credit," we have still to enquire whether, supposing the levying of the contribution to have been just under the laws of war, it was collected by clean hands and on equitable principles—whether, in the levying of it, pains were taken to avoid the gratification of personal greed, malignity, and cruelty. On this point no clear and satisfactory evidence has ever been offered to the public by General Butler or any of his friends. We put Mr. Parton's "Life" of him aside, inasmuch as the circumstances under which it was written, the tone of it, and Mr. Parton's apparent want of familiarity with the nature and force of proof, give it no claim to consideration as anything better than a eulogy. An official report on General Butler's administration was made to the Government by competent lawyers, but it never saw the light. He himself ought to have clamored for its publication. He has never done so, in spite of the incessant and shocking charges made against him.

The present writer has had occasion to make enquiries on several occasions as to the truth of some of these charges, and he made these enquiries of persons whose official relations with General Butler were such as to give them ample opportunities of detecting anything like peculation or pecuniary malfeasance on his part. We are bound to say that we never lighted on the slightest trace of proof against him personally and directly. We believe, therefore, the charges of "theft" so freely made against him to be unfounded. We do not believe, either, that they have made any impression on the mind of any candid man. But, on the other hand, numerous competent witnesses testify that his brother was in New Orleans during the greater part of his administration; that this brother was a man whose antecedents and character were bad; and that he did use, night and day, the facilities which his relationship and constant intercourse with the commanding general gave him to perpetrate various frauds and jobs and violations of regulations for his own private benefit; and that in the doing of these things he accumulated a large fortune, which, at his death, he bequeathed to the general. What the public refuses to believe about this is, that so shrewd an observer as the general did not know what the brother was about; and what disgusts it is, that he should not have sent him out of the department, at least when his performances began to create scandal. A man of the nicest sense of honor would, of course, not have waited for the scandal.

What aggravates the unfavorable impression left by the New Orleans episode in General Butler's career is his reputation at the bar before the war broke out. Whether justly or unjustly acquired, it was that of an unscrupulous practitioner. His professional brethren and the public of his own State certainly had no reason to doubt his ability. They say they had every reason to doubt the delicacy of his moral fibre. His military career did nothing, unfortunately, to upset the unfavorable presumption thus created. The qualities he displayed from the day he began to raise troops till the day he left the service were those which everybody knew he possessed—quickness, vigor, determination, courage of a certain sort, acuteness, and readiness; but he did nothing to prove that people had been mistaken about his moral constitution. His most famous stroke, the application of the term "contraband" to runaway slaves, was, curiously enough, simply a cunning device for getting rid of the real difficulty by the dexterous perversion of a legal term. He had hardly arrived at Fortress Monroe, too, when he began to disorganize the medical service of the hospitals by his favoritism, until the Sanitary Commission had to apply to the President to put a stop to it.

Moreover, he has, during his two years' service in Congress, done nothing to rehabilitate himself. He became the leading champion of impeachment, which was a perfectly legitimate vocation; but he brought arts and manners to the conduct of the process which had disgusted the refined and intelligent and conscientious portion of the community with it before it was half over. The investigation, too, into the alleged corruption of the senators with which he charged himself, was really an exhibition of great contempt, not only for juridical principles, but for common decency. We know some newspapers pretend not to believe this, but no intelligent man denies it in a private room. Curiously enough, too, as every observer of Congressional proceedings will have noticed, whenever he has taken an active part in the work of legislation, it has never been for the furtherance or support of any great reform, but invariably for the execution of some sharp scheme of doubtful morality, for somebody's detriment or annoyance.

In the meantime, the charges of personal dishonesty against him grow louder; the number of persons who are convinced of his want of principle grows larger; his evil fame has overspread the civilized world—the burden of the odium which rests on him increasing as it is diffused. Any other man, we suppose we might say, would long ago have been killed by it. He ought to have been killed by it, or have met the charges against him and refuted them. He has no right to say that he does not care for them. There are only two cases in which a man has a right to show indifference to his personal reputation in the community in which he lives. One is, when his standard of morality differs from that of the community, as in the case of a civilized man living amongst barbarians; the other is when, although innocent, he is deprived by circumstances of the means of proving his innocence. In the first of these cases, even a good man need not care; in the second, he may be careless if he can. But as long as the world believes a man infamous, and he has the means of showing that he is not, he owes it not only to his Creator, but to the highest interests of the society in which he lives, to give himself no rest till he has vindicated himself. The man who, with the means of vindication within his reach, refuses to use them, and not only sits down in hardened indifference to the opinion of his fellows, but asks them to clothe him with official rank, is a moral monster.

General Butler ought never to have sought office or any position of prominence, after leaving the army, without bringing his accusers either before a court of enquiry or a court of law. He has steadily refused or neglected to do so, and is now trying to make slipshod paragraphs in party newspapers do the work of the solemn judgment of a properly constituted tribunal. But this will not or ought not to succeed. The countenance which his indifference to his reputation receives from many good men is a startling proof of the relaxed state of public opinion in some quarters; his re-election by a Massachusetts district, of all places in the world, would be a real public calamity.

A WORD WITH PROSPECTIVE AMBASSADORS.

WHILE the whole subject of the Civil Service is now attracting public attention, if the Diplomatic Service has attracted less than other branches it is not because it is less important, but because it is more out of sight. But though not much talked of at this moment, it is in reality the subject of serious consideration to a very large body of gentlemen who are taking part in the canvass either on the stump or in the newspapers, and who expect to be rewarded with "missions" or consulships. For their benefit we make the following observations, which are the results of some knowledge of our legations abroad, of much conversation upon the subject with intelligent Americans who have travelled extensively in Europe, and of a comparison between our diplomatic service and that of other nations. We need hardly say that they touch the system and its organization, and not upon the gentlemen now employed in it, who, it is generally admitted, are above the average of the quarter of a century preceding the advent of Mr. Lincoln's administration. Indeed, the words system and organization are misnomers when applied to a service conducted as ours is, and it is wonderful—perhaps the only thing to be said in its favor—that its results have not compelled a reformation of it long since.

To begin with the appointments. There is no branch of the American civil service to which the American system of appointments is less adapted or to which it is more injurious. In this case the degrading and demoralizing doctrine, "To the victors belong the spoils," is not really so bad as the attendant and inveterate practice of distributing the spoils for supposed partisan services, and according to supposed "claims" of persons and localities, with little or no regard to qualifications. Other governments make diplomacy a profession, a career—with good behavior, a life office—just as we do of the regular navy, the regular army, and the judiciary.

In this practice other governments have been sustained by experience; and it is curious and instructive that the idea of making diplomacy a permanent career originated about the same time that the idea was abandoned that the biggest knave and the shrewdest liar was the best diplomat; and it becomes firmer established the more diplomacy ceases to be a mere trick and becomes a veritable business. And when we consider the vast and varied acquirements needed to make a man a really good diplomat—law, languages, history, especially of negotiations and treaties, the interrelations of the modern family of states; and those smaller, but very useful, qualities and accomplishments that give a man personal influence in society (personal influence being a tremendous diplomatic as well as political power)—we shall perceive the reasons why other nations require a man to have certain qualifications to begin the career in its lowest grades, as attaché or unpaid secretary; and why, having found a man fit for it, they keep him in it, instead of turning him out about the time he has learned his business to put in another new man, destined to go through the same process of learning and being turned out.

Appointments should be much more carefully made. No man should be appointed merely because he is "strongly recommended," as those who recommend often do not know, and seldom take the trouble to enquire, what qualities are needed in the positions for which they recommend those who have been zealous, perhaps useful, in local politics. If the applicant has seen diplomatic service, so much the better; if not, he should know the world and society as well as he conveniently may without foreign travel. The more foreign languages he knows, the better for him and his government, but he should be required to know French. We would not require that he should speak it in Parisian style, but that he should be able to express himself intelligibly in conversation; would not require that he should write it with critical accuracy, but that he should read it with ease to himself and translate it with promptness and accuracy for his government. Then when he receives an official communication in that language from the government to which he stands accredited, he will not have to take some unknown foreigner into his confidence and service to translate for him. Once let it be known that a man has to do this, and his correspondence is at the command of any government which deems it worth paying for. It is believed that ours is the only diplomatic service in which this has ever happened; and it has happened, in times past, oftener than would bear telling.

He should be a good lawyer; especially should he know international law, maritime law, the rights of legations, the laws of war, the whole system of sea law, embracing blockade and prize law, and should show a reasonable acquaintance with the great negotiations, congresses, and treaties from Westphalia down. Much of the learning on these subjects cannot be found, so far as the writer knows, in the English language.

Being in office, his course in politics ought to be conformed in some degree to a correct standard of judicial-political propriety, not modelled or measured after the Chase pattern. He should neither be required to renounce the interest or the freedom of a free citizen of a free republic, nor encouraged to be constantly fidgetting his political "views" and his "position" before the public. He should be encouraged to hope for permanence in office, and for promotion in the service, just in proportion as his own discharge of duty is able, skilful, and faithful, considered in connection with his present grade and the length of past service. He should have removed from his contemplation the degrading spectacle of a basketful of bloody heads rushing at him for his own at every turn and whiff of the political breeze. It either makes him a coward and a time-server or renders him stolidly indifferent to the discharge of duty. What incitement has a man so situated to the close study of the politics, the manners, the commercial interests, the political growths, the alliances, and the national animosities of the people among whom he lives, and for making clear and compact statements of these in his despatches to his own Government?

He ought either to have a larger annual salary or to have both an outfit and an infit. It may be stated, as a general rule, that American diplomats either do not live and move and socially reciprocate as would be advantageous to their Government, or, if they do, they lose money at it. The British diplomat has an outfit to begin with, which the American has not; he has an outfit every time he is changed to another post, which the American has not—indeed, the latter is seldom changed except when unceremoniously jerked home; he has an infit when he retires, which the American has not; after a certain length of service and permanent retirement he has a pension, which the American does not ask for; while in office he has from two to four times the help to do the work of the legation, and he has the reward of promotion constantly held up to him, which the American has not. These are very great advantages. When to these we add that while in office his annual pay is about three times as large as that of his American colleague, and his grade of office always higher, we can estimate the pecuniary difference between the two positions

The French and Russians are but little behind the English, while the Prussians, Austrians, and much smaller powers are far in advance of the Americans. There is no question of pride in the case, and the question of justice to our diplomats is a minor consideration. The question is, Which system will command the best services, and give us the greatest influence in those quarters where we often sadly need it?

An American diplomat is under the necessity either of staying out of society, which would injure both himself and his Government, or of constantly accepting hospitalities with no power to reciprocate them. So far from the present scale of pay being in harmony with our institutions, it is directly the contrary, because it either weakens that branch of the public service, while the natural and healthful tendency of democracy is to invigorate the whole public administration, or it practically attaches a property qualification to the office by driving competent poor men out of it. The notion that living is much cheaper in Europe than in the United States is either an exploded error or—what is more probable—emigration, steam, commerce, and political emancipation in Europe have brought the two continents very nearly to a level, though the tradition of the former difference survives this change. Without considering the disadvantage of breaking up a man's business at home, the cost of moving his family to Europe and getting properly established is immense. One minister, it is known to the writer, declares that he fared much better at Washington on $3,000 per year and mileage, with greenbacks at 140 to 280, than he does in diplomacy on nearly twice the amount paid, as it is, in gold. An instructive anecdote is told of another, who gets $12,000 a year, that as a senator he had been the quickest and the most determined in opposition to all motions for putting our diplomatic service on an equal footing with that of other nations, while as a minister he was the first and most earnest to complain that he could not live on his salary. This is not repeated here for any purpose of reflection or ridicule, but for exactly the opposite purpose. It is mentioned to show the justice of his present complaint, and the little care that is taken to understand the matter at Washington.

All the great powers—England, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria—understand the elements and means of diplomatic influence, and it is no disparagement of our representatives abroad to admit that they usually beat us in every court in Europe. If we beat them with the republics of this hemisphere, it is our institutions rather than the efficient organization of our diplomacy which gives us the predominance here. In Europe we not only lack the influence of our institutions, but they are in some degree a weight we have to carry. After all that is said about progress, liberalism, and the nineteenth century (to say nothing of the uniform "distinguished consideration" met with in diplomacy), the practical business truth is that there is no predisposing political love for us in the political and official atmosphere of Europe. There our diplomatic representatives are looked upon not exactly as interlopers, but as having no "carrière;" as being clever, possibly great men, but as having little or no professional standing; as being temporarily installed into the service under the execrable spoils theory, the fleeting representative of a system of politics at best not popular with those over whom we seek to have an influence. Who cares what he says, even in matters affecting the interests of his own government, whom the next elections at home, turning on questions he never discusses, and which nobody in Europe cares for or understands, may prove to have been wholly unworthy of confidence or respect—only fit to be recalled at the earliest possible moment after the outs have become the ins?

When distinguished Americans, of world-wide reputation—statesmen, military and naval officers, authors, savans—visit Europe, they would return with an increased capacity for the public service if, while abroad, they had seen something of the inner social, intellectual, political, official, literary, and scientific life of that little continent which, from the budding of the Greek mind to the landing on Plymouth Rock, was the seat of the world's brains. Murray's and Harper's guide-books (very good in their place) do not introduce Americans or show them the road to this great study. Fussy, chattering guides, couriers, and hotel commissionaires will show the finest galleries, the oldest churches, the biggest battle-grounds, the most splendid streets, etc., etc.; but they cannot show a studious American what is most valuable—they cannot show him living Europe. To nine of ten Americans the legation is the only access. But they find their minister unable—pecuniarily unable—to bring them in contact with foreigners of their own calibre and standing in the usual and useful way of doing such things; and they even find him a little sensitive about presenting them to such, because he cannot possibly reciprocate the attention that would be certain to be shown them. The ready answer to all this is, that it is not democratic—it is not plain republicanism. We have our institutions and our ideas, and our manners and our official salaries must conform themselves to these. Certainly, if we can only agree about it. Democracy needs to be intelligent to be successful. Once successful, it makes more powerful men and more powerful nations than any other system. Democracy elevates the masses, and those masses should demand that, while they are so far in advance of the masses of other nations, their chosen servants and representatives should be placed on a par with those of other systems. This is the social-political view of the matter. The business-political view is that diplomacy—the whole theory of diplomatic representation—is receiving the impress of the age, is being reduced very much to a business affair. Then, to pay, it must succeed. But our republican ideas are not the ideas of all the world yet; we do not advance them by officially and officiously parading them; and it is a mistake to suppose that a meanly-kept legation is the way to convert the world.

The material truth here is, that under all political forms "human nature is the same;" and David Crockett, a prince of a fellow in his way, once said that there was a good deal of human nature in man. Then the true idea at the bottom of the whole matter is neither royalty, nor aristocracy, nor republican plainness. It is human nature the world over to have respect for and to be influenced by good manners, cultivation, social parts, and a gentlemanly dispensation of an intellectual hospitality. There is no country in the world where this is better understood or more practised than in the United States. And yet a people which understands life and human nature quite as well as any other, and at home bestows its hospitality more lavishly than any other, and with all this believes in its democracy and is justly proud of its democracy, will send ministers resident to courts where third and fourth-rate monarchies send their envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary—is content that its diplomats shall live on mean streets and in third-rate houses, keeps them on a scale of pay that was fixed when living in Europe cost about one-half what it does now, and will have them walk when others ride, or ride in greasy street-cabs when others ride in their own carriages. The Government, properly enough, if it would only be consistent, enjoins upon them the duty and advantage of being on good social relations with their colleagues of the diplomatic corps, and with the chief persons and officials of the government to which they stand accredited (which, in plain English, means to eat their salt and drink their wine), and yet does not enable them ever to employ, from our own side, such undoubted means of influence and information without stopping to count how big a hole each dinner will knock out of their private estates. All this is done in the name of republicanism, democracy, and economy. It is a reproach and an injury to all three.

"Oh, yes! I see. U. S. legations are to be made U. S. hotels, where insolent European aristocrats and rich American flunkeys and snobs travelling abroad are to meet and drink champagne and eat venison at the expense of the U. S. Government. That's it. I see. Certainly very nice—for some people."

Perhaps you do see it. But we think you do not. On the contrary, we think the remark, besides showing your vulgarity and ill-nature, shows that you don't understand the subject, and that no argument would do you any good. This is, perhaps, a little blunt; but then—it was intended to be so. If there are candid, well-informed people who doubt the policy here advocated, let Congress or the Department of State prepare a suitable schedule of questions about the American diplomatic service to be submitted for answers by an officer of the New York Custom House to the numerous Americans returning from a tour through Europe during the months of autumn—at least to all who know the difference between a minister and a guide; all who, abroad, know the difference between hurried, eye-strained sight-seeing and intelligent travelling; to all who, at home, know the difference between coarse epithets and enlightened democracy—and the answers will surely result in a thorough reform of our diplomatic system. But such a commission must not be expected to convince "war-horse" politicians, or those newspapers whose daily employment is to illustrate what Bentham once called "bawling on paper."

Correspondence.

THE BALLOT AS A PANACEA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

With your permission, I desire to take serious exception to the second editorial article in your impression of the 27th inst. You approve of the action of the Alabama Legislature, because you think there are good grounds to fear that any popular election in that State next fall will be a farce, and that voters of the majority, being in fear of their lives, will submit to a minority threatening violence. Now, it strikes me that if this is true, it is a good reason for abolishing the Republican party. When that party first proposed to confer the suffrage on the freedmen, the grave objections which could with justice be urged against so sweeping a project admitted of but one sufficient answer—the answer which embodies the creed of the English and I hope, of the American Liberals. The burden of our side of the argument has been, that if you give a man the right to elect his rulers, you give him all the protection which he can demand from the state, and that everything else is in his own hands. We have maintained over and over again, and no one has done so more frequently or more clearly than Mr. Wendell Phillips, that there was no necessity for educating the colored man before transforming him into a voter, because when a man is once a voter it is the interest of the whole community to give him an education and every other advantage which he can desire, and because rival parties would outbid each other in the inducements which they would offer to the newly enfranchised. And although men of intelligence and moderation never pretended to suppose that the suffrage in itself was a panacea for all political and social ills, they did suppose that it was a sufficient bulwark against the aggressions of the late Southern oligarchies, more especially in those States in which the colored voters largely preponderate. But now comes the most conscientious and candid Republican journal and complains that these new voters, who are in the proportion of at least two to one, are afraid to vote; are afraid to go to the polls; and, what is most extraordinary, that the disfranchised citizens are going to decide the elections. It would appear, then, that it is not enough to give the negro the ballot; after giving him that you must give him also a U. S. marine, or perhaps a corporal's guard, to go with him to the polls. If that is so, Mr. Editor, if the majority is afraid of the minority, why should not the minority rule? The great problem which has engrossed all writers on popular governments has been how to protect the minority against encroachments on its rights by the majority. To this end are framed the rules of parliamentary debate, to this end Mr. Hare wrote a thick book, and Mr. Dudley Field petitioned the late Constitutional Convention; but it seems that in the Southern States the conditions of the problem are reversed, and it is the majority that requires to be protected against the minority.

My second objection is that you defend a questionable measure because good consequences are likely to flow from it. A legislature confers powers on itself which it did not possess when it was elected. Can any measure be more subversive? Can any precedent be more dangerous? Can any consideration justify such a reckless proceeding? The leaders of the Republican party seem to forget that the time may come when that party may be under a cloud, as it has been, and when the tactics which it has invented and sanctioned may be turned against itself. They seem to have no faith in their own doctrines, for as soon as they meet with an obstacle, they turn back and look for some new road to victory, instead of fighting it out on that line. Hence all their temporary expedients, which partially drive away one scarecrow, and at the same time conjure up a half-dozen new ones.

In my humble opinion, Governor Smith has shown himself the superior of this class of politicians, and has given evidence that he possesses foresight, judgment, and principle. Yours respectfully,

A. T.

New York, Aug. 30, 1868.

[We have never believed or argued that the ballot would at once furnish the negro all the protection he needs. On the contrary, we have filled pages with attempts to show that it would not do so, and that the first requisite of Southern society was the maintenance of order until the dominant race had acquired the habit of submission to the law. The ballot does not immediately make a man either learned, virtuous, or bullet-proof; but neither does education. It would be just as sensible, however, to withhold it for this reason from the weak, as to close the school-houses against the ignorant. Moreover, the coming election will take place under peculiar circumstances, and therefore may need peculiar safeguards, because the Southern whites intend to decide by it, if possible, that negroes shall not have the ballot at all. If it goes against these whites, we believe they will submit, and that at the next election they will be peaceable enough. The fact that "the majority is afraid of the minority," we do not consider a sufficient reason for the minority ruling—naked fear not being a legitimate basis of authority, though influence and respect, combined with fear, may be; and the history of political progress is simply the history of attempts on the part of the majority to get rid of the rule of minorities, who had lost all claim to authority except the capacity of inspiring terror. Southern Legislatures which elect Presidential electors will not usurp any power. They have the power under the United States Constitution; and if they use it we hope it will be with the view of securing thereby a real expression of the will of the legal voters.—Ed. Nation.]

THE NEW SCHOOL-BILL IN LOUISIANA.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Your issue for August 20 contains strictures upon a proposed law relating to education in the State of Louisiana, drafted by Mr. T. W. Conway, the present superintendent. Your objections are to the "extraordinary powers" which it is proposed to grant to the State Superintendent in the matter of appointing deputies, and deciding, without appeal, all controversies or disputes arising under the law; and to the provision "making the association of black and white children a necessary prerequisite to any child's getting an education of any sort."

The general school law of the State of New York provides (secs. 2 and 5, title 1) that the State Superintendent of Public Instruction "shall appoint a deputy," . . . "and so many clerks as he may deem necessary." . . . Title 12 of the same act gives him, specifically, jurisdiction to hear and decide appeals from the decision of local school officers and school meetings, and in general terms gives him jurisdiction of all cases which may possibly arise under the general act, "or any other act relating to public instruction." The same title further declares that the decision of the superintendent "shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to question or review in any place or court whatever."

This has been the law of our State since 1830 (see chap. 320, Session Laws of that year), and under it hundreds of cases are annually disposed of in a summary manner, which otherwise might be dragging out lengthy and expensive lives in the courts of law.

Similar provisions of law are in force in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, Iowa, and doubtless in other Northern States, so that that provision in the proposed act for Louisiana would seem to be neither new nor extraordinary.

I have not seen the draft of the act which you criticise, and so am incapacitated from judging of the merits of the second section to which you refer—that relating to the association of black and white children in the school room. That section may have been drawn in such a manner as to render it peculiarly offensive, though I think it more probable that the offence consists in what it is proposed to accomplish. I desire, however, to call your attention to our own School Act (section 39, title 7), which provides that "common schools in the several districts of this State shall be free to all persons over five and under twenty-one years of age residing in the district." . . . The condition of things in Louisiana is not, of course, precisely that of things in New York, and it does not follow that it would be wise to abolish all social distinctions in the schools of the former State, because such a course has been pursued in the latter. Yet the prejudices of race are not weak in New York.

In Louisiana the negroes represent political power. Certain persons of their race are members of the Legislature; a majority of the members of that body owe their election to negro votes. Under such circumstances, would it be reasonable to suppose that the Legislature would look with favor upon an act relating to public education which should continue to regard white children as a class entitled to special privileges in the common schools? A. A. Keyes.

Dept. of Public Instruction, Albany, August 22, 1868.

[When commenting on Mr. Conway's bill we had before us a brief digest of it which was copied, if we remember right, from some New Orleans paper into one of our Northern papers. After stating that the Louisiana superintendent was to be clothed with all the powers with which, as our correspondent says, most State superintendents in the North are invested, the digest went on to say—and we quoted its own language—that in the case of the Louisiana superintendent the proposed law "also invests him with other extraordinary powers." But our chief objection was made against that section of the bill which, if we are not misinformed, compels all children in the State to attend the public schools, which are, of course, thrown open equally to whites and blacks. Here in New York we throw the schools open to all, but after they are thrown open we do not force Mr. Keyes's children, for instance, into them, and thus into companionship with scholars for whom Mr. Keyes—unreasonably it may be, or it may be very reasonably—has so strong a dislike that he would rather see his boys half-educated or not educated at all than see them attend the school where the objects of his aversion are to be found.

It may be natural that the colored people of Louisiana, having political power in their hands, should seek to use it for the purpose of bringing about a state of complete equality in social matters. Natural or not, it is not the less mistaken; and neither Mr. Conway nor anybody else is to be commended for encouraging such a course of action. The matter is a practical one; abstract politics have nothing to do with it; the thing that ought to be aimed at by every friend of freedom and of the elevation of the colored race in Louisiana is the education and enlightenment of all her young people—white and black. Give the two races separate schools, or give them leave to attend separate schools even although you make—as you may and should—the State schools perfectly free, no more the property of the one race than of the other, and you take, as it seems to us, effectual measures to bring about the condition we all desire. To take any other course is, as we believe we have said before and as any one can see, to intensify class differences, to endanger the security of the political foundations of the new State, and to postpone the day when all Louisianians alike shall be as well educated as a republican citizen ought to be. We should like to believe Mr. Conway a valuable worker in this cause.—Ed. Nation.]

Notes.

LITERARY.

"Smoked Glass" is the title given to his new book by Mr. R. H. Newell ("Orpheus C. Kerr"), whose publishers are Messrs. G. W. Carleton & Co. The same house will issue a work by H. R. Helper, who, undeterred by the fate of "Nojoque," has written "The Negroes in Negroland, the Negroes in America, and Negroes Generally." "Salad for the Solitary" will be remembered by its title, though its contents were not recollectable. The author of that book, Mr. Frederick Saunders, announces as in Messrs. Carleton & Co.'s press a new book, "Woman, Love, and Marriage;" and some anonymous author will publish "The Philosopher of Foufouville, a rich satirical burlesque," Mr. Carleton says, "upon Fourierism, Socialism, and other popular isms of the day."——Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode announce that they have made Messrs. Pott & Amery their exclusive agents in this country for the sale of Bibles and Prayer-books. Debts due to Eyre & Spottiswoode may be paid in at the new agency.

—We have received the first number of a magazine which is not without a good deal of interest of a painful sort, and which bids fair to be of very considerable value to the officers of the law. It is called the Detective's Manual and Officer's Guide, and is edited by detective officers. The number before us begins with a photographed "Rogues' Gallery" containing sixteen pictures, which look as if they might be very good ones, of persons "wanted" for various offences. There are likenesses of two murderers, of two "cracksmen," of one incendiary, one defaulter, one forger, one shoplifter, several "confidence men," one "confidence woman," and some other criminals. Weakness is the prevailing trait—if that can be called a trait—of character shown in the portraits; all these persons, except the burglars, appear to be men and women of natural parts inferior to those of the average decent member of society. Next after the "Rogues' Gallery" comes an abstract of legal decisions and opinions as to arrest—as to what constitutes an arrest, who are exempt from it, when it may be made without a warrant, and so forth. "Terms Used by Rogues" is the beginning of a vocabulary of thieves' slang, which is so prepared as to lead one to suppose that the guardians of the public peace are not very eager for etymological knowledge, but rather are solicitous merely of a conversational acquaintance with the only live Latin of our day. "To Abraham" a fellow-creature is, we learn, to deceive him; an "Adam" or an "Albert" is a chum or accomplice; "an active citizen" is the cant name for a certain parasitic insect; "air and exercise" is working at Sing Sing or at Blackwell's Island, in the quarry; "apples and pears" are stairs; to be "autumed" is to be married, the male and female parties to the contract being respectively an "autum cove" and an "autum cackler"; the "autum cackler," being bereaved of her husband, becomes "an ace of spades"—that being what a widow is styled in the slang dictionary; "an autum bawler" is the best name that is given to a clergyman. "Men Wanted—Property Stolen" is the heading of the next article. A specimen of its contents—a specimen of more than common readability—is the following description of a man for whose arrest the chief of the Western State Detective Police offers $250 reward:

"A man by the name of J. W. Youmans, a physician, is travelling from place to place and practising medicine. He is guilty of murder. He is about fifty-five or sixty years of age; is about 5 feet 11 inches high; full features; square, broad shoulders; dark auburn hair, inclined to curl, and is slightly grey. There may be one or two moles on his face, and also some blotches or dimples, making the face look rough. Has a deep-set grey eye; has a dent or dimple on the chin; is somewhat stoop-shouldered; has good front teeth; legs rather short; will weigh from 165 to 175 pounds; goes considerably with his hands in pockets; his hair is very thin on the temples and scalp; has a habit of clearing up, or coughing to clear his throat; looks like a strong man; has a habit of putting his thumbs in his vest and swelling himself out, and throwing himself back in a very pompous manner; sometimes goes with his head down, but when in good humor will throw his hat back in a very peculiar manner; chews plug tobacco, and after taking a chew will keep spitting for a short time; takes large chews, and is very dirty about his mouth; drinks whiskey and talks very loud; is a great story-teller, and is vulgar in language; likes women's company; sometimes wears a ring on one small finger. Has lived in McLean, Logan, and Livingston Counties, Illinois, and also in Missouri. Was born in Bourbon County, Kentucky. He is now travelling under disguise, and has sometimes his hair colored, and pretends to be lame, and will walk in a stooping manner. He will try to bluff any officer who may arrest him, and will deny having ever been in this State."

The rest of the magazine is filled up with some remarks about counterfeiting, and how to discover the ungenuineness of certain specified and described bills and notes now in circulation; with instructions to patrolmen and detectives as to their rights and duties; with directions for restoring to consciousness persons apparently drowned or suffocated or stricken with apoplexy; with a list of all sheriffs in the Union, and other kindred matters. As we have said, the new periodical is not devoid of general interest, and it must be of value to men employed in the police service. Springfield, Massachusetts, is the place of publication.

—The Pall Mall Gazette has unearthed a poem called the "Gospel Railroad," published in the Christian Sentinel, a paper designed, as its name indicates, to be read by the soldiers in barracks. These two stanzas are a fair sample of it:

"At Sin-hate door all take a ticket
To show the porter at the wicket;
No money are they called to pay,
Since Jesus did its price defray.

"The carriage by the Saviour reared
With rushing sound is ever heard,
As swift are drawn to Zion's station
Travellers of every rank and nation."

This is nonsensical enough, to be sure, and bad in other ways, but as regards the pulling down of lofty things and the inculcation of false and degrading religious conceptions, it must yield to a little hymn which, it is a pity to say, was widely popular in this country a few years ago. It begins thus:

"I have a never-failing bank,
A more than golden store;
No earthly bank is half so rich—
Now, then, can I be poor?"

In further development of this pleasing metaphor we have verses like these:

"I know my bank will never break—
No, it can never fail;
The firm—three persons in one God,
Jehovah—Lord of all.

. . . . . .

"The leper had a little note—
Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou can;
The banker cashed this little note
And healed this sickly man.

. . . . . .

"But see the wretched, dying thief
Hang by the Banker's side;
He cried, 'Dear Lord, remember me,'
And got his cash—and died."

The work in which we find these stanzas is still in use among us, and in 1860 had reached its twenty-third thousand.

—The July number of Dr. Hammond's Quarterly Journal of Psychological Medicine is but just out, the magazine having passed into new hands since the last quarter. D. Appleton & Co. are the present publishers. The Appletons are the only great publishers who hitherto have not been owners of some sort of a periodical to be used as a vehicle for the owner's advertisements. Their Railway Guide might very well have been so used, but, if we remember right, it has not been so used to any great extent. The Quarterly Journal will partly or wholly perform this office for its new owners, and it is likely that we may hear no more of the rumor that Messrs. Appleton are about to put a new monthly magazine on our already overburdened market. It would, however, be matter of rejoicing if they, with their facilities for the widest advertising and their pecuniary resources, would enter the field of periodical literature with a good magazine, and kill two or three of the things which are now educating people into inanity. The Quar- terly Journal of Psychological Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence—we wish its new owners had made a new name for it—we always read with a good deal of pleasure. We suppose there are not in the whole range of science any subjects so interesting to the tolerably thoughtful general reader as those offered to his contemplation by medical science. Let alone the interest that he naturally takes in studies whose object it is to abolish or diminish pain and to lengthen human life; let alone his natural curiosity as regards his own bodily composition, and the dangers to which as a being of flesh and blood he is always exposed; leave unconsidered the pleasure he must get from seeing plainly, as the observer of medical science does see, that gradually man is to put under his feet the evils that beset his body; leave unconsidered, too, the gratification got from shrewd argumentation upon ingenious theories and facts closely observed and accurately weighed; leave aside all these elements of interest, and psychological medicine—physiological psychology—still commands the most earnest attention. Upon philosophy and religion it exerts a great and a constantly increasing influence. The term physiological psychology in itself challenges attention; it is of importance for us to know how the doctors of medicine and the doctors of divinity agree, and what the dissectors of the brain have to say to the students of the mind. In this July number of the Journal these are the articles and their authors: "Chlorosis a Disease of the Nervous System," by Dr. Wm. A. Hammond; "Suicide and Insanity," by Dr. T. Edwards Clark; "The Legal Consequences of Insanity," by Dr. S. Henry Dixon; "A Case of Epilepsy Successfully Treated with Strychnia," by R. L. Parsons; "Singular Development of Language in a Child," by Dr. E. R. Hun; "Further Remarks on Organic Infantile Paralysis," by Dr. Wm. A. Hammond; "The Formation of the Mixed Human Races," by M. de Quatrefages (translated by Dr. E. S. Dunster); and some sharp but just remarks by Dr. H. R. Storer on a lawyer's criticism, made by Mr. Simon Stern, of a previous article by Dr. Storer in which fault was found with the law of rape. Perhaps it was hardly worth the Doctor's while to attack his critic; almost no one thought the criticism worth notice. After these articles there are some careful reviews of books; then comes what is called the "Chronicle," which relates to the physiology and pathology of the brain and nervous system; this is followed by a miscellaneous article—made up of home and foreign reports of cases—on medical jurisprudence, and by an article containing remarks on rare diseases, on freaks of insane persons, on noteworthy facts of science, and so on. Physicians, we imagine, do not need to be advised to take the magazine; the general reader has our advice to read it regularly.

—The singular development of language in a child which is mentioned above certainly is, so far as we know, singular in the true (or the narrow) sense of that word. A little girl, now four and a half years old, was observed to be, when two or three years old, very backward in learning to speak. She could then use only the words "papa" and "mamma," and these are the only words of common English that she now uses; she has invented a copious vocabulary of her own and taught it to her brother, who is some eighteen months younger than herself. He, however, makes use of the new language only when he talks with his sister; he finds no difficulty in using ordinary diction. The little girl says too for "all." Gaän means "God;" migno-migno means "water," "wash," "bath;" odo means "to send for," "to go out," "to take away;" feu means "fire,' "heat," "light," "cigar," "sun." On a rainy day the child has been heard to say, when looking out of the window: Gaän feu odo migno-migno, feu odo, which means, "God, take away the rain and send the sun." It is said by Dr. Hun that by odo, which she uses as a transitive verb, she means "take away" if she puts the object after the verb, and "send" if she puts the object first. Ne pa means "not;" ma means "I," "myself." These last-mentioned words—and feu for "fire" and too (tout) for "all"—would seem to prove that the child had somewhere picked up some French; but her parents say that she has had no opportunity to do so. A rigid cross-examination might throw doubt on their testimony in this particular. But it would still be somewhat hard to account for the fact that in the new language peer means "a ball," and waia-wawar "black" or "darkness" or "a negro," and gummigar "all the substantials of the table, such as bread, meat, vegetables, etc." The same word is used to designate the cook. We say it would be somewhat hard—we do not know the child and her surroundings, and consequently do not know just how hard it would be—but we think it would not be at all impossible. We should say that in all probability it can be proved that ne pa is the child's word for "not," because she has somewhere heard some French; and the same remark is, of course, to be made about too, and might be made about ma, which, however, may as well be "me" as moi; vowel sounds count for nothing in such cases. Some of the other words in this new vocabulary are obviously corruptions of ordinary English, as for instance petee-petee (pretty), "the name given by the boy to his sister;" babia (baby), the name by which the boy and girl call their younger brother; mea (miaouw), the word for "furs" and for "cat;" go-go (good), "delicacies of any kind;" and dere, which is used for "there" or "there is." Other words that are set down by Dr. Hun will not seem to persons acquainted with "baby-talk" as being at all worse corruptions of good English than are every week occurring in every nursery. Gar for "horse" is not worse than na-na, which we have for some time known as "baby-English" for "grandma," nor than other of the orthoepic distortions known by the score to every head of a family. But however the vocabulary was acquired, it is certainly remarkable that it should be exclusively employed, and employed for so long a time. The little girl uses no other words than those which may be called her own, and those she uses with great fluency. It would be well, we should say, to force her, by putting her with persons who are ignorant of her peculiar tongue, to express herself in common words. This, we suppose, would be easy; a child that feels the desire to communicate with her acquaintances so strongly as to invent a language to subserve that end would, if a little pressure were brought to bear on her, readily adopt the language of those about her.

—In addition to the new English books and announcements spoken of last week, we may speak of these others as being of interest to the reading public on this as well as on that side of the water. The Bookbuyer says that Emanuel Deutsch, whose article on the Talmud made so much noise a few months ago, is now announced as the author of a book to be called "The Talmud"—a book as to which no one seems to know just what it will be. Carlyle is said to be preparing a standard library edition of all his works. Each one of the works will—when it is at all possible—be complete in one volume, and the volumes of the set will, therefore, vary in price, but the edition is not going to be a cheap one. Mr. Dallas, the not very judicious author of "The Gay Science"—criticism, namely—is going to stand responsible for a pruned edition of "Clarissa Harlowe." Mr. Dallas's mutilation of Richardson deserves to share, and in all likelihood will share, the fate of Mr. Hain Friswell's recent abridgment of the "Arcadia." People who want any of either of these romances want all. Bohn's Lowndes's "Bibliographer's Manual" is to appear in a new edition, in six octavos. All things considered, it is perhaps our most satisfactory work of reference in English, and, satisfactory or not, is a book hardly to be dispensed with. A new edition of "Pepys' Diary" is to be issued in the course of the fall or of next spring, and it will be so different from the editions now extant that it may almost be called the first. There has been a new interpretation, Mr. Welford says, of the author's short-hand manuscripts, and it has been copied in extenso. Previous editors—who had this much excuse for their shortcomings, that the manuscript was most crabbed, and that the publication of so much fossil gossip was an experiment on the forbearance of readers,—previous editors gave, as it appears, no page exactly as it is in the original, but allowed themselves large liberty of omitting and altering. We see that Mr. Beecher's "Norwood" is out in a popular six-shilling edition. The third volume of the new series of "Wellington's Despatches" is out, and contains diplomatic papers on Russia, Turkey, and Greece, the Duke's review of Napoleon's Russian campaign, and much information on the Eastern question. Mr. Kinglake's new volumes, attacked on the score of incorrectness in statement of fact, and not so much admired for their style as were their predecessors when the style was new, are not selling so well as they might be, it is said.

—Inasmuch as the authorities at Oxford are receiving from America letters of enquiry as to the rules laid down for the government of the new class of students at that university, we are requested to state what the rules are that have been adopted. "Scholares non ascripti," or Unattached Students, are such as, without belonging to any college or hall, are members of the university, and "keep terms by residing in Oxford either with their parents or in lodgings which have been duly licensed." Persons who desire to become Unattached Students must apply to the Delegates for licensing lodging-houses, and these must be satisfied of the candidate's good character, and of their parents' willingness that they should live in lodgings. Then follows (on the 15th of October is the first one) an examination of such as present themselves for admission, who must be up in three books of Homer or one Greek Play; in three books of the "Æneid" or of Horace's "Odes;" in translating from English into Latin; in the elements of Greek and Latin Grammar; in Arithmetic, including vulgar and decimal fractions and proportion; in the first and second books of Euclid, or else in Algebra—so far as to have the first four rules, fractions, and simple equations.

The candidate, having been successful, is required to choose a tutor from a number of gentlemen whose names are put on a list approved by the Delegates, and then he is matriculated by the Vice-Chancellor. The tutors are paid in part by the University—that is to say, the pupil pays for his instruction, but the University pays the tutor for supervising the conduct of his charge, and for instructing him, if he be a member of the Church of England, in matters of faith. Five pounds paid at matriculation, and £3 10s. per annum, are the only fees and dues to be paid by the Unattached Student, and these entitle him to the advice and supervision above-mentioned and to all the University advantages which are the privilege of undergraduates. What is the cost of rooms and what the salaries paid to tutors we do not know. As in the case of students in college or hall, the Unattached Student keeps his twelve terms before proceeding to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. We have received, together with the regulations, the substance of which is above set forth, a set of lodging-house regulations of sufficient severity. For example, the lodging-house keeper forfeits his license if he breaks this rule: "In case any student lodging in my house shall pass the night out of his lodgings, I will attend in person on the following morning, and report the same to the College authorities or (in the case of Unattached Students) to the Delegates of Lodging-houses." The other regulations are equally stringent, and would seem to guarantee pretty well a sober and regular life on the part of the young men.

BALLAD BOOKS.*

THE first volume of the poems of the Percy Manuscript received a hearty greeting in the Nation. We have now the whole book, in three fine octavos of 600 pages, with a supplement, which, for sufficient reasons, is kept somewhat in the background. We have every line, word, and letter of the manuscript that remains, including all of Percy's notes and scribblings. Though the abominable carelessness of the writing might almost have excused indifference to trifles, the very tails and dots of letters have been painfully considered, and where there is only one stroke to an n or a variation in the form of c we are sure to be informed. Mr. Furnivall, who answers for the text, has been as scrupulous in executing as he was intrepid in undertaking. There are prefaces to every piece, and several articles of a more general character. These prefaces, mostly by Mr. Hales, are carefully made up and agreeably written, and on special points the best authorities in England have lent their help. The pains taken with the book is more remarkable in that the editors were obliged to do their work in a short time. If an opportunity should occur for a deliberate revision, some improvements might be made. The illustrations, whether glossarial, literary, or historical, might be better digested. But this is a slight matter. The prefaces, it may be observed, though they generally contain what is desirable in the way of solid information, are as little as possible in the conventional tone of antiquarians, and the most "advanced" and "progressive" of philanthropists might be convinced by reading two or three of them that a passion for man and a passion for manuscripts are perfectly compatible.

A full expression of the relief of mind which the publication of these poems has brought us would look to many like wasteful and ridiculous excess. Such, however, would not be the judgment of those who set a true estimation on popular poetry. It would not have been the judgment of Macaulay, for instance, who has spoken so appreciatingly of this species of literature in the remarks prefixed to his "Lays of Ancient Rome." "Eighty years ago," he says, "England possessed only one tattered copy of 'Child Waters' and 'Sir Cauline,' and Spain only one tattered copy of the noble poem of the 'Cid.' The snuff of a candle or a mischievous dog might in a moment have deprived the world for ever of any of those fine compositions." This tattered copy of "Child Waters" and of "Sir Cauline" was, of course, the copy contained in our manuscript, which manuscript, even at the epoch referred to, had suffered large losses from "being used by the maids to light the fire," and would all have gone to the dogs or to the flames had not Percy begged it of his friend Humphrey Pitt. With it would have perished, besides the pieces mentioned by Macaulay, and a hundred and fifty others not used for the "Reliques," such noble ballads as "Glasgerion," "Aldingar," "Robin of Portingale," "Child Maurice," "The Child of Ell," "The Marriage of Gawain," "The Boy and the Mantle," "Guy of Gisborn," "The Rising in the North," and "King Estmere"—most of which we possess in no other form—with excellent copies of "Sir Andrew Barton," "The Heir of Lin," "King John and the Bishop," and a good many more than we wish to write out. From the utter loss of these ballads we were saved, as Macaulay intimates, by Percy's intervention. Benedictus! But let us now see what we have gained by the intervention of Mr. Furnivall and Mr. Hales.

Percy printed less than a quarter of the articles in his manuscript. We have now all the rest, and among them not a few admirable poems. Percy did, it is true, give us the best ballads; but he gave only one, we believe, as it stands in the manuscript, and that only in an appendix—to the intent "that such austere antiquaries as complain that the ancient copies have not been always rigidly adhered to may see how unfit for publication many of the pieces would have been if all the blunders, corruptions, and nonsense of illiterate reciters and transcribers had been superstitiously retained, without some attempt to correct and amend them." Now, we admit all the blunders, corruptions, and nonsense which Percy charges on his manuscript, and trust we have as little reverence as any bishop that ever was consecrated for nonsense, corruption, and so forth. Editors are doubtless inexcusable who do not attend properly to the emendation of texts. But what was Percy's course? Let us take for an instance "Sir Cauline," one of the ballads so prized by Macaulay. Under the pretence of correcting and completing a story which was already complete, Percy has extended this ballad from 201 to 392 lines, and has perverted a good, honest tale of successful love into a sort of tragical pastoral of the most revolting sentimentality.

This is the end of the genuine "Sir Cauline":

"Then he did marry this king's daughter,
With gold and silver bright,
And fifteen sonnes this ladye beere
To Sir Cawline the Knight."

And this of the spurious:

"Then fayntinge in a deadlye swoune,
And with a deep-fette sighe,
That burst her gentle heart in twayne,
Fayre Christabelle did die."

Other ballads have fared almost as ill. A magnificent fragment, 39 lines only, of "The Child of Ell," Percy made into a mawkish story of 200—this time realizing Sir Fretful Plagiary's apprehension of the manager, "taking out some of the best things in my tragedy and putting them into his own comedy;" transforming a savage and gloomy tale of immemorial antiquity into the mildest description of eighteenth-century melodrama, in which a knight who has carried off a baron's daughter addresses the enraged father in these civil terms:

"Nowe hold thy hand, thou bold baron,
I pray thee, hold thy hand,
Nor ruthless rend two gentle hearts
Fast knit in true love's band;"

and in which we have this kind of conversion:

(ORIGINAL.)

"He leaned ore his saddle-bow
To kisse this lady good:
The teares that went them two betweene
Were blend water and blood."

(PERCY.)

"And thrice he claspde her to his breste,
And kist her tenderlie;
The teares that fell from her fair eyes
Ranne like the fountayne free."

"Which being so well apparelled in the dust and cobweb of that *un*civil age," Philip Sidney says of "Chevy Chase," "what would it work trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindar!" The marvellous effects of gorgeous eloquence can be seen in any of the ballads revised and completed by Percy to fit them for polished times. Yet Percy continually speaks of the affecting simplicity and artless beauties of the originals. The wonder is that he should not see that his imitations were in a style precisely the contrary.

"Sir Aldingar," "The Heir of Lin," "Guy of Gisborn"—what not, indeed?—have suffered more or less, and "King Estmere," that purely delightful thing, no one will ever know how much; for to save the trouble of copying for the press, Percy tore out the two leaves containing it, and they are gone for ever. So what with the ravages of the housemaids and of Percy, and some slight damages from the binder and from the atmosphere, the treasures once contained in this book are sensibly diminished, as their beauty had already been marred by the accidents of the process of transmission, and especially by the carelessness of the transcriber. One could make himself very melancholy about this matter; and being in that humor, what words could express our regret for the loss of countless other ballads, which have perished like the generations of the leaves, and largely in consequence of the introduction of the art which boasts the conservation of all arts? Since ballad times cannot return except with the return of a state of society which no rational being wishes to see repeated, all we can do is to put beyond danger

* "Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript. Ballads and Romances. Edited by John W. Hales, M.A., Fellow and Late Assistant-Tutor of Christ's College, Cambridge, and Frederick J. Furnivall, M.A., of Trinity Hall, Cambridge," etc. 3 vols. London: N. Trübner & Co. 1867-8. New York: For sale by John Wiley & Son.

"Scottish Ballads and Songs, Historical and Traditionary. Edited by James Maidment." 2 vols. Edinburgh: William Paterson. 1868.

what we happen to retain, and to seek out and save what is just ready to perish. The Percy Manuscript was the first thing to be taken in hand, and that is secure. Macaulay's dog or candle; Newton's dog and candle; Humphrey Pitt's serving-maids; the devastation of the British Museum by some Abyssinian Theodor; malice domestic, foreign levy—nothing can touch it further.

Without the Percy Manuscript no proper collection of the national ballads of England was possible, since only spurious copies of many of the finest ballads in the language were to be had. Having got it, why should not Englishmen set to work, though very late, to make a complete collection? Why should we not have an English work which should at least aspire to equal Svend Grundtvig's "Old Ballads of Denmark"? At the moment we ask the question, the gallant Furnivall, who has perfectly imbibed the spirit of the knights among whom he has lived so much, and delights above all things in arduous adventures, is establishing a Ballad Society. This society proposes to print all the known collections of English ballads, the Pepys, unless printed by Magdalene College, the Roxburghe, the Bagford, and so on; also, manuscript ballads. First, we are to have the great collections of broadsides or flying leaves, and the manuscript ballads "when Mr. Furnivall, or whoever their editor may be, has had time to collect them." Now, while we have not a word to say against the matter of this scheme, we are not favorably struck by the order of proceedings. We all know what the Roxburghe and Pepys collections are made up of. Mr. Collier has printed a volume of Roxburghe ballads, favorable specimens, there is reason to believe. We had, last year, a volume of Black Letter ballads and broadsides, which the editor declares to be the most extraordinary and valuable collection of early English ballads now known to exist, with a very few exceptions, and those familiar pieces. This most extraordinary and valuable of existing collections is about as dull and useless reading as in a considerable acquaintance with worthless literature we have ever met with. The Ballad Society, if the London Athenæum is right, expects to publish about thirty such volumes as Collier's and this last. If the project is carried out, we expect to have the fortitude to subscribe for and to examine these thirty volumes. In our quality of lover of popular literature, we could turn over a dark heap, even of these dimensions, for the hope of a jewel here and there. But why should not the Ballad Society put its best foot forward, and print the manuscript ballads first? The prestige which might be got by discovering a few fine ballads, or by publishing the genuine texts of corrupted and highly "edited" ones already known, would give the society a momentum that would carry it through a long level of broadsides. Whereas, the propelling of a sufficient number of subscribers through twenty-five or thirty volumes of the Roxburghe and Pepys quality seems to us, even with a good start, to be difficult, and, without a good start, out of the question. Give us then, first, all that is left, or all that can be found, of the genuine ballads of the people. Ransack the public libraries. Several of the best ballads we have came from the University Library at Cambridge. Hunt up private manuscripts. Where is the manuscript of Mrs. Brown of Falkland, to which Jamieson and Scott owe so much? At Aberdeen, very likely. Where is Herd's Manuscript, where the Glenriddell Manuscript, lent Scott by Mr. Jollie of Carlisle? And next, where are the Mrs. Farquhars, the Mrs. Browns, the Mrs. Arnots, the Miss Rutherfords themselves, and the nurses who taught them ballads? Small hope, we acknowledge, of finding such nurses any more, or such foster-children, and yet it cannot be that the diffusion of useful knowledge, the intrusion of railroads, and the general progress of society, have quite driven all the old songs out of country-women's heads—for it will be noted that it is mainly through women everywhere—

> "The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
> And the free maids that weave their thread with bones"— that ballads have been preserved. From these sources, public libraries, parish scrap-books, and the memory of living persons, it is probable that much might be gathered. The manuscripts we have referred to have, indeed, been used already, but their contents have undergone editorial manipulation, and although it is certain that anything handed down by oral tradition is corrupted and mutilated on the way, and that critical ingenuity has often restored a lost meaning, we insist on having the actual tradition placed before our eyes. We utterly refuse "collated" editions, made up from a variety of copies, such as we find in nearly all the ballad-books from Percy down to our day, including Walter Scott's minstrelsy. No principle less strict than that of the editors of the Percy Manuscript (saving what we think an exaggerated deference for an ignorant and slovenly writer's capital letters) is strict enough.

When the proposed society shall have printed all the ballads preserved in manuscripts or floating in the memories of the people, we shall be ready for the broadsides. These last should follow and not take precedence, not only because the other class is more in danger of destruction, but because its value is immeasurably greater.

It has not been easy for Americans to get at these volumes as they were coming out, but henceforth Messrs. Wiley will no doubt keep a full supply of copies. It should be remembered that Mr. Furnivall has had to bear the pecuniary responsibility of publication, besides doing the larger part of the literary work. A loss to him would be a shame to the public. The profits, if there should be any, will go to the Early English Text Society.

Mr. Maidment's book does not require many words. We have had from him three small parcels of popular poetry before, the oldest dating more than forty years back, and in the three there may be three or four ballad texts which appear for the first time. The present compilation has no new ballads, and no new copies derived from tradition, but the preface contains much historical and genealogical lore, some of which appears to be original. It is exasperating to see Lady Wardlaw's "Hardyknute" anywhere, and not prepossessing to find it in the forefront of "Historical and Traditionary Ballads," actually taking the pas of "Sir Patrick Spens" and "The Battle of Otterbourne." Will anybody tell us why Chatterton's more than tolerable ballad of the "Bristowe Tragedie" is never seen in historical and traditional ballads, while this brummagem "Hardyknute" confronts us at every turn? By way of testing Mr. Maidment on a point where the Scotch editors are particularly weak, we turned to the "Douglas Tragedy." He thinks it far from improbable that this story, which is the same as Percy's "Childe of Elle," may be founded on incidents in the history of the family whose name it bears—in this following Walter Scott. But he forgets for a moment the thirty or forty varieties of the story in the Scandinavian language (that he is acquainted with the Scandinavian ballads may be inferred from his asserting that "Sir Patrick Spens" far excels "the ballad poetry of this or any other country"), and does not attend to the warnings of Jamieson against trusting the circumstantial evidence of popular tales. Mr. Maidment deserves the praise of rigid honesty in dealing with his texts.

POPULARIZATION OF SCIENCE IN GERMANY.*

NOTWITHSTANDING the cheerful tale of the column in the Prussian census giving the proportion of those who can to those who cannot read, it must be admitted that the Germans are not a reading people. A traveller in the North German Bund seldom finds even a farm laborer who cannot decipher a written order, but in no country peopled by kindred race does he find such a great gulf fixed between the learned and the unlearned. Though their cousins in Britain and America have pretty much divested themselves of apathy to improvement and inclination to "let well enough alone," they seem natural to the common people of Germany, and are fostered by patrician sentiment and tradition, and favored by government. An author of the last century affirmed that "writing is virginibus nothing but a vehiculum of immorality," adding that they would employ the accomplishment only to write love-letters; even Julius Mosen declared that as a man of the people he would marry no one able to read and write. Frederic the Great was opposed to educating the peasantry, and said, writing to Zedlitz: "It is enough in the plain country that they know how to read and write a little; if they know too much they run into the cities." And within a year a Prussian superintendent of public instruction said in a teachers' convention: "It is sufficient for a common man if he is able when in barracks to write home, 'Dear Parents—I am well; please send me some money and something to eat.'" It is thus not to be wondered at that working-men's clubs, evening schools, and like advantages for the lower classes are less frequent in Germany than in England and the United States. To do something towards bringing about a different state of things, two professors, the one a celebrated physician and naturalist, the other a distinguished jurist, of the Royal University, hit upon the plan of publishing, in accessible form, the best public lectures delivered in Berlin, where Vorträge are held before societies many and on topics numberless. The scope of the collection is somewhat similar to that of the "Revue des Cours Scientifiques" and the "Revue des Cours Littéraires," but it is designed for a less cultivated circle of readers. While the names of the sponsors for these essays guarantee their excellence, the German coryphæi in various departments will be found among their authors, as a brief mention of a few of them will show.

* "Sammlung gemeinverständlicher wissenschaftlicher Vorträge, herausgegeben von Rud. Virchow und Fr. v. Holtzendorff. (A Collection of Easily Understood Instructive Lectures, Edited by Rud. Virchow and Fr. von Holtzendorff.) Series I., II., and III. Nos. 1-53.

One of the earliest of the series is contributed by Dr. Bluntschli, of Heidelberg, and treats of "The Significance and Progress of Modern International Law." It would be difficult to present, in the narrow compass of sixty-odd pages, a better view of this somewhat indefinite science, with which newspaper readers are supposed to be more or less familiar. More than half hiding his didactic intent by a happy and withal natural arrangement, the doctor first proves, in a few precursory sentences—which, if less brief, might be dignified with the name of a philosophical introduction—that there is a basis for international law. Then, having answered some objections, he shows that such a thing does exist, despite the half-truism, "Might makes right," as also the maxim, "No statute, no law." Statutes are the clearest and most effective utterance of the law; yet they are not, even to the individuals of a single nation, the only fountain of it; and so, though there is no common lawgiver for the society of states, the law which is to govern them finds expression in various ways—in treaties, in mutual declarations of states united in congress, and even in the legislation of a single state. "We have lately experienced a remarkable example of this kind, which also marks an important advance in modern international law—to wit, the 'Instruction for the Army of the United States in the Field,' which is to be regarded as the first codification of martial law in war on land" (drawn up by Dr. Lieber). . . . . "This 'Instruction' is much more extended and complete than the war regulations in use in European armies; but as it expresses throughout principles of international law of universal character, and as the manner of their expression is in accordance with that accepted as right by the humanity of our day and with the conduct of civilized war of the present time, this edict has a working sphere extending far beyond the wide borders of the United States." Almost worse than the lack of international statutes is the absence of international courts where international disputes could be settled, instead of being determined by war, which is, after all, the dernier ressort in most instances of important disagreement. Still, international law has, under all these disadvantages, made progress, from its earliest and rude beginnings among the ancients down through the ages in which Christianity has modified and influenced the actions and relations of the successors of Roman civilization and the Germans, till it has at last emancipated itself from religion, and such compacts as the Holy Alliance have become impossible, when not only the foremost disciple of the Prophet, but also the most prominent believer in the doctrines of Confucius, are reckoned as subjects of "European international law."

A notice of the measures adopted for the suppression of the slave trade, so fruitful of controversies and of compacts concerning the right of search and mixed tribunals, bridges over the return from this historical digression to the subject proper, and to a discussion of the representation of states through envoys and consuls, of the rights of foreigners, of arbitration and intervention, of the freedom of the sea, of the laws of war particularly relating to the status of enemy's property in war on land and at sea, and of the rights and duties of neutrals. As our author keeps constantly in view the progress of "modern international law," he naturally states, in conclusion, its goal—"to become the humane law of the world." By this last sentence, as also by the half assent to Dr. Lieber's proposal concerning the settlement of the "Alabama claims," implied in a variation of it, and by the expression of the possibility of the future existence of an organization which will utter the will of all nations with universally recognized authority, the reader is reminded that Dr. Bluntschli is the latest successor of the Abbé Grégoire in attempting something like a codification of international law. Dr. Woolsey defines international law to be "the aggregate of the rules which Christian states acknowledge as obligatory in their relations to each other and to each other's subjects." Dr. Bluntschli might almost be thought to have paraphrased his definition from this, for he says: "Völkerrecht heisst die als rechtlich-nothwendig anerkannte Ordnung, welche die Beziehungen der Staaten zu einander regelt." The latter is more objectionable than the former, inasmuch as it conveys an impression of greater authority in international law than really exists. He here recommits the error which runs through his book, mentioned above, of confounding what ought to be with what is, and thus affords a new illustration of the importance of good definitions, so dwelt upon by Mr. Mill; for he would have been saved from his mistake by a better definition—e.g., that given by Mr. Austin, "Positive international morality."

Such an extended résumé of one tract is perhaps in contradiction of the promised brief mention, and must be excused on the plea that no subject can be of more general interest than the rules regulating international intercourse, and from the fact that so many of Dr. Bluntschli's illustrations are drawn from United States history; the notices of the others shall at any rate be more succinct. To H. Dove—Professor Dr. Dove, Vice-Chancellor of the civil order pour le mérite, member of the Academy, and knight of many orders, would have been more after the German style—is credited "The Circulation of Water on the Surface of the Earth," an instructive lecture which, by its wealth of facts and pleasing diction, calls to mind the elder Silliman. In this is explained much of the wherefore of tides, with their ebb and flood; of salt and other mineral springs, and their temperature; of geysers, and of rain—enough, at least, to still any rising doubts of the immutability of natural laws. An evidence of more thorough early training than usually falls to the lot of our scientific men is the frequency of reference, so characteristic of German savans, to writers of classical antiquity, to Cæsar, Lucretius, Strabo, and Pliny. From the latter it would appear Struve took the hint which led to the artificial preparation of mineral water. As a physicist, Dr. Dove of course ascribes the same health-giving properties to the imitation as to the natural waters, but he is obliged to confess that all the skill of the chemist cannot supply the charms of the baths, where the invalid is no longer only a tolerated creature among hale associates, but a member of the majority, with rights and privileges as such, where ailments take such acceptable form that it is difficult to distinguish the sufferers, and the attractions are so manifold that one does not marvel at Paris marriage contracts containing as a stereotyped stipulation, "et la saison à Bade." The Prussian Astronomer-Royal writes of the "Measures of Time," giving as a preface several pages of abstract remarks, which perhaps wearied the writer, and certainly weary most of his readers, some of whom will feel like re-quoting a line cited by himself:

"Wozu die Brücke breiter als der Fluss?"

The suggestion that northern nations were compelled to invent some mechanism for marking time other than the sun-dials and water-clocks brought to such perfection in Arabia, because the absence of the sun and the prevalence of cold during great portions of the year prevented these contrivances from answering their purpose, is novel if not new.

"Social Rights and Duties" is from the pen of Schulze-Delitzsch, whose name is a household word with the laboring men throughout the "Fatherland," and who never fails to support their interests in the public press and in the many Parliaments with which King William's people are blessed. It is gratifying, though contrary to expectation, to find that Judge Schulze decides in the case of the individual vs. society, that the duties of the former are quite as marked as his rights.

"Strikes" would be rare, and the relations between employer and employed would be healthier, if the principles set forth and illustrated by Dr. Engel, Chief of the Prussian Statistical Bureau, in two lectures on the "Nature and Price of Labor," were accepted and realized. Few, if any, of the ideas presented are really new, for most of them were enunciated or suggested by Adam Smith a century ago, but they are here worked out and illustrated with a singular clearness, almost relentlessness, more usual with French than German writers. Yet the tables and computations of Herr Engel, who, mighty in figures, reckons the coefficients of the cost of labor as coolly as he would that of mule or water-power, bring us no further than the sentence in Luke which says: "The laborer is worthy of his hire."

Particularly deserving of notice, which may be said of nearly every one of the collection, are also a very readable statement of the "Dwelling-house Question," by President Lette; a report on "Orphans and the Treatment of Orphans in Berlin," by City-Judge Zelle; a capital treatise on "Bills of Exchange," by Doctor, or, according to the latest papers, Professor Kuehns; and an able pamphlet on the "City Government of London," by Professor Gneist, author of several works on "The English Constitution," "Self-Government," etc. A few biographical sketches are given. Among them is a memoir of Heinrich Zschokke (best known to many through the translations of Mr. Godwin) by Emil Zschokke; and Hermann Grimm, who has preferred to be a novelist, an essayist, and interpreter of Emerson, rather than adopt the severer labors of lexicographer and legal antiquarian, gives an entertaining chapter on art under the title of "Albrecht Dürer. The first number of the new series has also a personal subject, "Machiavelli," by C. Twesten, whose name will long go down in Prussian Parliamentary history as that of a champion and whilom martyr for free speech. Though the date of the publication of this lecture is so recent, it was delivered before the Berlin Artisans' Union in December of 1866, or a little before Judge Twesten with his followers went over to the assistance of Count Bismark and the support of the constitution of the new confederacy. It is, then, perhaps not without significance that Machiavelli's excuse for becoming reconciled with the Medici after the restoration of 1512 is distinctly pointed out. As for Herr Twesten's estimate of Machiavelli, he inclines neither to the side of those who, with Frederick the Great, regarded him as the incarnation of wicked doctrines, nor to that of those who, like Von Moser, could cry out: "Sancte Machiavelli, ora pro nobis," but rather adopts the judgment of Robert Von Mohl: "Machiavelli hath sinned, but still more hath been sinned against him," and he says himself: "We may consider Machiavelli's sins as atoned for by his high-minded striving for the greatness and importance of his people." "In the year 1827, Macaulay wrote: 'Machiavelli's grave would be approached with greater reverence if the goal of his aspirations were attained.' . . . . That goal is now secured. A national state is developing itself in Italy as in Germany. Not without marvelling can one read the deep truths uttered by the great Italian, and now confirmed after the lapse of centuries."

Professor Virchow himself furnishes the first essay—on "Giant Graves and Pile Structures." His object was evidently more to awaken an interest in the preservation of such relics than to write an erudite disquisition. Though displaying much learning and research, he lays himself open to much criticism by unreservedly adopting the division into the stone, bronze, and iron periods, with the customary conclusions, e.g., the diminutive stature of the men of the bronze period from the smallness of the sword handles. From the accounts of the stone implements of the New Zealanders, and from Admiral d'Urville's discovering pile-buildings in New Guinea similar to those scattered throughout Europe, he deduces not, as might perhaps be pardoned in so ardent a republican, that the savages of the South Sea Islands and the negroes of New Guinea are descendants of Europeans of the stone period, but the dogma—"The course of general human development follows everywhere the same law of progressive culture."

Another essay by Professor Virchow, on "Means of Nourishment and Regalement," was called out by the famine in East Prussia. It has already received favorable comments from medical gentlemen here, to whom it may safely be left.

Professor Von Holtzendorff is one of the few German advocates of "woman's rights," and hence gives, under the title "Improvements in the Social and Economical Position of Women," an account of the ameliorations of the condition of women from the time of Aristotle to the present. The professor would be reckoned, by the women's rights leaders in this country, as a very moderate follower of the true faith, yet he is so much of a pioneer at home that a large deputation of ladies personally paid their thanks to him one day last winter, to his no small surprise and to the delectation of the Berlin newspaper correspondents. His demands are indeed not excessive. He would have women better educated, and their right to engage in any occupation for which they are capable recognized. To ask for them the right of suffrage is doubtless very far from his thoughts, though he does say, when speaking of America: "Whoever will logically oppose women's voting must change the foundation-principle of popular representation, and maintain that the right to vote is based on ability to discharge public duties, as military service, and not on abstract equality of individuals. As soon as the right of suffrage is simply coupled with the individual nature of mankind the difference of sex becomes of no significance." This is rather the language of the publicist and jurist than of the citizen, and it may be questioned whether Professor Von Holtzendorff would assent to its being put in practice. German women are a long and weary way off from anything like participation in politics, as may be seen from this lecture. What is here called "the maiden question," i. e., stated in other words, What is to be done with unmarried women in Germany? must present itself with an irrepressibility that would have appalled even Governor Andrew. One hindrance to their occupying a position like that accorded their sex in England and America is their want of character, in the cultivation of which their education is deficient to a remarkable degree. Until some remedy for this defect in their training is devised marriage will continue to be, in Germany, a matter of bargain and sale, and to bring with it attendant evils.

"Wer Vieles bringt," says Goethe, "wird Manchem etwas bringen." In accordance with some such principle the range of topics discussed in these lectures is somewhat wide, and collected they form a valuable addition to any, but particularly to a school or parish, library. The undertaking has been found worth copying in Sweden, and there is now being published at Stockholm a similar series entitled "Vär tids Vetenskap i populära afhandlingar," and containing mostly translations from the German, e.g., Von Holtzendorff's "Position of Women," Von Graefe's "Organs of Sight," and "The Death Penalty," by Professor John, of Königsberg. If a like imitation is made in New York or Boston, it is to be hoped that the price will not be placed as high as it is in Berlin, where single copies cost from 7½ to 10 and 15 silver groschen. This is reduced, if one takes a whole series, to 5 groschen (12½ cents silver), or 4 thalers for an unbound volume of 900 pages. There should be no such drawback to so praiseworthy an attempt to bring the sheaves of the learned into the market of life.

---

A New Practical Hebrew Grammar, with Hebrew-English and English-Hebrew Exercises and a Hebrew Chrestomathy. By Solomon Deutsch, A.M., Ph.D. (New York: Leypoldt & Holt. 1868.)—In a brief preface the author enumerates the distinctive features of his manual, which, although many valuable Hebrew grammars have been published in this country, entitle him to the hope that "this fruit of earnest and zealous exertion will be found acceptable and useful." The principal of those features are: the utmost conciseness of the rules, coupled with perspicuity; their ample illustration by examples, and elucidation by exercises; the intrinsic value of the sentences selected for that purpose, almost each of which contains either an interesting historical fact or a pithy saying; the addition of English-Hebrew translating exercises illustrative of the rules which they follow, and "exactly keeping pace with the student's progress;" an Old Testament chrestomathy, composed of selections in prose and poetry, with a vocabulary explaining all words yet untranslated; another vocabulary with the aid of which the student is enabled to find the already given but forgotten meaning of words contained in the exercises; and the embodiment, in a compact form, of the most approved results of continental research in his field, including the recent labors of Fürst (in his "Lexicon"), Luzzatto, and Nägelsbach. We have examined into the intrinsic as well as comparative merits of the book, and we find that the credit claimed by the author for his production, as a work of conscientious labor and possessing "the character of novelty," is in every respect richly merited. It is evidently the product not only of conscientious, but also of long and assiduous, labor, as well as of extensive knowledge; and as regards the method, we can say without hesitation that we have never yet met with a manual so pleasantly paving the way to the literary treasures of an ancient language. But it is the elaborate character of the exercises which constitutes its chief claim to comparative excellence. Omissions could, of course, be pointed out in several parts, besides other minor imperfections. Thus, we find the English portions of the work not sufficiently revised, especially as to punctuation; nor does the brief list of "corrections" cover all the misprints in Hebrew. All these, however, are slight defects when put against the rare merits of the whole. Dr. Deutsch's "Practical Hebrew Grammar" fully deserves to be ranked among the foremost productions of its kind whether in America or Europe.

---

Réfutation de Force et Matière. Le Matérialisme Contemporain. Par Pierre Nolé. (Paris: Lemerre. 1868.)—The authorship of this spicy little octavo volume is entirely unknown to us. Internal evidence has led us to the conclusion that Pierre Nolé is the pseudonym of some savant who, for reasons doubtless satisfactory to himself, has chosen to put his visor down in entering the lists against the doughty champion of materialism, the author of "Kraft und Stoff." The strength and skill with which he tilts at his antagonist prove that he is not a novice in the art of dialectic fence. Besides, he is no mere professional scrimer fighting with a button on his foil for the vain purpose of displaying his own dexterity, but an earnest and enthusiastic defender of spiritual beliefs in opposition to what he regards as the dangerous materialistic tendencies of the present day. It is also highly creditable to him that, notwithstanding the force of his convictions and the vigor and vivacity of his style, his book is comparatively free from appeals to popular prejudices, as well as from attempts to unbottle against his adversary the bitter vials of religious bigotry. The truth which he holds is, in his eyes, trop sûre d'elle-même pour être farouche. This genuinely scientific spirit is so rare in those speculative controversies which have a more or less direct bearing upon social, theological, and political questions that it cannot be too emphatically praised, especially when we remember how often Herr Büchner and his adherents have sinned against philosophic charity in attributing superstition and imbecility to their opponents. M. Nolé employs the Socratic method of discussion by assuming the rôle of an ironical interlocutor, and endeavoring to entangle his adversary in the meshes of an artfully woven dialogue. Against the unfairness of such a manner of controversy the German doctor might very justly protest, since it enables the inquisitor to ensure conviction by so adjusting questions and answers as to lead inevitably to a conclusion which might be wholly different if Herr Büchner were permitted to respond in propriâ personâ. That M. Nolé has framed these replies on a careful and conscientious study of the work which he seeks to controvert, does not alter the inherent injustice of the method, nor make the results attained more satisfactory.

The first and most fundamental axiom affirmed by Herr Büchner is that there is no force without matter (keine Kraft ohne Stoff). M. Nolé enquires what is meant by force; Herr B. replies that by force he means a modification of matter, which reduces his axiom to the platitude that there can be no modification of matter without matter, or, in other words, that every river presupposes water. The second axiom is that matter is immortal. Why? Because it is indestructible. But physical indestructibility does not involve logical indestructibility; and matter is not logically indestructible, since we can conceive of the soul as existing when withdrawn from all the physical conditions of this life. The third axiom is that matter is infinite. Why? Because we see no end to it in either direction, whether towards the infinitely small or the infinitely great. But the fallacy here consists in making our senses (even when strengthened by the most perfect mechanical appliances) the measure of the reality of things. Thus M. Nolé attempts to show that the famous axioms of the materialistic school are only a series of affirmations, negations, and hypotheses, which, on critical examination, frequently resolve themselves into the most callow petitiones principii. We are by no means ready to aver that his "refutation" is always successful; the task, too, which he undertakes is that of purely negative criticism. He aims simply to expose the inadequacy of the arguments which the materialists have brought against the reality of spiritual existence and the personal immortality of the soul. We recommend the book not because we regard it as wholly sound in its logic or correct in its conclusions, but because it lays bare many weak points in Dr. Büchner's reasoning, and will be a valuable help to the reader in settling in his own mind what is just now one of the much discussed questions of speculative philosophy.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Prices. | |
|---|---|---|
| Bingham (W.), Cæsar's Commentaries on the Gallic War | (E. H. Butler & Co.) | |
| Bulwer Lytton (Sir E.), Night and Morning | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | $1 50 |
| Burns (R.), Complete Poetical Works | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 1 50 |
| Deutsch (S.), Practical Hebrew Grammar | (Leypoldt & Holt) | 2 50 |
| Dumas (A.), The Court of Moret: a Tale, swd | (T. B. Peterson & Bros.) | 0 50 |
| Lamartine (A. de), Fior d'Aliza | (Hurd & Houghton) | 1 25 |
| Martindale (J. C.), Common-School Speller | (E. H. Butler & Co.) | |
| Primary Speller | " " | |
| Complete Speller | " " | |
| Metz (Dr. A.), The Anatomy and Histology of the Human Eye | (Philadelphia) | 2 50 |
| Modern Women | (J. S. Redfield) | 2 00 |
| Peabody (Rev. A. P.), Reminiscences of European Travel | (Hurd & Houghton) | 1 50 |
| Reemelin (Chas.), The Wine-maker's Manual | (Robt. Clarke & Co.) | 1 25 |
| Scott (W.), The Pirate, swd | (D. Appleton & Co.) | 0 25 |
| Steele (J. D.), Fourteen Weeks in Astronomy | (A. S. Barnes & Co.) | |
| Souvestre (E.), Un Philosophe sous les Toits | (D. Appleton & Co.) | |
| Willis (N. P.), Sacred Poems | (Clark & Maynard) | |
| Wright (Mrs. S. A.), The Gem of the Lake: a Tale, swd | (Amer. News Co.) | 0 50 |

ON MAX MÜLLER'S SYSTEM.

A MANUAL OF MYTHOLOGY.

IN THE FORM OF QUESTION AND ANSWER.

By Rev. G. W. Cox, M. A.

16mo, illustrated, $1.

(From Professor Max Müller's Chips from a German Workshop.)

. . . "He has chosed the most important, the most instructive, and the most attractive portions of his subject. . . . He has given to some of his sketches more life and expression than can be found in many a lengthy article contributed to cyclopædias and other works of reference. . . . He has made room for what is an entirely new feature in his Manual—namely, the explanations of Greek and Roman myths, supplied by the researches of comparative mythologists. . . . That these researches, so well summed up in Mr. Cox's 'Manual of Mythology,' are in the main tending in the right direction, is, we believe, admitted by all whose opinion on such matters carries much weight."

(From the Spectator.)

. . . "A bold attempt in the right direction, and Mr. Cox deserves the best thanks of educational reformers."

(From the Saturday Review.)

"In a former article we did our best to warn schoolmasters, governesses, and conscientious mothers against 'Hort's Manual of Mythology.' We are glad that after telling them what to avoid, we can likewise tell them what to choose. Mr. Cox's 'Manual of Mythology' is the work of a scholar thoroughly familiar with the sources of classical mythology. . . . That he is able to sympathize with the ancient stories of Greece, and to repeat them with truthfulness and vividness; nay, with the warmth of a poet, he has amply proved. . . . It does Mr. Cox the greatest credit that in his 'Manual of Mythology' he has availed himself so fully of all the new light which the researches of comparative mythologists have shed on the sacred traditions of Greece and Rome."

Our catalogue will be sent post-paid to any one who applies.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,

451 Broome Street, New York.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

New Law Books and New Editions.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

110 Washington Street, Boston,

PUBLISH THIS WEEK:

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF MARINE INSURANCE AND GENERAL AVERAGE. By Hon. Theophilus Parsons, LL.D., Dana Professor of Law in Harvard University. 2 vols. 8vo, law sheep, $15.

CRIMINAL ABORTION, CONSIDERED IN ITS SOCIAL, MEDICAL, and LEGAL ASPECTS. By Prof. Horatio R. Storer, M.D., and F. F. Heard, Esq. 8vo, cloth, $2 25; law sheep, $2 50.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF HIGHWAYS. By Joseph K. Angell and Thomas Durfee, Esqs. Second Edition, with Notes and References to the Later Cases, by George F. Choate. 8vo, law sheep, $6.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY. By Emory Washburn, University Professor of Law in Harvard University. Third edition, revised and greatly enlarged. 3 vols. 8vo, law sheep, $22 50.

In Preparation:

THE LAW OF THE DOMESTIC RELATIONS: embracing Husband and Wife, Guardian and Ward, Parent and Child, Infancy, and Master and Servant. By James Schouler.

Just Published:

HAPPY HOURS:

A Collection of Songs and Music for Schools, Academies and the Home Circle.

By Howard Kingsbury and Rev. A. A. Graley.

Embracing "SPIRITED," "SENTIMENTAL," "OCCASIONAL," "AMUSING," and "PATRIOTIC" SONGS, etc., etc. Also, a Devotional Department, and an Elementary Treatise for Musical Instruction. Words and Music mostly original.

Board covers, cloth backs, 50 cents per copy; $5 per dozen. Cloth bound, gilt letters, 65 cents per copy; $6 50 per dozen.

CARMINA YALENSIA.

A new Collection of College Songs and Music. $1 50

TAINTOR BROTHERS, Publishers,

678 Broadway, New York.

HURD & HOUGHTON,

NEW YORK,

RIVERSIDE PRESS: CAMBRIDGE,

Will Publish, September 5,

1. REMINISCENCES OF EUROPEAN TRAVEL. By Andrew P. Peabody, D.D., LL.D., Preacher to Harvard University, and Plummer Professor of Christian Morals. In one volume, 16mo. Price $1 50.

 This book is not a guide-book, nor a scrap-book, nor a philosophical treatise, but just the pleasant reminiscences of a traveller who was sure to bring back what was worth remembering. He travelled on the highway, and the thousands of Americans who have made the customary tour will find that this book will quicken their recollection in the most agreeable fashion. In its pages they can live over again their old experience.

2. FIOR D'ALIZA. By Alphonse de Lamartine. Translated from the French by George Perry. In one volume 16mo. Uniform with the Riverside Classics. Price $1 25.

 Lamartine found the incidents of this charming story in a little nook in the mountains of Lucca, in Italy. It is a romantic story of peasant life, and told in his graceful manner it becomes a prose idyl, which leads the reader on without weariness to the end.

3. THE VAGABONDS. By J. T. Trowbridge. With illustrations by F. O. C. Darley. A new edition. One volume quarto. Price, in cloth gilt, $2 25.

September 19.

4. THE TRAGEDIAN: An Essay on the Histrionic Genius of Junius Brutus Booth. By Thomas R. Gould. With a photograph from Mr. Gould's bust of Booth. In one volume 16mo.

5. THE INSTRUMENT OF ASSOCIATION. A Manual of Currency. By George A. Potter. In one volume 12mo.

6. LIFE BELOW. In Seven Poems. One volume 16mo.

Lately Published.

7. LIFE IN THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC IN THE DAYS OF THE TYRANTS. In one volume crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

 The author, D. F. Sarmiento, has just been elected President of the Republic.

8. LIFE, LETTERS, AND POSTHUMOUS WORKS OF FREDRIKA BREMER. In one volume crown 8vo, cloth, $2.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WHO BREAKS PAYS."

A PSYCHE OF TO-DAY.

Cloth, $1 25. Copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,

451 Broome Street, New York.

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 167. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 201

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The "Political Sense" at the South.. 204
The Chinese Treaty ..... 205
The Situation in England ..... 206
"Dropped Dead." ..... 207
Campaign Songs ..... 207

CORRESPONDENCE:
More about Bonds, Greenbacks, and Gold ..... 209
Reconstruction at Yale College ..... 210
NOTES:
Literary ..... 210
German and Other Universities ..... 212
Effects of Soldiering on Character and Physique ..... 214
The Fine Arts of Japan ..... 215
Books of the Week ..... 216

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

THE Southern news of the week has not been reassuring. We hear of a state of affairs in Mississippi that ought to cause the immediate removal of General Gillem, who is in command there. Virtual slavery is permitted by him, as he permits the operation of the vagrant law, which orders chain-gang labor for negroes without an employer, and all negroes who vote the Radical ticket are apt to be that. The papers openly advocate the death of such Radicals as dare to remain in the State. In Arkansas, the case is at least as bad; assassination has been resorted to in the case of several prominent Republican leaders; and in the counties of which we spoke last week as being in rebellion, there has really been what amounted to civil war: the courts have been closed, several skirmishes have been fought, and the governor has been obliged to issue his proclamation. Tennessee seems to be trembling on the brink of civil war, and Forrest avers that there are 40,000 men in the State enrolled in the Ku-klux Klan, and that in the South generally it numbers more than five hundred thousand men; and that those of them who live in Tennessee are all ready to take up arms the moment that Brownlow orders out the militia. In South Carolina the legislature has passed a law making Governor Scott a dictator, if there should be within a month or two the apprehended civil war. In Georgia the lower House has turned out, and the upper one will turn out, all its negro members, and there has been rioting in the neighborhood of Savannah, as there has been in South Carolina on the Lower Santee —where the rice negroes are most numerous and most ignorant—at Hampton in Virginia, and in South-west Arkansas. But we advise no Republican to begin arguing on the inherent brutality of the negro every time the Associated Press reports a "negro riot" or "an outrage by armed negroes." Usually, the riots are considerably more white than black; and, even if they were not, the blacks would be doing no more than we should have been glad to see the whites doing in the days just before the late war—a time when, as now, the Union men allowed themselves to be cowed and killed by their more enterprising rebel neighbors. It is a thing to be most devoutly wished that in the other States, as in North Carolina, there could be in every county two or three well-organized bodies of loyal men, armed if necessary, to preserve some sort of order. But white Republicans are plenty in North Carolina, and then, too, the North Carolinian, whether white or black, was always the most sensible of the Southerners of his kind, and the most respectable. What is to be done about all this, except to elect Grant, we can hardly see. The troops are withdrawn, or all but withdrawn; and of such as are left General Gillem is a specimen. That there will be a September session of Congress in behalf of the loyalists of the South seems very doubtful.

On the other hand, there is this much of good Southern news. Mr. Conway's School Bill for Louisiana is probably killed, and it is expected that the substitute for it will be more sensible and conciliatory. There is talk of the State's being carried for Grant by 40,000 majority, which is probably only talk, though we have, as yet, seen no good reason for thinking that the Democrats could take the State from the Republicans. In Arkansas, the very strict registration law is to be strictly enforced, and the reserve militia is to hold itself ready for action. In all the States the military commanders are notified that the men of their commands are to be used by the sheriff or marshal in case of disturbance as part of the posse comitatus, if in the judgment of the commanding officers, "exercising a wise discretion," there shall be need of their services. This provision—a necessary one doubtless—will of course be found to work badly in many cases. The order will, however, have its moral effect. The Social Equality Bill of the South Carolina Legislature is said to have been passed in a much modified form; the Louisiana Legislature, which is the worst of all the Southern legislatures, as its Congressional delegation is the worst of all the Southern Congressional delegations, has, we believe, passed its Social Equality Bill in all its undiluted foolishness. Governor Smith, of Alabama, has summoned the legislature of that State to convene for the purpose of providing for registration.

---

The Georgia Legislature has been guilty of a most extraordinary performance. The new State constitution declares "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and resident in the State, citizens of the State," and "prohibits the passage of any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or of this State"—all of which is confirmed and enforced by the fourteenth constitutional amendment. But the majority in the legislature have adopted the view that the absence from the constitution of an express affirmation of the eligibility of colored persons to seats in the legislature, coupled with the re-enactment of the old Georgia code, makes them ineligible. Accordingly, the colored members, about twenty-five in number, have been expelled. We have received from private sources a very indifferent account of the white "Unionists" who adorn that body, which their action in this matter seems to confirm. It looks, at present, very much like an attempt on their part to make their peace with the secessionists by the sacrifice of the colored people. One of the colored delegates, in retiring, warned the "carpet-baggers" of their approaching doom, and shook the dust off his clothes in a figurative and contemptuous manner. The question, What is the remedy? is not, however, easy to answer; and the mere asking of it seems to touch the weak point in reconstruction, Will or can Congress interfere to correct the construction put by a State legislature on the constitution under which it sits? Will any court interfere with the judgment of a legislature on the qualifications of its own members? If a court did interfere, what could it do? It fact, it seems as if the only resource, after all, was the ballot.

---

General Rosecrans has published his correspondence with the Southern generals, and we doubt much if it has disappointed anybody. He writes them a long, gushing letter, "with his heart in his hand"—the displacement of that organ no doubt accounting for the feebleness of the whole performance—eulogizing in strong terms the Southern generals and army, and repeating, as the expression of his own sentiments and those of "the West and North," a long string of propositions about the dangers of the present crisis at the South, such as may be found in Governor Seymour's speeches and in the editorials of the World, and then asks the brave men of the South "what they think of it, and what they are willing to do about it," and whether they are willing to "pledge the people of the South to a chivalrous and magnanimous devotion to restoring peace and prosperity to our common country." We regret to say that the only epithet we can think of which exactly characterizes the communication is "snivelling." The reply of the Southern generals would, to a sensitive man—which we fear General Rosecrans is not—be very mortifying. It is cold, formal, and guarded. It says that the South, when the war was over, annulled its ordinances of secession and abolished slavery—which as proofs of a conciliatory and submissive spirit are about as valuable as its submission to the winter frosts and summer heats—and that the idea that the Southern people are hostile to the negroes, or would oppress them, "is entirely unfounded." No mention whatever, as might be expected, is made of the black codes passed after the war was over. The sum and substance of the letter is, in fact, that if the South is allowed, slavery being abolished, to come back into the Union, without conditions or restrictions, exactly as if nothing had happened, all will go well.

---

Governor Seymour wrote a very nice letter, on the 24th of July, apparently in reply to congratulations, to Mr. C. M. Ingersoll, of New Haven, which has just seen the light, in which he says the nomination "had plunged him into a sea of troubles." How serious these troubles are becomes every day more apparent. Colonel Brown, of Kentucky, a confidential friend of Chief-Justice Chase's, began them, the week before last, in a speech at Cincinnati, in which he gave the history of the Chief-Justice's connection with the Democratic Convention, showing that he would only have accepted the nomination on a platform of his own drafting, and that Governor Seymour was distinctly pledged to his support. Moreover, the platform was drafted, and submitted to Mr. Seymour, and approved by him, and has been published. It advocates "universal suffrage and universal amnesty," condemns the Congressional attacks on the Supreme Court and the military features of the reconstruction plan, calls for the faithful payment of the public debt, and refers the interpretation of the contract between the Government and its creditors to the courts. It is, in fact, a platform of which no honest man could approve, one would think, and afterwards approve of the platform since adopted. Colonel Brown's exposures have called forth other outbursts of discontent—two in particular, from Mr. Reed and Mr. Alexander Long, other Democratic friends of the Chief-Justice, representing the Seymour nomination as a great "coup de thimblerig"—in other words, a most disgraceful breach of faith on Mr. Seymour's own part, and aggravated by his weeping afterwards in a private room, "for hours, like a newly-weaned baby"—a display of tenderness which to the humbugged Chase delegates must have been, and was, little short of maddening. Colonel Brown pronounces Mr. Seymour, "as a weeper, the equal of Job Trotter."

---

Mr. Fessenden made an excellent speech at Portland last week—the most effective, except Senator Wilson's, we have yet had in the campaign. He addressed himself mainly to the financial question, and more particularly to the question of the intention of Congress, when the bonds were issued, as to the currency in which they should be paid, giving the history of the loans and of the legal tenders, and giving it with a knowledge of what passed at each stage of this financial legislation such as few men possess. He says that the issue of the legal-tender paper was a forced loan, and Congress well knew it was a forced loan, and therefore a hard measure, which nothing but overwhelming necessity could justify. It therefore, to mitigate its effects, determined to make this new currency convertible into interest-bearing bonds, and issued the bonds accordingly, "no man dreaming," as Mr. Fessenden declares, and as nobody has yet dared to deny, that they would, when due, be paid in anything but coin, or that we should not have got back to specie payments long before they were due. The interest was made expressly payable in coin, simply because it became payable at once, while paper was the circulating medium. Mr. Fessenden added—and we are glad to have the confirmation of such an authority as he is for the doctrine we have all along maintained in these columns—

"We are not to settle a question of this kind according to strict judicial principles, as if we were trying a law case; we are to settle it according to the opinion of those who contracted it; and we are to appeal to the enlightened judgment of the world for the correctness of the decision we make on this question. It is not a question for the court to decide. The language of the statute will allow you to do a particular thing if you choose to do it, but we are to appeal to the enlightened judgment of the world whether we are not bound by honesty and good faith to pay our debts in coin."

Anybody who preaches other doctrine than this is, again to use Mr. Fessenden's language, "a repudiator, unworthy of the confidence of an honest, God-fearing people."

---

There was one passage in Mr. Fessenden's speech, however, which we read with pain and misgiving, and that is his confession, speaking of his opposition to making the greenbacks a legal tender, "that he was a doubter, and went just about as far as he was compelled to go in an untried direction, and no further." He surely knows that there is no excuse for any doubting on the part of politicians in this country any longer, inasmuch as they have only to subscribe to some of our Radical contemporaries—the Boston Commonwealth, for instance—to have "the truth"—not the half-truths, or approximations to truth, of the poor logicians and mathematicians, but the absolute truth, "la verité vraie," as the French say—served out to them at a very trifling expense, just as regularly as their milk, either by carrier or through the United States mails. Anybody who, under these circumstances, tries to reason his way to his conclusions, and therefore, of course, "doubts," must be a villain or an ignoramus. We know it enrages our Radical brethren to have this fact mentioned—owing, we presume, to a morbid modesty on their part—but our duty is none the less clear.

---

The Democratic State Conventions have met during the week, both in New York and Massachusetts—that of New York nominating John T. Hoffman, and that of Massachusetts John Quincy Adams, for the governorship. We are sorry to see from their platforms that certain designing knaves—who they are, has never been made public—still continue their nefarious efforts to deprive the soldiers and sailors of their pensions. No convention of any party has met, we venture to say, within the last six years which has not solemnly declared its determination to have the pensions paid in full, and yet these heartless scoundrels, it appears, persist in trying to have them stopped, and the widows and orphans forgotten. There is only one remedy for this state of things, and that is to publish the names of the leaders in this wicked movement. We understand the reluctance of political committees to take this extreme step, but taken it should be at once. The New York platform also gives another warning, we are glad to see, to the corrupt men in office, by calling for reform in the abuses of the administration. The upholders of these abuses must surely see by this time that they have no friends in either party. Both Democrats and Republicans dislike them, and if they have any delicacy of feeling left they will, under the circumstances, betake themselves to some honest calling.

---

It is very curious to see the influence of the strong Republican atmosphere of the State on the Massachusetts Democratic platform. It calls, like that of New York, for one currency for all, but it says that that currency should be gold and silver, and asks for a return to specie payments at the earliest possible moment. The New Yorkers do not mention paper as their favorite, but clearly indicate it. The Massachusetts Convention, too, speaks respectfully of Grant, says nothing about taxing Government bonds—that of New York does call for it—and in fact, except in the declaration of adhesion to Seymour and Blair, has little in it that any Republican need object to.

---

We see in the Chicago Tribune and other Western papers occasional complaints of the poor quality of the lectures which the unfortunate public in that region have imposed on them during the winter season by the lyceums, and these complaints are frequently accompanied by threats against lecturers of low capacity and excessive ambition. A precedent has been furnished recently in the North of England for dealing with such cases, which is not only entertaining, but might, we are sure, be often usefully followed in this country. Two Dissenting ministers delivered a pair of successful lectures in a place called Ossett in favor of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The Episcopal clergy took up the cudgels for the Church, and a Rev. D. C. Kersy delivered another lecture in the same town on the other side, to which the "public were cordially invited." After the lecture there was a discussion, and the following resolution was then moved, seconded, and carried by 650 to 50 votes:

"That in the opinion of this meeting Mr. Kersy's lecture has been wanting in point and uninteresting to this audience, and, as a reply to the lectures of the Revs. M. Miller and C. Williams, has been a miserable failure."

A vote of thanks to the chairman was then reluctantly passed, and he and the lecturer left the room "amidst the hooting and groaning of the audience."

---

The Independent last week, with that disregard of strict accuracy which, as we have frequently remarked, seems to be growing amongst the reformers, "helped on the cause" by alleging that the Nation is in favor of separate schools for blacks and whites at the South. The Nation holds that the true object of legislation, like the true object of editorial articles, is, not to make our enemies feel uncomfortable, but to improve the condition of the human race; and while, as we explained clearly last week, we would not allow any public school to be shut in a colored child's face, we would not send policemen, as Mr. Conway proposed to do in Louisiana, to drag white men's children to colored schools, in the hope of thereby promoting the equality of the races. The curse of the colored people at the South is that the whites hate them. To abate that hatred is, or ought to be, the great aim of every Southern and Northern legislator or philanthropist; and every measure which has this end in view, and will bear being tested by experience and principles of human nature, will have our heartiest support. But no legislator or agitator, nor any of his aiders or abettors, will get any expression of sympathy from us in the promotion of schemes which fly in the face of both one and the other. Those who applaud these "social equality bills," at the South, are the negro's worst enemies, and are practising on his ignorance or his vanity; because, if these bills could be executed, they would only increase the white execration of him, without making him either happier or wiser, and, if they cannot be executed, will simply irritate his neighbors.

---

The case of Mr. Scully, a Tipperary landlord, who was, with two policemen, shot while endeavoring to serve notices of ejectment on his tenants, furnishes an excellent illustration of the workings of the Irish land-laws. The tenants were tenants-at-will, which at law amounts to a tenancy from year to year, inasmuch as the tenant, even if ejected during the year, would be entitled to the growing crops, and therefore never is ejected in practice without half a year's notice. But Mr. Scully tried to force his tenantry into executing agreements, which are of doubtful legality, to quit at twenty-one days' notice, and surrender the crops at the same time. Such leases, whether legal or not, would constitute the most outrageous tenure on which land has ever been held in a civilized country, and would, in fact, leave the tenant in a position in many respects inferior to that of a man holding his house and farm, as men did in the eighth and ninth centuries on the European continent, with the strong hand only. The tenants naturally refused to sign such leases, and, on Mr. Scully's coming to serve ejectment notices, shot him and the policemen down, apparently in a paroxysm of despair. In judging of the guilt of the crime—for in assassinations there are degrees of guilt—we must remember that ejectment from a farm in Ireland means condemnation to the life of a day-laborer—a condition only one degree removed from pauperism, and not always clearly distinguishable from it; to say nothing of the loss of all that makes life valuable—home and social position—for the Irish peasant clings tenaciously to his social position when he has any but the lowest. The infliction of such a penalty at the discretion of one man, merely as an assertion of the rights of property, has never been submitted to on a great scale in any country or age. It is not in human nature to submit to it, and, sooner or later, we feel satisfied, Mr. J. S. Mill's remedy for Irish discontent, radical as it is, will have to come. A writer in the Pall Mall Gazette lately deduced, from the notorious indifference of the Irish to the possession of land here, where it is plenty, the conclusion that their passion for it in Ireland is due to "pure cussedness," and that no fixity of tenure would satisfy them. But the fact is, they cling to land in Ireland as a last resource; here, where labor is plenty, and well paid, they do not cling to it, and, being gregarious, crowd into the towns. In Ireland, however, the farmer, if ejected, has neither manufactures nor a good labor market to fall back on, and, in resisting his ejectment, he fights for everything but life. His course is doubtless prejudicial to high farming; but the question for him is not one of either high or low farming.

---

The more consideration on the defeat of the French Government in the Department of the Jura by the election of M. Grévy receives, the more important it appears. The newspapers of all parties acknowledge that it looks like an entrance on a new political era, and that if the example thus spread be followed elsewhere, the Imperial policy must be completely modified, and the Cæsarist system given up, and government by a responsible ministry substituted. What makes the vote all the more significant is that in the statistical maps the Jura stands white, meaning that only three per cent. of the population can neither read nor write, which shows that the primary schools are turning the peasantry against absolutism, and the primary schools cannot be shut up. The contest, too, was not a close one. All the efforts of the prefect, priests, mayors, and the other functionaries which swarm in every French department could only produce a minority of 11,000 against 22,000. Even M. de Laguerronière's paper, La France, the chief of the "devoted" journals—he himself having once filled the post of censor, and now filling that of minister at Brussels—says that the Government must understand "that the days of easy elections are over, and a struggle has commenced." The Government has been waiting the result of this election in order to decide whether it would at once dissolve the Chamber and have a general election, or wait a little longer. The result has determined it to postpone the dissolution, and try its luck in three other places at once, where it might have delayed the election for six months. The contest in these promises to be very fierce, as the democratic party will go to work with strong hope, which they have never yet had.

---

Another sign of the times is to be found in the strong protest drawn up by the Municipal Council of Bordeaux against the gerrymandering arrangement by which the city was cut up into three electoral districts, each of them including a large tract of the surrounding country, in order to prevent the city population electing obnoxious candidates, by neutralizing its votes by those of the peasantry. The result of this arrangement is that the leading commercial city of France after Marseilles has no representative of her own in the Corps Législatif. The mayor, who is a Government nominee, struggled hard against the adoption of the protest, looking upon it as little short of sedition, but it was carried by fourteen to six votes.

---

The Canadians have been making an effort to reduce the salary of the Governor-General, who gets £10,000 a year, or twice as much as the President; but the Colonial Office has vetoed the bill, on the ground that the right sort of man for the place could not be got for less money, and that any reduction of the salary would reduce Canada to the position of "a third-class colony." These are the kind of objections to change which Bentham used to enjoy worrying and gnawing and making merry over. It will not be pretended, and is not pretended, as the New York Times justly remarks, that a man competent to discharge the duties of the office could not be got for less money. What the Home Government means by a fit man is a man of rank, and it is for the rank he is paid rather than for the work—a rule which also regulated the salaries of officers in France before the Revolution, drawing from Clavière, the Swiss financier, when he took office, the remark, "that it was like employing a Dutch florist instead of a common gardener to raise potatoes." What the consequences would be to Canada of being reduced to "a third-class colony" is one of the awful mysteries of state which it takes an official mind to fathom.

THE "POLITICAL SENSE" AT THE SOUTH.

THE performances of the Southern orators and editors continue to furnish striking illustrations of the extent to which their troubles are due to their bad political habits, and of the large part which time and restraint from without must play in Southern regeneration. When we have been looking, as most of us have, to some particular measure as a "sure and instant cure" for Southern ills, we have forgotten that hardly any Southerner of this generation is familiar with the practical working of a free government; that the very basis of a free government—a general faith in the power of discussion, and a general willingness to abide by the results of discussion, as expressed by the vote—has been wanting at the South for thirty years; that none of the young or middle-aged men are any more familiar with the process of forming opinion by talk, and of listening to talk that they do not like, than Frenchmen or Russians—in fact, they are not nearly so familiar with it as Frenchmen.

It is over thirty years since the place of the negro in society became the vital question of Southern politics. The question of secession was merely an accessory of that of slavery. The people have, during that interval, thought, spoken, and written of little else. All other subjects—theology, political economy, moral philosophy, the natural sciences even—have owed a large part of their interest, in Southern eyes, to their bearing on the negro's origin and destiny, and have been cultivated mainly with reference to slavery. Now, touching slavery—that is, touching the matter which most occupied men's thoughts, and about which men's passions have been most roused—the expression of opposing opinions has not been permitted in any part of the South within the experience of the present generation. No man has dared to present to the public, either in the press or on the platform, more than one side of the great question of the day, or, latterly, to introduce from abroad any expressions of dissent from the prevailing doctrine. The consequence has been that there is no native Southerner under the age of forty-five who can be said to have any political training or to possess the "political sense," as that phrase is understood at the North. He has never witnessed free debate; he has never seen political changes accomplished by debate; he has never seen a minority submit to the legislation of a majority without losing the hope of converting them or desisting from its efforts to do so. In short, he feels very much about dissenters from the prevailing political creed as a pious Catholic of the twelfth century felt about heretics, and looks on orators who declaim against his theories on the stump very much as Austrian politicians, about 1820, might be supposed to look on an Italian exile, newly arrived from London to edit a paper of extreme views at Milan.

Now, what is the "political sense?" It is not that acquaintance with history, political economy, jurisprudence, and human nature which is called political knowledge; nor is it the shrewdness, acuteness, and skill in the art of persuasion which makes the successful political "manager." There are countries in the world in which political knowledge abounds, but in which the political sense is so wanting that the establishment of a free government is almost impossible. A man might be, as the Abbé Siéyes thought he was, "perfect in the science of politics," and yet be, as the Abbé certainly was, an incorrigible political donkey. A community, too, might be composed of men as astute, dexterous, and unctuous as any "wire-puller" who has ever walked the streets of Albany, and yet go to pieces politically in the course of a very few years for want of any cohesive principle. The "political sense" is, in short, the quality, partly moral, partly mental, which enables a man to believe in the power of discussion, to work for distant results, and to be content for the present with what he can get in default of what he wants. A man who rails against "talk" in politics; who loves the "previous question;" and who, when the vote goes against him, goes home to pack up his trunk with a view to emigration, or to load his pistol, or to distribute arms amongst his friends, or form secret associations, or who talks of "pestilent doctrines," or who forces himself into company where he is not wanted, or drags his neighbors' children to school with his own against their parents' will in order to assert the doctrine of human equality, is wanting in the political sense, and if he has reached middle life is not likely ever to acquire it.

That this sense has almost totally died out at the South, and that it will need some years of order and security to restore it, the occurrences of every week show more and more clearly. The abstinence of the leading whites from all participation in politics under the new constitutions, thus permitting the government to pass into the hands of those whom they denominate as "carpet-baggers," "scallawags," and ignorant blacks, followed by incessant talk of appeals to arms, deputations to Washington to apply for military protection, the formation of secret associations, the practice of assassination as a political remedy, and the issue of irritating denunciatory manifestoes directed against the black population with whom they have to live, and on whom they are dependent for their prosperity, are all striking proofs of the political imbecility brought on the Southern mind by the long absence of an opposition. Men with the political sense in a healthy condition would have held on tenaciously to every scrap of power they could seize or retain, would, if possible, never have let the negroes get from under their influence, and, above all, would never have allowed them to realize the possibility that the State could be governed by carpet-baggers and ignoramuses. The exposures recently made by the Democratic Club at Charleston of the composition of the South Carolinian Legislature under the new régime are, even if true, simply consequences of their own folly, and, indeed, have a striking resemblance, as pieces of self-stultification, to the manifestoes and declarations which the French emigrés used to issue from the banks of the Rhine against the vulgar French republicans. A politician who sulks and sneers and refuses to act, does not simply confess that he is powerless, but that he is a fool.

The Ku-klux Klan, let us add, is nothing new. The South before the war was one vast Ku-klux Klan: every man was a member of the organization, and the State governments made no attempt to interfere with it, and its victims were rare because dissenters from the popular creed did not enter the South. What makes it seem so novel now is that the State governments are in the hands of the dissenters, and there is a large body of them in every State. But its operations are simply the application to the new state of things of the old Southern mode of repressing differences of political opinion. The great question of the day to Southerners is still the status and rights of the negro, and they bring to the consideration of it their old practices. If a man gets up on the stump and preaches negro equality, they do not get up on another stump and preach white superiority, and rely on time and their own exertions to show that his preaching was idle talk, but they go home and take a solemn oath to "keep an eye" on the orator, and if he does the like again to shoot him or carry him into the woods and whip him—in other words, about what the Montenegrins would do if a preacher made his appearance amongst them to propagate Mohammedanism and eulogize the Turks. When Forrest and others like him throw the blame of the present state of things on the Radicals, they either deceive themselves or are trying to deceive others. In the account he gave the other day of his plans and those of his associates to the correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, he simply said that they were going to adhere to the old Southern mode of extirpating holders of disagreeable opinions; and his threats seem alarming simply because the holders of disagreeable opinions now are likely to resist. Formerly, they never thought of such a thing.

There can be no doubt that it is a misfortune that some such disposition should not have been made at the close of the war of such persons as Forrest, Toombs, and Cobb as would have ensured their abstinence from politics. After the report of the Congressional Committee on the Fort Pillow massacre, the release of Forrest on parole was a great scandal; even after his parole had been accepted, it ought to have been returned to him by the Government, and the alternative—exile, or a trial before a military commission—have been offered to him. With regard to the others, however much opposed we may be to political vengeance, there is nobody who will deny that men who have made themselves conspicuous in instigating an appeal from the ballot to the sword ought to be compelled, after defeat in the field, to hold their tongues for the remainder of their days. Civil war is too dreadful a thing to be tried by agitators unless they really mean it to be the last thing they will ever try; but the mild view taken of their performances by the Northern public not unnaturally causes the Southern leaders now to treat the rebellion as merely one of the legitimate means of attaining political ends, the failure of which ought to entail no more inconvenience on the vanquished than defeat at an election. These men are now trying to be as mischievous as ever, and there is only one remedy for their talk, and that is, the forcing them to listen peaceably to other people's talk. This cannot be done in a year, but a great deal may be done towards it in four years. Whenever the time comes when the spectacle so common at the West—a spectacle, let us add, which indicates, no matter how coarse the manners or low the intellectual culture of a community may be, political development of the highest order, and the possession of the political sense in the utmost activity—of the candidates of the opposing parties traversing the country together, and haranguing the same audiences on opposite sides of the same question, will be witnessed at the South, its regeneration will for all practical purposes be complete, but not till then. Until we see this, emigrants will avoid it, life and property in it will be insecure, and the minority, or the blacks, will be in constant peril. The process of education, as we have often said, has been begun. Every time a Radical gets up in any Southern State, and says "shocking" things, and is not murdered for them, the work is advanced. It ought to be the main business of the North now to see that it is not interrupted until there will be no corner of the country in which a man cannot make a fool of himself, on the stump or in a newspaper, without fear of other penalty than having his folly exposed. Southern society will then be placed under the dominion of public opinion, which, in a healthy condition of things, is the fundamental guarantee of peace and security.

THE CHINESE TREATY.

A portion of the English press—and we are sorry to see so candid a journal as the Spectator among the number—began to put a bad construction on the Chinese treaty recently concluded at Washington the minute it reached them, and fancy they have detected in it proof of a design on the part of China to enter, with American aid and countenance, on a retrograde policy. The comments of the Saturday Review on it are in the worst style of that paper, nearly all conclusions about the treaty being really, and in fact undisguisedly, deductions from the Saturday Review theory of American character; and it has actually constructed a Mr. Burlingame out of the depths of its moral consciousness—for it evidently knows nothing about the man himself—to fit into its explanation of the treaty. For instance, in order to make the clause about the construction of railways bear the appearance of a cunning bid for a job on the part of American contractors and iron-dealers, it has to have a kind of flashy enterprising "bagman" of the George Francis Train style for the ambassador, and accordingly Mr. Burlingame is dressed up in that character, and a thirst for "New York applause" made the mainspring of his actions. It would seem as if a very small share of the sense of decorum would have been sufficient to prevent hostile comments on the mission or its objects before it presented itself in London, for it must be remembered that it is accredited to England as well as to the United States, and it will be time enough to accuse Mr. Burlingame of using his functions to secure a monopoly of advantages for his own country when it has been seen what kind of treaties he makes or offers to make with others. The theory of the Spectator that the Burlingame mission is a suddenly devised contrivance of the "Empress Mother and Prince Wen-siang, a really able politician of the high-tory sort," for cutting off the Chinese from intercourse with foreigners, has all the marks of one of those curious hallucinations about foreign politics, and especially about very distant politics, to which journalists may be said to be liable to fall in the direct ratio of their earnestness and honesty—just such an one, for instance, as the Spectator occasionally falls into with regard to American affairs, merely from overeagerness to see deeply into things. It is certainly not displaying undue distrust of our contemporary's accuracy to say that we fear its testimony as to the designs of the "Empress Mother" is not to be received without considerable caution. In fact, we feel perfectly satisfied there is no European or American whose opinions of the exact part played by any Chinese court lady in Chinese politics are worth repeating. Moreover, even if the Empress Mother and Prince Wen-siang be playing the part the Spectator assigns them, it is absurd to claim the credit of astuteness for them, as the Spectator does. Chinese politicans who, desiring to close their territory to foreigners, employ a foreigner to take charge of an embassy from them to all the other nations of the civilized world, and, surrounding him with native diplomatists, send him off to make a dozen treaties, every one placing China under the restraints and obligations of the body of usages known as international law—and all this with great pomp and uproar, and with the certainty of attracting more barbarian attention to China than has ever been fixed on it before, and of exciting more expectations of trade and other intercourse with it than have ever previously existed, and of contracting obligations towards nine or ten powers with which they have hitherto had nothing whatever to do—may be very deep and cunning, but they have a very odd way of showing it.

We believe, on the contrary, that the account we gave of the origin and objects of the embassy when the news of it first arrived last February was substantially correct: that it is not intended to be a means of getting back to a retrograde policy, but is in reality one more step in a really progressive policy, a measure intended not to restrict but promote intercourse with foreigners; and that, in short, it means what anybody who was not in search of hidden mysteries would take it to mean, and what nobody would have the hardihood to deny that it meant if it was sent out by any power with which we were well acquainted. Here is what we said on the 20th of February last as to the policy of the present Chinese administration, and this was not written here, but in China, by a competent and well-informed observer:

"But, on the death of the Emperor, his brother Prince Kung and Wen-siang, two men who appreciated and accepted the new situation, gained control of the regency by a brilliant coup d'état, and inaugurated a progressive policy. Its first-fruits were an acquiescence in the residence of foreign ministers at Pekin, and a willingness to profit by their advice so far as the distracted condition of the empire would allow. Their attention was next forcibly drawn to the foreign inspectorate of customs at the treaty ports, on which England and France had insisted as a collateral security for the indemnity due them. This institution was at first distasteful, but as each year brought into the imperial exchequer a rapidly increasing revenue from this source, the Chinese have accepted the idea in its entirety, and have developed a revenue service which for efficiency, honesty, and convenience can compare more than favorably with our own. The navigation of the Yangtse River was also conceded, and the substantial advantages to them of the fleet of steamers now trading on that great internal highway of the empire operate in favor of the still further opening of their waters to foreign commerce. In various places they have established arsenals under foreign supervision, where arms are manufactured to equip their foreign disciplined troops. They are building gunboats to police their coasts, and repress the piracy which has been their curse. They have issued wise pilot regulations, and appropriated funds for light-houses where the need is most urgent. Wheaton's 'Treatise on International Law' has been translated into Chinese, and they have adopted it as their text-book—understandingly, too, as they proved when a Prussian frigate violated the neutrality of their waters in the last Danish war. In Pekin itself a college has been established for the instruction of natives in Western knowledge by the ablest professors that could be procured, and there can be no doubt of the benefit that will almost immediately flow from this substitution of positive sciences for the dead husks of the Confucian classics."

Nothing can be more natural than that men who have done all this should seek closer, more direct, and intelligent relations with the great family of nations, whose laws and learning they are adopting, no matter how distasteful the whole barbarian polity may be. That an American should have been selected to fill the first place in the embassy, if any foreigner was to be selected, is the most reasonable thing conceivable, both from the fact that hitherto America has had but little trade or intercourse with China, and that she is hereafter likely to have a great deal. The very largeness of the English trade with China, on which the Spectator dwells with so much satisfaction, and the unpleasantness, to use a mild word, which has attended the growth of that trade, disqualified England for the position of medium of communication between China and the rest of the civilized world. Neither the Chinese nor the other nations could have had much confidence in an agent with so large a pecuniary interest in Chinese doings, and with such a hearty contempt for Chinese morals and understandings, as Great Britain has. When a retailer comes to town with a view of extending his relations amongst the wholesale dealers, he does not naturally put himself in the hands of one who has previously had a monopoly of his custom, and who has several times sold him out for slight shortcomings. There is a good deal of human nature in Chinamen as well as in other men, and there are not many Englishmen of the school of politics to which the Spectator belongs who would say, if put upon their candor, that, under the circumstances, it would be fair to expect the Chinese to choose England as mediator between it and Christendom. The convenances alone forbid it, and England ought not to expect it. Moreover, there is no power which has so much prospective interest in China as the United States, because there is the very strongest probability that we shall, before many years, have a vast Chinese population on the Pacific coast—not naturalized citizens, but living and laboring with the animus revertendi strong upon them, and for whose fate and treatment the Chinese Government, if it makes any change at all in its polity, must hold the United States responsible. Besides this, if the opening up of the Pacific Railroad and the increase of population on the Pacific slope do not end before very long in making either San Francisco or New York the great entrepôt of Oriental products—which London now is—the laws of trade or the nature of the American man must have recently undergone some great change.

At the same time, it must be admitted that the embassy runs some risk of accomplishing less for China than it seeks to accomplish, through making stronger claims, on behalf of the empire and its civilization, on the consideration of the Western world than the facts will support. There is no doubt that it is a great thing for a nation to be old, if it has made a good use of its time, but not otherwise; and to say of a nation that it knew all it knows now, and a great part of what we know, five hundred years before the Christian era, is a doubtful compliment. Nobody can help growing old; the glory lies in improving as the years roll over us. There is, too, a natural tendency among us to a reaction against the excessive crowing over material progress with which the Western world is filled, and of this tendency the Chinese get the benefit. They go without railroads and grain-elevators, and cultivate sentiment; and those of us who begin to hate railroads and grain-elevators are easily persuaded that there is something fine in the mere absence of them. But there is not. We have much to learn from the Chinese, and there is much in them that we might imitate. People who stand long and steadfastly on the ancient ways have graces and manners of which the "live man" and the "earnest radical" know nothing; but, take it for all in all, our civilization is the best there ever has been—the best morally, mentally, and materially—and is not likely to gain much by the opening up of the Oriental world. A great gulf separates us, after all, from the best of the Greeks or Romans or Chinese—a gulf of which there may be no trace in the religious or ethical books, but which even a commonplace modern man would feel if he stood face to face with the best philosopher of antiquity.

In saying all this, we have in our mind the difficulties that must present themselves in dealing with China in all respects as a member of the family of civilized nations. The rules which regulate the intercourse of the latter are based on a common stock of religious and moral ideas, which really influence life and manners, and which the Chinese do not as yet share. This, however, is not a reason for not bringing her in, but for laboring earnestly to do it; and, instead of diminishing the credit due to Mr. Burlingame's mission, it heightens it. But it also should warn us against extravagant expectations as to the result.

THE SITUATION IN ENGLAND.

The English newspapers, as well as the English public, are so absorbed in the discussion of the merits of the various candidates offering themselves for the next election, that the discussion of "questions" may be said to be almost dropped. What one learns of popular feeling about them, one gets almost exclusively from the addresses of the candidates, which thus possess an amount of interest they have not possessed before since 1640; for never, since that time, has Parliament appealed to the country on matters so important. This may seem an exaggerated statement; but nobody whose reading of the newspapers is supplemented by trustworthy private information can doubt that England is on the verge of the most tremendous crisis in her history, and that the Irish Church question is simply the precursor of others, which will not be settled without recasting English society and giving a new color and direction to the tide of English history.

The election addresses show that the Liberal party are firmly united in the determination to abolish the Irish Church, that there is no shrinking or hesitation amongst them, and that time and reflection and discussion have only strengthened the "week-kneed." Moreover, the attempt of the Tories to get up a "No Popery" feeling in its favor has been made, and has failed utterly. The appeals of the clergy for this purpose have met with little or no response. A "great Protestant demonstration," convened in its defence at the Crystal Palace the other day, by the high Church dignitaries, proved worthless; and a little incident, which we have mentioned in "The Week," is a good indication of the state of opinion amongst the middle classes. The Dissenters, properly so called—that is, the Nonconformists, who attend public worship, and take an interest in ecclesiastical matters—now, after fifty years of anti-State-Church agitation, find their great enemy on his knees, and will not spare him, and are not scared, as they would have been forty years ago, by the cry of "Pope!" The working-classes in the towns, disliking all clergy, dislike in an especial manner the Episcopal clergy; and as to the laboring classes in the country districts, they count for nothing in a political agitation. The defenders of the Irish Church, composed principally of the higher clergy and the aristocracy, are thus left face to face with their remorseless foes, "the philosophers" of the Pall Mall Gazette and the Fortnightly Review and the ultra Radicals—and more unpleasant foes the lover of things settled rarely has to encounter. The wits of the friends of the Church are, therefore, well-nigh failing them for fear.

Not that they have any real attachment to the Irish Church. It is a body of which its sister in England has never felt particularly proud, or from which it has ever derived any credit. Its clergy, as a general rule, have never exhibited much of either learning or devotion, and have displayed a large number of the vices of the Protestant garrison from which they were drawn—the pride, arrogance, bigotry, and nepotism. Neither Christian doctrine nor practice has ever owed much to army chaplains, taken as a body. The Irish clergy have been essentially in the position of army chaplains, with few or no duties, and no discipline. There is no way of looking at the organization, in fact, which does not make it appear the scandal, not of the Anglican Church only, but of the Church universal.

Its fall, therefore, would be viewed by the English clergy with at least an approach to equanimity, if it were not generally felt—though, as yet, there is no public talk to this effect—that its fall will be but the narrow end of the wedge, and that with its fall the Establishment in England will be doomed also. The signs that this catastrophe, too, is not far distant are numerous. Not only are the links between church and state being eaten away by the steady dropping of the acid of the utilitarian philosophy, but the unity which might have saved the Establishment is gone. There are now half-a-dozen sects within its borders, and their dislike of each other is considerably stronger than their dislike of outsiders. Only one of them wants to have John Locke's ideal realized, and all who find comfort in the Church's ministrations suffered to live peaceably under her roof, no matter what their doctrinal belief may be. The others are eager for compulsory uniformity; and while they are quarrelling the enemy is gathering at the gates. Many excellent clergymen, in full consciousness of the danger, are making desperate efforts to devise some theory of the Church's functions in the state which will satisfy the political reformers and save its endowments and its national character; but in vain. Even that very old and serviceable argument, on which even Jeremy Bentham looked with a kindly eye, that by having an established church you secure the presence and humanizing influence of educated gentlemen in districts which would otherwise be abandoned to barbarism, no longer produces any impression on the iconoclasts. They say they will find other and better means of elevating the rural population. Talk of the clergy as educators of the young only calls forth shouts of derision, in view of the mental condition of the agricultural population in this the fourth century of the Church's existence. Something has been said about drawing in the Dissenters; but when negotiations on that matter were opened with the Congregationalists a year ago, at Manchester, the gulf was found too wide to be bridged over. Dr. Pusey has just been making proposals, with a similar view, to the Wesleyans, being moved thereto by the recollection of their Episcopal origin, but he met with a smart rebuff. In the great towns, although there is a prodigious amount of missionary and charitable work done by the clergy amongst the poor, their overtures to the working-men meet with no response. Conferences between them were held in London under the auspices of the "Broad Church" wing, last year, which resulted in nothing. The working-man was found to take no interest in religion, or, if he did, none in religion as preached by the Church. The church and the parson were, in his eyes, rich men's luxuries, and he cared nothing for them.

Moreover, the Church is losing—in fact, we might say, has lost—the universities, all but in name and in law. Rationalism has stalked into the quadrangles with a hungry face, and fascinated the young men. A High-Churchman is nowadays a personage who is regarded in Oxford common-rooms—the Oxford of Keble and Newman—with a humane but amused eye, and the organization in which he is so much interested as one of the things which has to "go down," in so far as its connection with the state is concerned. The university tests, too, are in such danger that Dr. Pusey, in the hope of at least keeping Unitarians and Positivists out of them, has proposed handing over one college to each orthodox sect; which would, of course, lead to such quarrelling as would before long divide the whole college revenues among the members of the Chancery bar.

The tottering of the Church Establishment, too, is but one of the signs of the change through which public opinion is passing on other subjects, and which the newspapers only feebly and imperfectly represent. No newspaper will yet say openly, what is nevertheless perfectly true, that the monarchy has lost its hold, both on the English reason and imagination, and that its supports at this moment are simply the inexpediency of a change just now, and a sentimental attachmen. to the Queen, which is, however, commoner amongst the women than among the men. In fact, "loyalty" is extinct, at least in the class which now moulds public opinion, and the crown stands as an institution simply, which will have to justify its existence every yeart During the Queen's lifetime, we shall of course hear nothing of change, but the first appearance before the Utilitarians of a monarch whose favorite youthful occupations were skittles and listening to comic singing, will be an awful moment in the history of the British monarchy.

The condition of the working-classes, too, does not improve. The numbers of the desperate class—that great army of unfortunates who, having once dropped off the car of British industry, and lost home and friends and place in the world's work, swarm over the land as tramps and paupers, without the hope and often without the desire of recovery—grow apace; and there is a vague expectation of great relief and great changes from the Reform Parliament diffused through the country which reminds one of the expectations which preceded the meeting of the States General in 1789—all of them signs of social as well as political revolution. We might multiply them still further, if space permitted.

"DROPPED DEAD."

All royal strengths, in life, until the end
Will bear themselves still royally. Degrees
Of dying they know not: the muddy lees
They will not drink: no man shall see them bend
Or slacken in the storm: no man can lend
To them. Those feeble souls who crouch on knees
That fail, and cling to shadows of lost ease,
Death tortures. But, as kings to kings may send,
He challenges the strong.
Such death as this
O'ertakes great love: a lesser love will miss
Such stroke; may dwindle painfully away,
And fade, and simply cease to breathe, some day.
But great loves, to the last, have pulses red.
All great loves that have ever died, dropped dead.

H. H.

August 29, 1868.

CAMPAIGN SONGS.

What music there is in American souls is, we imagine, mostly in the souls of naturalized Americans. Shoddy does something to keep the opera alive among us—it cannot be said to flourish—but the German element in the population has to do more, and both together can keep it going regularly only in New York. Elsewhere in this country it leads only an intermittent and precarious existence. We suppose there is hardly any purely American community where there is tolerable music, vocal or instrumental. Longfellow's village blacksmith still, as of old, rejoices on Sundays in the church to hear his daughter's voice in the choir, but probably any lover of music would have to be somehow, paternally or otherwise, in love with some particular treble or contralto in "the singing seats" in order to be reminded of Saint Cecilia. Yet our "best holt" in music, as Mr. Nasby would say, was the singing in our village churches. All the indigenous vocal and instrumental ability in the country was gathered into the choirs. We were certainly a very chosen people in old times; but still, whatever person, renate or reprobate, had vocal gifts, it was usual to press into the service of the sanctuary. With "women who were singers" the deacons were apt to be stricter, but many are the bad men we have known who were joyfully permitted to make a cheerful noise of sacred song for the believers. The man must have been very far indeed from a saving faith who, if he was a desirable bass or tenor, was not made welcome to a place among the violins and bass-viols and other modern representatives of the shawm and sackbut and timbrel. But with all our efforts after such minstrelsy, we have had to fall back on hired performers; we have had to leave our congregations mute, and, without any compensatory advantage in the way of regeneracy, to let our praisings be done by quartettes.

Just as we fail in music we fail in poetry for music. Very few, indeed, are the American songs that are of the least value. There are three or four—such as Morris's "Woodman, Spare that Tree," and Woodworth's "Old Oaken Bucket"—that have been sung by other people besides ourselves. There is one that not only has been, but long will be so sung: Payne's "Home, Sweet Home" is sure of immortality among all English-speaking people. "John Brown's Body" is a great song, although for certain reasons it is sung by nobody but Northerners. If one thinks of the hero of it, of his life and his death and of what followed his death, this lyric has a peculiar power. Or do not think of these things; think only of what is given us by the song itself, and still the chief conception,

> "John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave,
> His soul is marching on,"

has grandeur, and must be spoken of as being among the great strokes of song literature. It is, we should say, the only good song produced by the North during the late war, and that is the same as calling it the only very good song produced in the whole country during the rebellion, productive as that was of verse. Mr. Grant White does not like it, but, if we recollect, it is the tune that he abuses rather than the poetry, as to which latter, indeed, his opinion would be less valuable. "Maryland, My Maryland," was certainly good for singing, but as poetry it has no existence. "Stonewall Jackson's Way," on the other hand, was not bad as poetry, and had for its chief fault the Southern fault of absurd and childish emphaticalness—but nobody, we suppose, ever thought of singing it. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe also wrote for the war a song or two which showed plainly how well she would have liked to write songs; but good as they were in a way—"Mine Eyes have seen the Glory of the Coming of the Lord," and 'Weave no more Silks, ye Lyons Looms," are eloquent, and rich in mouth filling, borrowed Hebrew imagery—they wanted something of being poetry and more of being songs. Everybody has heard them sung, or we should say they are unsingable. They will be unsingable, it is safe to say, and indeed we suppose they have already been sung for the last time and will not reach the next generation of singers.

We have now before us some thirty or forty of the campaign songs of this Presidential contest, which give melancholy proof of the truth of the view we have been taking of our American incapacity for song-making. It is pretty clear that we are not going to be indebted to this autumn for any valuable additions to our lyrical poetry. There is wonderful poverty of invention and lack of spirit in the collection. Miles O'Reilly, in his "Come fill your glasses, fellows!" comes nearer than any of his competitors to striking the true note; but, as in almost everything ever done by that stringer of rhymes, it is made evident that he was in great part a clever imitator of other men, and that he had not within himself anything of the reality or depth of feeling that belongs to the genuine singer. The levity and want of earnestness which enabled him to put on the likeness of this man and that man were his most useful qualities as a literary man. He was essentially one of those men of whom it is common to say that without their faults they would have done something great, but of whom it is truer to say that it is to their faults that all their success is due. Still, he was a man of some ingenuity, and no one of the mere mob of versifiers would have made the good hit in this stanza, though enough of them could have rung the stock changes on bumpers and chanting choruses and the defending of the right:

"So, boys! a final bumper,
While we all in chorus chant—
'For next President we nominate
Our own Ulysses Grant.'
And if asked what State he hails from,
This our sole reply shall be:
'From near Appomattox Court-House,
With its famous apple-tree.'

"For 'twas there to our Ulysses
That Lee gave up the fight;
Now, boys! 'To Grant for President,
And God defend the right!'"

Whittier, also, who appears as the author of one song, though unequal to himself, is far enough superior to the mass of the bards; but we with some shame admit that we have certainly heard nearly enough of that familiar Crisis, with which we were for the first time put face to face many years ago, when it was indeed impressive. And, without remorse or scruple of any kind, we admit ourselves sick of the device of mentioning two distant mountains or States or rivers for the purpose of expressing the width of "Freedom's area:"

"So doth the Freedom-lover go joyful on his way,
To wed Penobscot's waters to San Francisco's bay."

The martyrs, too, have become tiresome, and so have "Ebal over against Gerizim" and the "solemn lips of question." An impression of hollowness and mock ardor is got when the reader nowadays comes on those properties. Still, this is good verse:

"By all for which the martyrs bore their agony and shame:
By all the warning words of truth with which the prophets came;
By the future which awaits us; by all the hopes which cast
Their faint and trembling beams across the blackness of the past;
In the names of those who fighting for our country's freedom died;
O ye people! O my brothers! choose ye the righteous side."

But, generally, we get this kind of thing, which, if it meets with general acceptance among any people, would seem to argue bad things for such a people's lyrical ability:

"When we granted terms of peace,
Giving life and pardon, too,
We believed the South had had enough of war;
But the traitors march again,
Just as once they used to do,
'Neath the rebel 'flag that bears a single star.'
Chorus—Tramp, tramp, etc.

"Let us rally from the city,
From the mountain and the plain,
And united vote for Grant and Colfax, too,
So that all the world may see
That the country 's right again,
And is strong in spite of all that traitors do.
Chorus—Tramp, tramp, etc.

"When the White House changes hands,
And our General takes command,
And our marching days and nights are fully o'er,
We will lay our torches by,
And, uniting hand in hand,
Swear the Union shall be stronger than before.
Chorus—Tramp, tramp, tramp,
The Tanner 's marching,
Cheer up, Southern loyal men,
And beneath the Tanner's torch
You shall see the loyal North
Rout the Copperheads and rebels once again."

Throughout the Republican songs we find proof of the belief expressed in the one just quoted, that the political contest involves the same questions as the late military contest. A large majority of the poets are at one with the campaign orators on this point, and the words as well as the tunes of the campaign songs are generally those with which the war made us familiar.

The Democratic songs, also, are in perfect harmony with the speeches made on the Democratic stump. If Mr. Howell Cobb has any ability as a singer, there is little doubt, judging by his prose remarks to his audiences, that he would assist with much spirit in the rendition of the stave which we copy below. The author, Mr. William Hubbard, begins by saying that the times are rough, and that he intends to use rough words and rough music:

"Iron harp to iron word,"

as John Dorgan says, seems to him what the crisis demands — fair words, such as he says he could use, are now out of order:

"Rare vintage, which flows not for scullions to waste:"

he is to deal with felons, with creatures like Forney, and General Butler, and certain others who are specified:

"Such as Bingham—whose eye-balls are seared with the sight
Of a ghost if he ventured out alone in the night!
The ghost of a woman all saintly and white!

"Poor Mary Surratt!
Purer soul never sped
To yon heaven thro' the stars
Beaming lustrous o'erhead,
Than thine, whose frail body
Moulders now with the dead!
Than thine, who wast strangled,
And lain with the dead!
Rest! Rest!
With the martyred and blest!
Murdered mother! thy guiltlessness now is confessed!

"Such as Stevens—corroded with life-long remorse!
Whose sin-cankered heart has been long turned to gall—
For he sees, 'in his mind's eye,' the club-beaten corpse
Of a girl who for him gave up Heaven and all!

"Lured out to the brook-side—the night dark and dread—
'Slain by some one unknown'—so the coroner said—
But the terrible spectre comes back from the dead!

"And the tumble-bug, filth-monger, blaspheming Wade!
Boss-in-chief, for long years, of the wench-hugger's trade!
Obscene as the Hun in his midsummer ride,
Who used beefsteak for saddle and supper beside!
A low-down low fellow—low born and low bred!
With a fish-woman's tongue in a scallawag's head!

"And these, O my countrymen! these are the knaves
Who conspire to be masters when you shall be slaves."

This very well expresses the feelings of the average Northern Copperhead; of the Dayton and La Crosse sort of Democrat; of the men who have not the degree-of-latitude excuse for their degree of brutality, but can only plead the character of their parents and grandparents in extenuation of their peculiarly Southern sentiments and opinions.

Of the regular Southern Democratic state of mind we have two Southern metrical illustrations. The one which follows fits very finely with the late innocent remarks of General Lee to General Rosecrans. As in the general's letter so in Mrs. M. J. Preston's poem, we see how unfit the negro is to exercise political power. For unaffected simplicity, we do not know where, north of Maryland, any parallel could be found for Lee's epistle and his fellow-citizen's stanzas. By both of them one is reminded of the great multitude of Southern travellers who, since the war was over, have wandered through the once prosperous South, now marked by the traces of the Vandals who liked the American Union, and have seen the unkempt, deserted lawns where once sported a band of happy, merry slaves:

"It was a glorious thing, they said,
This freedom that they talked about—
This right to come and go without Question, or beck, or bar, instead
Of slavish cringing—as they said.

"I'm sure I have not found it so;
I 'd rather hear my master say:
'We cannot spare you, Tom, to-day;
Your work counts double, as you know,'
Ah! well—I own I liked it so!

. . . . . .

"You talk of 'suffrage.' Did the vote
I cast on Monday at the polls,
Like any white man, mend the holes
Worn in my old plantation coat?
I've got the suffering and the vote.

"My wife keeps crooning in my ear;
My ragged wild ones at my heels,
Rave of the merry cotton fields
And of the happy huskings' cheer;
And moan and murmuring fill my ear.

"Oh! for one hour of the old days!
When all the 'quarters' came at night,
To gossip in our cabin bright
And dance around the pine knots' blaze,
We 'll never, never know such days!

"Then all the cost and all the care
We left within our master's hand,
Without a wish to understand—
Believing the division fair—
Th' exemption ours, and his—the care."

. . . . . .

As for the South, it is enough, we suppose, to say that the South has never had any literature worthy of mention—unless one is comparing the compositions of one young ladies' seminary with those of another similar seminary—and that therefore, of course, it can have no song literature. To account for the Northern dearth of tolerable songs would be harder. The North has within living memory produced a great romancer—the writer of the "Marble Faun"—and an admirable satirist and creator of characters—as witness the "Biglow Papers;" and a writer who can think in prose about the conduct of this life and in verse of the life which is unlimited as not many men have done; and two or three historians who belong in the second rank of contemporary historians; and some orators who only need to work two or three times as hard when off the platform as they work when on it, to win the highest rank; a few excellent preachers and a good reviewer, and one or two statesmen of ability and two or three soldiers of the highest ability, and perhaps a hundred or two of the very cleverest men of business in the world. But in song-writing the North certainly does not shine; the South is nearly or quite equal to it.

We do not know that we should call it a thing to be regretted, so far, at any rate, as concerns political questions. "Tippecanoe and Tyler, too" was not a bad song as songs go, but it is as well, we dare say, to fill Maine full of speakers in 1868, to let Fessenden instruct her voters in finance, to carry the State for Governor Chamberlain after discussion and "a square fight," as it is to resolve a party into glee-clubs and to beguile the electors with song until the State should go as the song says in 1840, when > "She went, hell-bent,

> For Governor Kent,
> For Tippecanoe and Tyler, too,
> For Tippecanoe and Tyler, too," etc., etc.

It is, we imagine, because we have grown to be a less childish people than our fathers that we do not now depend to any very great extent on the charms of music in the business of electing a candidate. All the world generally in this century, and we Americans in particular, are a little ashamed to be caught singing, and for our part we suppose the shame is a wise one. Songs are, in a certain way, better than political speeches; but, after all, for assignable reasons, it is more cheering to see a people at work on political speeches than to see them at work on songs. A people that elects a man like Grant to the place of its leader, and does it not because he bore the sword but because he bore it in a certain way, may be allowed by the friend of humanity to grate pretty lean and harsh songs on pretty scrannel pipes.

Correspondence.

MORE ABOUT BONDS, GREENBACKS, AND GOLD.

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your issue of the 20th inst. I notice an article—"The Probable Solution of the Greenback Question"—in which it is assumed that the payment of the 5-20 bonds, in legal tenders, must necessarily be repudiation. In this view I do not entirely concur, and will state my reason for this opinion in brief. The readers of the Nation form a very intelligent portion of the community; so that it is unnecessary for me to enforce my argument at great length. Les gens habiles s'entendent à demi-mot.

To me, it appears that the principal difficulty in the question under discussion will be removed, if we accurately define what "payment in legal tenders" means. It may mean—

1st. Printing $1,500,000,000 of greenbacks, throwing them at the bondholders, and telling them instanter to go, that their claims are all discharged. In this sense of the word I readily admit that payment in legal tenders would be the worst kind of repudiation, and ought to be discountenanced by every honest man.

2d. There is another payment in paper, which is very different from this. If the volume of the legal tenders be not increased, and a balance remains in the Treasury after meeting the current expenses of the Government, this surplus represents a value, and, both legally and morally, is a proper payment for the 5-20 bonds. And if we collect fifty millions a year of revenue beyond what is actually required for the army, navy, and civil service, why not call in that amount of bonds, and pay them off? This, to me, is the whole gist of the matter. The bondholders certainly ought not to complain, because the value they would then receive would be greater than the value paid generally for 5-20s during the war. With specie at present prices they would receive a value equal to about $70 in gold for each $100 bond. During the war, less than this sum was usually paid for them. In June, 1864, they could be purchased for $40 in gold. In this particular case, is there any necessity for the people at large to pay fifteen per cent. interest on this gold for five years, and then return the principal, and $60 in addition? In my humble opinion there is not. If a return to gold payments be suddenly made, in the way contemplated in your article, a sudden change in values, as you admit, will certainly take place—a change which, of all things, ought to be deprecated.

I myself am a bondholder to a small amount, and present the foregoing in the interests of equity and justice. I have made this letter purposely short, and, as embodying the view of one individual, should like to see it printed in your journal, with any comments you see proper to make in the premises.

Yours respectfully,

Frederick Robinson, Br.-Captain U. S. A.

Barrancas Barracks, Pensacola Harbor, Fla., August 28, 1868.

[The first duty of the Government is, it seems to us, both as a matter of abstract morals and of economical expediency, to pay its overdue notes—viz., the greenbacks—or, which is the same thing, inspire the public with faith that it will pay them on demand. These notes are now, and have been for some time past, at a discount. Any surplus money the Government may have ought, therefore, to be devoted to taking them up. In other words, its duty is similar to that of a private debtor under similar circumstances. The bonds, on the other hand, are not due, and nobody is suffering wrongfully and undeservedly by their non-payment.

Secondly, the course our correspondent recommends would be tainted with fraud, inasmuch as, in following it, the Government would be forcing its creditors to accept as payment an amount in coin less than it agreed to give when it borrowed the money—supposing our view of the spirit of the contract to be correct. The plan of using surplus greenbacks to buy bonds in open market from persons willing to sell them is not open to this objection, but it is open to the former one—viz., that it would be a diversion of the surplus funds from their legitimate use; and to still another one, of less economical but fully as great moral weight—that it would be substantially the use by a debtor of his own damaged credit to effect an easy settlement of his obligations. A private individual who purposely refrained from paying his debts in order that his low commercial reputation might enable him to buy up his notes cheap would be looked on as a bad fellow. The moral complexion of such conduct is not changed by 20,000,000 joining in it.—Ed. Nation.]

To the Editor of the Nation:

It is generally useless to attempt to reply to a newspaper in its own columns, and the attempt to do so is the highest compliment in my power to pay to the candor and fairness with which your journal is conducted.

You refer to a decision of the Supreme Court against the constitutionality of greenbacks as a probable solution of the controversy, and of the question of the payment of the public debt. But what would be the effect upon our existing currency? If such a decision has any practical force, I suppose it is equivalent to a repeal of the Legal Tender Act, which measure has, indeed, been often urged as a means of resuming specie payments. That it would in one sense be effectual, there is no doubt; but the question is, would "the game be worth the candle?" Our currency, though depreciated, is available for business, because every man will take it, knowing that his neighbor must take it of him at par; and it is by this feature alone that it circulates. Now, there is not actual gold enough in the country to perform even a very small fraction of its business. Our total of currency is about $1,200,000,000, and the transactions at the New York Clearing-House last year were $28,000,000,000. If, then, the Legal Tender Act were repealed, paper must be used at its current value in gold. But who is to determine this? The national banks have $655,000,000 of loans, and owe about $600,000,000 of deposits. How would it be possible to decide at what rates these should be adjusted? Were it necessary at every step to discuss the price of money as well as of merchandise, the whole business of the country would be brought to a standstill, with an inestimable amount of distress and suffering.

If, on the other hand, the Legal Tender Act is maintained, it is useless to try to supersede our present currency. It is well established that the poorest and cheapest currency, if made legal tender, will always drive out every other.

The legalizing of gold contracts, from which so much is expected, would be of no avail for the resumption of specie payments. It would only be one of the many artificial expedients for postponing payment, and therefore accumulating debt in gold, and thus enhance the currency value of it in the future. In the present state of the world and commerce, it is impossible to dispense with a paper currency. The point to be ascertained is, what quantity can be kept afloat, consistent with its convertibility into specie? In the solution of this question lies our only hope of a return to specie payments.

G. B.

Boston, August 24, 1868.

[The publication of this letter has been unavoidably delayed.—Ed. Nation.]

To the Editor of the Nation:

Sir: In your paper of August 27 you say that in the fourth case put (the case of a debt contracted since the Legal Tender Act not specifying the kind of currency in which payment is to be made) the Supreme Court will probably decide that payment may be made in greenbacks, on the ground of the "intention of parties"—that being the notorious currency. Yet you say that such a decision will require the payment of the public debt in gold.

Is not there a mistake here? Was not the greater part of the debt contracted since the passage of the Legal Tender Act; and under the fourth point to be decided (if decided as you suppose), will it not be payable in the "notorious" currency? Of course, I merely mean so far as this decision is concerned, leaving the question as before. B.

LENOX, MASS., August 31, 1868.

[A decision of the Supreme Court would only determine the course of the Government, in the payment of its debts, as a matter of comity. The Government could cheat its creditors, if it pleased, in defiance of such a decision, but decency would require it to respect it. Our theory is, it always has been, that the intention of the parties to the contract under which the bonds were issued was that the bonds should be paid in gold, and therefore we do not well see what the difficulty is which puzzles our correspondent. The question is not one of time, but of animus.—ED. NATION.]

RECONSTRUCTION AT YALE COLLEGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

"A careful reader" of the letter signed "Academia" might discover not only that the writer loves his Alma Mater, as "E. L. H." kindly supposes, but also that he honors President Woolsey sincerely, notwithstanding the pleasantry concerning Baron Haussmann. The design of the letter was first, to point out that, under the present system of college government, the credit of improvements and the responsibility for mistakes must belong chiefly to the President; and secondly, to summon the promoters of questionable projects before the bar of public opinion. The letter of "E. L. H.," as far as pertinent, serves the latter purpose.

Academia did not discuss the motive of President Woolsey in desiring to cut loose from the State, but only the probable result. It is difficult to see how a corporation, consisting of eleven churchmen and eight statesmen, would be secured from clerical preponderance by throwing open six of the political places to general election, or how the graduates at large would gain sufficient influence in college affairs to arouse a genuine interest.

Nor did Academia suggest that money given to the college for certain buildings should be diverted to other purposes. He simply regretted that they should be so placed as to destroy the College Green, dear to many generations, and involve the demolition of the ancient row. "E. L. H." produces no estimate of the general expense of entire reconstruction over and above special endowments. Here it is the last step that costs, and it is a fair question how to direct future expenditure into the wisest channels.

The encomium of "E. L. H." on the present instructors (and he might have added the present library) is doubtless well deserved. As to the architecture of Alumni Hall, it is pleasant to learn that the romantic school disowns it. The classic school is above suspicion. Let us hope that the bantling is not the origin of a new species. ACADEMIA.

Notes.

LITERARY.

THE publishers announce nothing this week, and we have no additions to make to our previous lists. It is proper to mention here the formation of a new publishing house, which will have the firm-name of Allen Brothers. Mr. Henry S. Allen is known to the trade as having recently been a partner of Mr. G. W. Carleton. Mr. John K. Allen was formerly of Leavitt & Allen's house. The new firm will make the publication and sale of "juveniles" a specialty, and announce that they have in preparation new sets of such works by popular authors. They intend to keep in stock "a full line" of literature of this kind, both foreign and domestic.

—Among recent French publications worth owning are a reprint and a translation; the former the select works of Massillon, of which the first volume appeared in the first half of this year. It contains the "Advent," preached in the Royal Chapel at Versailles, 1699, and the "Grand Carême," 1701–4. They are models not only of pulpit eloquence, but of ministerial independence and fidelity. They fairly stunned the courtiers of the "grand monarch," whose decline had then begun, and even roused him for a moment to a sense of responsibility to his Creator, and, as he confessed, of his own unworthiness. The translation is of Pasquale Fiore's "New Public International Law according to the Needs of Modern Civilization (Nouveau Droit international public suivant les besoins de la civilisation moderne). The author is professor of international law at the University of Pisa, and the honor of being rendered into French is all the greater because it seldom befalls the Italian. Monsieur P. Pradier Todéré, an advocate and professor of public law at the Arminian College of Paris, who has already translated Grotius and Vattel, with annotations, performs the same service for Fiore, prefixing to the work an historical introduction, and following it with an analytical and alphabetical index (8vo. Paris: Auguste Durant et Pedone Lauriel). The translator says of the book that "it is not a didactic work, in which the rules and principles of the science of international law are dogmatically and methodically formulated, but it is a tableau of all the questions of the law of nations, considered from the point of view of modern progress, and judged by the author with rare independence." We learn also that M. Maurice Sand's ridiculous "Miss Mary" is to delude French young men yet unborn. It has been put into book form by Michel Lévy Frères. The same firm publish a translation of a work of Dickens's that we do not remember to have heard of—"L'Abime," a five-act drama. A work for Professor Child to watch for is this one, published by E. Maillet, "Le livre des cent ballades, contenant des conseils à un chevalier pour aimer loyalement et les réponses aux ballades, publié d'après trois manuscrits de la Bibliothèque impériale, et de la Bibliothèque de Bourgogne de Bruxelles, avec une introduction, des notes historiques et un glossaire; par le Marquis de Quaux de Saint-Hilaire."

—We find in an English paper some interesting extracts from Lord Canning's report on the post-office in 1855, contrasted with this year's report of the Postmaster-General, the Duke of Montrose. To the former we owe a number of facts relating to the history of the post. Charles I. was the virtual founder of the present system, and looked upon it, as he was wont, as a profitable monopoly for himself; and in his reign it was profitable, although the Parliamentary privilege of franking was then created, to be abolished only in this generation. The Postmaster-General dates from 1710. In 1683, Robert Murray, a London upholsterer, devised a city penny-post. Ralph Allen (1720) invented "cross-posts," and farmed them at a profit of £12,000 a year. Post-horses were superseded by mail-coaches only after a disheartening struggle on the part of Mr. John Palmer, a theatre-manager at Bath, who eventually obtained a Parliamentary grant of £50,000. At the time he proposed this change, in 1779, the post-boy was robbed by footpads of the whole northwestern mail—for Birmingham, Shrewsbury, Chester, etc.—which was packed up in a small leathern valise. The same mail now weighs about three tons. According to Macaulay, the entire revenue of the kingdom, on the accession of William III., fell short of the sum collected in pennies by the General Post-Office a few years after the death of William IV. Rowland Hill's innovation of penny-postage produced at first, as he anticipated, a falling off in the postal revenue; and, in fact, to restore the balance, fifteen years were required. Since 1855, the net profits have steadily risen, and last year amounted to £1,421,364. All branches of the department exhibit a corresponding gain. The Duke of Montrose reports an improvement also on the part of the public as to dropping unaddressed letters into the mail. Last year only 9,200 letters were so posted; in 1866, 10,400. Nothing is said of ill-directed letters, like that one (some years ago) which might as well have gone without an address, but nevertheless reached its destination—"Sromfridevi," Sir Humphrey Davy!

—The late Mr. Matthew James Higgins is the subject of an article—written with feeling, if not in other respects quite equal to the occasion—which appeared in a recent Pall Mall Gazette, the journal for which Mr. Higgins's latest things have been done. Little as he was known to Americans, Mr. Higgins was as well known to the London journalistic and club-room world as any of the Englishmen whose names are household words all over the earth. He was hardly by profession a writer for the press; he was a man of fortune, who in early life had held a commission in the army, but resigned it, and afterwards was to be described rather as a "gentleman," in the English sense of the word, and a man of society, than by any occupation that he had. But he was constantly writing, and at the time of his death there was probably nobody in England who could be considered his master, and not many who could be considered his equal, as regards making its proper use of the periodical press—that is to say, in so writing in papers and magazines as to make his fellow-men who read them think as he thought and share his feelings. So far as the newspaper is a substitute for the rostrum, and the journalist of modern times takes the place of the ancient orator and rhetor, there have been very few men who could have surpassed, and very few indeed who have surpassed, "Jacob Omnium" and "Civilian" and "Pater Familias" and "West Londoner" and "Belgravian Mother" and "Mother of Six" and "John Barleycorn" and "Providus." It was under these and other names that Mr. Higgins wrote to the Times his incisive letters on various subjects in the interests of the colonies. He had estates in Demerara; and he had some decided opinions in regard to the Colonial Office; on the proper management of the army—he had been an officer and knew the Horse Guards thoroughly well; on educational and other questions pertaining to social reform. He was a liberal-minded man, with a perfect hatred of tyranny, and an almost equal hatred of humbug in any form. To these he added other qualifications for his work. He was a master of "the art of putting things," and put them in the finished English of a very well educated man. He was a humorist, his school being the Thackerayan—which may be called the school that conceals sentiment under satire. Being a man of a practical turn—a man of affairs rather than one upon whom abstractions of any kind had a predominant influence, indifferentism, which is the easily besetting sin of satirical humorists, did not unfavorably affect his writing, and always he could be "earnest," so far as concerned the particular matter that he had it in hand to do or undo. He had, in a high degree, a form of the power which Carlyle has so much to say about—that of giving nicknames, which is a modification of the power to give names, which, again, if Emerson is to be believed, is the chief power of the poet. He could see, and describe in forcible, recollectable words, the essential characteristics of things. It is not hard to see how such a man, living in the thick of London life, might have made himself a great name as a writer on the London press. Making a name, however, was not one of Higgins's cares. He seems generally to have written much in the same way as his great countryman, Swift—for Mr. Higgins was an Irishman—who, as has been remarked, apparently used his pen not as an instrument for the carving of beautiful works, carved for the sake of their ideal beauty, or works carved that they might be monumental, but as a weapon when enemies were to be defeated and friends supported. That he was capable of using his pen as something more than a mere weapon, no one will doubt who has read what he wrote. To those who have not had that experience, it is enough—at least it is much—to say that Thackeray was a great admirer of his Both, says the Pall Mall Gazette, were contributors to the same magazine, writing tales and sketches and humorous pieces; and, one day, each applied, almost simultaneously, to the proprietor or editor to make him acquainted with the other—each being charmed with an anonymous article which the other had written. We ourselves are waiting till some one publishes, as some one should, a selection from Mr. Higgins's writings, before saying just how well he deserved the praise and admiration which Thackeray really gave him. But we find it said that "Jacob Omnium's" "London Horse-Dealer" is, in its way, no less perfect than Michael Angelo Titmarsh's "Pleaceman X." To show what power Mr. Higgins had, and how he used it, we may mention the famous Crawley case. Crawley was the colonel of the Sixth Dragoon Guards, a regiment which, in 1863 or thereabouts, was stationed in India. He was ill-tempered and tyrannical, and much of what comfort he got out of life consisted in quarrelling with every officer under him and in oppressing his men. A certain sergeant, Lilley by name, and a very obese man, incurred his displeasure, and Crawley, by way of punishment, had him shut up tight in a place in which, by reason of the great heat and want of fresh air, the sergeant very speedily died. There was a court-martial convened, and nothing was done to Crawley. Higgins was in a blaze of indignation. He began at once to give Crawley the full benefit of all his powers of invective, and it was not long before all England was demanding that Crawley—who, as Higgins put it, had baked an English soldier—should be brought home to be tried, instead of being left in India, where military trials do not often secure justice on colonels, and are apt simply to make a certain number of people accessories after the fact to any crime of authority committed by one of their own set. Crawley was, in consequence, ordered to England, and was tried at Aldershot. He was acquitted. The Times, in which Mr. Higgins had made his attacks, pursued, on this occasion, its usual policy. It demanded that the slanderers of Colonel Crawley—itself having been the chief slanderer—should stand forth and defend themselves. So much may be pardoned to the necessities of journalism. But the Times indulged itself in more than necessary meanness when Higgins, as one of the slanderers in question, stood forth and defended himself in a letter to the editor. His letter was reluctantly admitted, and was followed by a reply full of personal abuse. After this Mr. Higgins would never write for the Times, and, as we have said, the Pall Mall Gazette—a most able journal, and as pleasing, in general, as able—had the benefit of his talents for the last few years. At the time of his death he was about fifty-eight years old, and the father of a son and several daughters, by his wife, formerly a Mrs. Bennett, and the wife of Sir Henry Tichborne. By the way, the romantic case of the Sir Roger Tichborne, or pretended Sir Roger Tichborne, who not long since returned to England after he, or the man he simulates, had been supposed dead for several years, called out Mr. Higgins in full force, and some of his best writing, so far as we have seen it, was in denunciation of the young man who is still, we believe, endeavoring to make his claim good. Mr. Higgins's personal appearance was not less remarkable than his intellectual gifts and moral character. He was six feet and eight inches in height, and well made. They tell an amusing story of Thackeray and him. The two went to see a giant—the giant of a show. Thackeray, as they entered, pointed to his companion and whispered to the doorkeeper, "We are in the profession. But," as he used to add, with a laugh, when he had finished the story—and it is a characteristic addition—"we were not mean, and paid our shillings as we came out." Mr. Higgins's appearance, his stature and face and mental traits being considered, was tolerably well described, the Gazette thinks, by the name under which he passed, years ago, among the English at Rome—The Gentle Giant. He was far from being the cynic which he was thought to be by a host of people who knew him only by his lash—which it is probable was all about him that they had any right to know.

—The Spectator, in speaking of Mr. Higgins, remarks of him that he was an excellent specimen of the guerilla fighters of the press. That is, he never was editor or owner of a paper, and never had a regular engagement as a member of any paper's staff; but he did occasional work as seemed to him good; he was not a regular, and decidedly was not a non-combatant. It would be a subject worth enquiring into why we, here in America, have so few of these guerillas of the press. We do not know that we have more than one or two. We believe Mr. "Carl Benson" is almost sole. There are, to be sure, two or three people in every town who do regularly at irregular intervals send letters to editors of papers. But often—we may say usually—such people lack education, except of the rudimentary sort. They are not irregular troops; they are momentarily enraged peasants, undisciplined, who rise up, not against the enemy—that can hardly be said of them, if we know anything about them—but against whichever of the two armies has most recently caused them personally any inconvenience. Of these there is little to be said; they are of no service to any cause, and do not merit the respect of its antagonists. "Carl Benson," however, is a true guerilla, if to that term we give the meaning intended by the Spectator. He has a curious lack of humor; that, we believe, is the chief fault we find in him. Or, it would be better to say that some one or two of the principal faults we find in him—and a large number of his yearly letters in the papers—are, we should say, to be attributed to a deficient sense of humor. But he makes our very best newspaper guerilla, in the Spectator's sense. He is intelligent; he is well read; he is remarkably well educated, for this country; he is practised in writing; he is very well acquainted with what the public wants—that is, with what certain parts of it want—the Bloomingdale Road part of it, for instance, and the Fifth Avenue part of it. With the desires of the literary public and the social, whether in or out of New York City, he is particularly well acquainted. Then he is courageous, he is fond of writing, and he is skilful as a writer. This skilfulness is, to be sure, almost wholly thrown away. In our American journalism we do more bludgeon-work than rapier-work. When Mr. Greeley "sloshes round loose," as the boys used to say, and disposes of his enemies by beating in their heads with a heavy club, there is not much opportunity for a master of neater weapons. He wastes his skill upon the desert air; and this being so, of course he is not numerous, if we may be permitted to venture on the bull. "Carl Benson," with his foreign training and his natural disposition and natural abilities, prefers the small-sword to the cudgel or to the terrific basket-hilted broadsword which—on the stage—is appropriated to the noisy friend of virtue. Except him, we do not remember any American guerilla of the least pretensions to ability. The "Veteran Observer" of the Times, of whom some people may be thinking, constitutes no exception to this remark. Carl Benson does, to be sure, want a sense of humor, but to be scantily supplied with the logical faculty is a dreadful thing. It is certain, however, that in the "Veteran Observer's" case this fatal omission was made.

—English journalism has just sustained another great loss in the death of Mr. Douglas Cook, who has been the editor of the Saturday Review from its first establishment, and to whom that journal owes much of its success. It has been above all things independent, and it is said that when it was projected, and choice was to be made of an editor, Mr. Cook declined to undertake the editorship until it was agreed that he should be completely free as regarded its literary and political management. It is understood that in the interest of religious, or perhaps it would be better to say ecclesiastical, matters some reservations were made. From the beginning the paper has seemed to be entirely untrammelled, hampered by no limitations which its own nature did not impose, except when the Church was concerned. It seemed, for instance, that, in politics, the Saturday Review, when speaking of Mr. Bright, was entirely uninfluenced by the fact that Mr. Bright is spokesman for classes of English people that the Review would hate if it did not rather despise them; it seemed to be ignorant of the fact that Mr. Beresford Hope had been complimented by Mr. Disraeli for possessing "Batavian grace"—Mr. Hope being the owner of the Review, and being of Dutch descent, and not more graceful than the Hollanders proverbially are. It is hardly to be said that the Saturday Review is in love with justice, but in both these specified cases, and others like them, it was truer to justice than to its class or to its owner. As in politics, so in literature. In its treatment of literary topics it has been completely, or almost completely, regardless of the magnitude of the literary reputations with which it has had to deal; and has always been fearlessly and sometimes, to all appearance, wantonly destructive. It has shown as little mercy to weakness as to positive badness, and stupidity has always been sure of getting from it justice tempered with severity and contempt. Mr. Matthew Arnold, it will be remembered, takes occasion to express his gratitude for its warfare upon the British Philistine, and, as is not unusual with him, the point which it seemed good to him to remark upon was the essential point. We do not speak of the literary method of the paper, of its learning, and so on—these are well-known; but rather of its disposition, so to speak, and character. The traits of which we have spoken—an independence of parties, and cliques, and men—which often would have all the effect of an impartial and painstaking consideration of things as they essentially are—courage, a capacity for being disgusted by vulgarity in all its forms of conceit, and cant, and humbug—were in great part traits of the journal, because they belonged to the character of its editor. At any rate, they received fuller expression in the journal for the reason that they formed a part of the editor's character; the paper would, in any case, have been much the same in spirit as it has been in Mr. Cook's hands. The class in English society of which it has been the mouthpiece is high-spirited, indifferent, inclined to contempt of weakness and stupidity, and easily bored. The "social articles" for which the Review was famous, and in which this tone of mind found its best expression, seem to have been, in their present form, an invention of Mr. Cook's. This name was given to the essays on topics which contemporary social life furnished. They were, at first, better than now, when they often seem very perfunctory, and when, as of late, they have been worse than that. The articles on the woman question, for instance, that have been making so much sensation, have been of a cheap enough sort, and it is probably true, as is said, that Mr. Cook's long illness has had something to do with their appearance. He, to be sure, made his paper the organ of the men of the world, the men of society, the men of "university tone," and of not much else; but it was not, in his hands, merely that. This famous series of articles on woman have smartness, and insolence, and untruthful cynicism enough for the Guy Livingstone class of subscribers to what Thackeray used to call the Superfine Review; but its other and better readers must have thought that the worst qualities of the paper had got an unwonted ascendency.

Mr. Cook's relations with the literary world were not of an especially happy kind. He of course made a good many enemies, and we do not hear of his having many or very warm friends. He was, however, said to have been uncommonly kind to young writers. He knew very well the difficulty of making and keeping a staff of good writers, and wisely kept a sharp look-out for lieutenants. Of his own writing we hear nothing. He was certainly an extraordinarily good editor, so laborious that hard work killed him, never able to forget his paper, with a perfect understanding of his audience, of what they required; but although so enthusiastic and able a journalist, he seems to have never practised authorship himself. It is a curious thing about him that nobody appears to know anything of his "antecedents." For anything that is said on the subject, he might have been as destitute as Melchisedec of parentage, or college, or any early connections.

—In a late number of a Russian religious journal, the Orthodox Interlocutor, we find some interesting statements with regard to the circulation of Mohammedan books in Russia. At the end of the last century the Russian Government printed 3,000 copies of the Koran in Arabic, and distributed them among the Mohammedans. In 1800, a Tartar printing-office was opened in Kazan, connected with the gymnasium there, under the charge of a certain Burashef. In the first three years, 31,200 copies of Mohammedan religious books were printed. But Burashef published one book in which, in spite of the command of the mufti, he introduced some pages in favor of the Shiite sect—all the Mohammedans of Russia are Sunites. The book was burned in presence of the mullahs and officials, Burashef was dismissed, as also the censor. In 1828, the printing-press of the University of Kazan obtained Asiatic scrip type, so that there was a still greater issue of Mohammedan books. Between 1842 and 1852, this press issued 23,600 copies of the Koran, and 44,300 copies of the Seventh part, the Haftiak, besides many other books. Between 1855 and 1864, the same press has published 1,084,320 copies of various Mohammedan religious books. Other private printing-offices were also opened at Kazan by Tartars, and from 1853-59 they printed 82,500 copies of the Koran alone. They are still in activity, but statistics are wanting. These books are sold at the fairs, and also in the Crimea, the Caucasus, and throughout Central Asia. It is needless to say that the Orthodox Interlocutor bitterly deplores this state of things, and that religious freedom should exist so actively in Russia.

GERMAN AND OTHER UNIVERSITIES.*

On the 22d of last March the learned and loyal university of Bonn celebrated the birthday anniversary of the Prussian monarch, King William I. A prominent feature of the festivities on that occasion was an oration by Professor Heinrich von Sybel, in which he drew a comparison between "German and Foreign Universities," meaning by the latter the universities of France and England. Although the term university is applied in Germany, France, and England to designate the highest institutions of learning, it has in reality a widely different signification in each country. In France there are schools of law and schools of medicine; there are faculties of theology and faculties of belles-lettres; but there are no institutions which, like the German universities, include within their ample and elastic circle all departments of learning. The nearest approximation to a German university is found in the Sorbonne and the Collége de France, where different disciplines are united in the halls of the same institute. But even here the resemblance is purely exterior; a closer study reveals a marked difference with respect to the internal machinery as well as to "the living spirit in the wheels." In the first place, the Parisian professor throws his lecture-room open gratuitously to the public. He seldom knows anything of the intellectual character of his audience, what proportion are studious learners, critical scholars, or simply pleasure-seeking idlers, who are driven thither by stress of ennui rather than by love of knowledge, and are in pursuit of a new sensation instead of new information. It is also impossible for him to foretell what a day may bring forth; to-morrow may fill his benches with a fresh set of hearers wholly unprepared to appreciate a lecture which presupposes the least acquaintance with the discourse of the previous day. The consequence is that each lecture must be complete in itself, with exordium and peroration and the rhetorical piquancy necessary to attract and please an audience accustomed to highly-spiced literary condiments. Of course, when this elegantly-wrought superstructure rests upon a basis of thorough scholarship, independent research, and scientific method, the result is in every respect a masterpiece seldom or never met with in the university halls of England or Germany. But the danger is that the professor will be tempted to devote too much time and strength to the form, and not enough to the substance, of his discourse, and sacrifice strict truth and exact science to striking antitheses and brilliant but unwarranted generalizations. At best, he offers to his auditors only the conclusions of science, and does not show them the processes of scientific investigation. The student is never admitted to the intellectual laboratory where these results are wrought out; he carries away with him the finished product and the ultimate analysis, but does not learn the art of producing and analyzing. Thus the university ceases to be a school of science, and becomes an association of popular lecturers; the professorial chair is transformed into a rostrum. It is this tendency which M. Renan speaks of when he says that France is in peril of degenerating into a nation of orators and editors.

In England we find a system of academical instruction directly the reverse of that which exists in France. There the complaint is not that Oxford and Cambridge are too little, but rather that they are too exclusively schools. The colleges have overgrown the university, and the pedagogue has supplanted the professor, who now rarely delivers more than a dozen lectures a year. The instruction proper is given by tutors in the colleges, and differs very little in aim and method from that which is imparted to the Primaner of a German gymnasium. In both cases the leading purpose is not to train the student for a practical calling in life or to make him thoroughly proficient in any special branch of knowledge, but to form and discipline his general powers, and to give him accuracy and ease of thought and expression; in fact, as we have said, the same end is sought to be attained by the collegiate stage of English and the gymnastic stage of German education, the former being, perhaps, more broadly conceived and more richly developed, in proportion to the maturer age and culture of the Oxford or Cambridge student. In both cases the pupils live together as members of the institution under a more or less rigid surveillance, and shape their studies in accordance with a prescribed programme, which in England is limited usually to the ancient languages, mathematics, a little history (principally of antiquity), certain general reflections called philosophy, and for future clergymen a slight tinge of theology; in Germany the gymnastic curriculum is more exclusively philological, and includes French and English, and sometimes a very elementary knowledge of Hebrew. In both cases, too, the instruction, instead of seeking the broader channel of the lecture, is almost wholly colloquial, and has for its object to drill and train the mind by holding it firmly in a given course with the reins of authority instead of inciting it to independent excursions. According to Professor Sybel, the great superiority of the German university consists in the harmonious union of instruction and investigation which it offers. It is not, like the Sorbonne and the Collége de France, a mere vehicle of learned communication with the cultivated classes of society, a means of making known to the public the latest bulletins from the world of science, literature, and art; nor does it, like Oxford and Cambridge, aim chiefly to impart instruction for the sake of mental discipline. The German university is, in the highest sense, an intellectual laboratory, a place where the young man, whose faculties have been already developed by a preparatory course of gymnastic training, can learn how to work scientifically by the concentration of his powers upon some special task. Hence the division of the university into departments—law, theology, philology, philosophy, medicine, history, art, literature, social and political economy, the natural sciences, etc. One of these departments (it matters not which) the student must choose, and under the liberal guidance and inspiration of teachers who are themselves "the organs of an autonomic scientific spirit," seek to become absolute master in it. Those who were once his law-givers are now only his peers in academic culture. There is at least one realm of thought where he feels firm ground under his feet, and yields supremacy to no man. This consciousness of intellectual independence is a possession of inestimable worth. He who has attained it has won the highest prize in the gift of a university. He may not, in the course of six or eight semesters, have become a walking encyclopædia of erudition; such a result would not be desirable even if it were possible. But he knows what "knowing" means, and is competent to grapple intelligently with whatever problems may be presented to him. The general character of his previous gymnastic training prevents the student from becoming narrow and one-sided by this concentration of his mind upon a special task. On the contrary, the complete mastery of the chosen science necessarily involves a knowledge of the relations which it bears to all other sciences. The several departments of a university are like those gigantic groups of trees that are sometimes seen in our forests. The tops are distinct and isolated, and stretch in opposite directions with apparently no connection. But if we follow any one trunk to its origin we come in contact with all the others, and find that they spring from a common root. The thorough solution of a problem of jurisprudence inevitably touches questions of history, psychology, politics, and even theology and medicine; and the same holds true of every other branch of science.

* "Die deutschen und die auswärtigen Universitäten. Von Heinrich v. Sybel." Bonn: Cohen und Sohn. 1868. Pp. 35.

Professor Sybel gives utterance to the same complaint that is so often heard falling from the lips of educators in America, namely, that the number of subjects to be taught has grown out of all proportion to the time allotted to teaching them. The minimum period of study in a North German university is a triennium, or, in a few departments (as medicine, for example), a quadrennium. This regulation was made more than a hundred years ago, and amply met the educational demands of that day. But the rapid growth of modern science has long since rendered the term of six or eight semesters wholly inadequate. Intellectual strength, and that gift of sedentary endurance which our Teutonic friends quaintly call Sitzfleisch, are not greater in a young man of the nineteenth than they were in his progenitor of the eighteenth century; but the task assigned him is indefinitely greater. The curricula of the university, instead of being enlarged to suit the development of new sciences, have been simply distended with them. The result is a deterioration of scholarship either into superficiality on the one hand or narrowness on the other. Of these two evils the latter is the more frequent. The student is obliged to devote more and more of the triennium to Brodstudien, as well as to lighten his labors by the pernicious arts of cribbing and cramming. This tendency exists the world over. It is the same fatal goal of sciolism, whether it be reached on an American "pony," in an English "coach," or with a heavy pair of Teutonic "oxen." As a remedy for this evil Professor Sybel proposes to extend the time of study to five years. Such a reform, however, would almost double the cost of an education, and would inevitably exclude a very large and intelligent portion of the population from an academic career. To obviate this difficulty our author thinks it the duty of the state to furnish the necessary funds by a liberal system of stipends and prizes to be awarded to those who give promise of deriving most profit from a prolongation of study. Such an arrangement is admirable in theory; but we fear that unless managed with unprecedented circumspection and wisdom it would practically degenerate into an unmitigated evil. In the United States scholarships, stipends, and competitive prizes are falling more and more into disrepute; and "we speak that we do know, and testify of that which we have seen," in affirming that at least sixty per cent. of the money contributed by the various educational societies for the support of their beneficiaries is worse than wasted. To take the hoe or the chisel from the hands of a dull youth and replace them by the fine-edged implements of the scholar, which can be of no value to him, is the cruellest kindness to the individual and an irreparable wrong to society.

The second remedy proposed by Professor Sybel is the re-establishment of the mediæval bursæ or commons, in such a manner as to provide for the support of the students en pension, and yet not sacrifice the principle of academic freedom. This change was suggested some years ago by the distinguished Professor Döllinger, and was to some extent carried into operation at Munich by the late king, Maximilian II. We do not believe, however, that the project has met with such brilliant success as to encourage other universities to follow the example. There is also latent in a scheme of this kind the danger of the German universities thereby losing the integrity of their organization, and gradually dissolving into colleges (bursæ), as did the French and English universities during the thirteenth century. There is a third remedy, or at least alleviation of the evil, which we are surprised that Professor Sybel should have entirely overlooked. We refer to the vast amount of time squandered by the German student in the servile habit of Nachschreiben, or taking notes and afterwards painfully studying from his manuscript what could be much more easily learned from a book. It is not uncommon for a professor to rehearse in his lecture-room semester after semester what he has already published, without offering to his eager hearers a thought or even a word beyond the contents of the printed volume. And yet the learners are expected to be as industrious with their pens as were the mediæval monks before the age of Guttenberg. In fact the art of printing seems to be utterly ignored. Goethe saw this evil and satirized it in the ironical advice which Mephistopheles gives to the Schüler:

"Fünf Stunden habt ihr jeden Tag;
Seyd drinnen mit dem Glockenschlag!
Habt euch vorher wohl präparirt,
Paragraphos wohl einstudirt,
Damit ihr nachher besser seht,
Dass er nichts sagt, als was im Buche steht;
Doch euch des Schreibens ja befleisst
Als dictirt' euch der heil'ge Geist!"

The complete suppression of this abuse (by university statute, if necessary) would in itself be equivalent to a year's prolongation of the period of study. We agree, however, with Professor Sybel as to the necessity of a still further extension of time. The chief difficulty is the want of money. "A small German university," says M. Renan, "with its unwieldy professors and hungry tutors does more for science than all the pompous wealth of Oxford." But German institutions of learning would be still more efficient if they had at least a small percentage of those enormous endowments. It is estimated that the superfluity of income which Oxford receives, and is exceedingly embarrassed to know what to do with, would support six German universities; and the sums which the English university appropriates every year to stipends, prizes, etc., exceed the whole annual income of Bonn. German universities are almost exclusively creations of the state, and exist only as pensioners of the government. Bonn has recently received a small donation from a private citizen; but instances of this kind are of extremely rare occurrence. Under petty bureaucratic governments, whose chief anxiety was to keep their subjects well in leading-strings, the growth of that vigorous public spirit which gave rise to the magnificent foundations and endowments of the English colleges was not to be expected. But since Germany has joined the family of great nations, we trust a new impulse will be given to the public mind in this direction, and that private liberality will supplement governmental patronage in fostering her universities.

EFFECTS OF SOLDIERING ON CHARACTER AND PHYSIQUE.*

THE important work whose title we give below is divided into three sections. The third treats exclusively of the Federal prisoners in Southern prisons, and is, in fact, the official report of a Confederate surgeon. The second is devoted to special pathology. The first consists of contributions to general pathology, and will prove most interesting to the unprofessional reader. It is also, on this account, the section which may most properly be noticed in this journal, and we shall, accordingly, with one or two exceptions, confine ourselves to it.

In the opening chapter, Dr. Robert Bartholow discusses the military capacity of the various races that composed the Federal armies. These were: the American, Celtic, Teutonic, Negro, and Spanish-American, classified in the order of their value as soldiers. Physically, the first two were about on a par, the American being distinguished for the toughness of his muscular fibre, but being also liable to defective digestion. Morally, he excelled the Irish in tenacity of purpose, in what the writer calls "mental hardihood," in zeal, energy, power of endurance, and in subordination. The latter always shirked fatigue duties when they could, preferring the perils of battle, and their malingering—that is to say, their feigning sickness—generally took the shape of "sun-stroke" and "pain in the back," with a view to avoiding those duties. The American malingerer, on the other hand, who was generally a married man separated from his family for the first time, and who wanted to escape the service, pretended to have either some affection of the respiratory organs, or else diarrhœa, dyspepsia, heart-disease, etc. The German was structurally deficient, with an excess of the lymphatic temperament, weakness of the abdomen, flatness of the feet, and "a tendency to a varicose condition of the inferior extremities." He could ill abide scant rations, hardships, or exposure. "Chronic rheumatism" was his pretence when he sought admittance to the hospital or a final discharge, and he was oftener found malingering than either the Americans or the Irish. The negro, to many admirable qualifications for the service, united ill-developed calves and bad feet, and an undeniable proneness to pulmonary complaints. While the general proportion of deaths by disease to deaths by wounds was, in the white ranks, as two to one—the smallest ratio probably ever exhibited in a prolonged war—among the colored troops it was as eight to one. Nevertheless, as contrasted with the poor white refugees who were affected at the same time with diseases of the lungs, they exhibited a smaller mortality and a greater recuperative power. It has been commonly reported, and we suppose correctly, that the blacks, when attacked by any malady, seemed to have none of the elasticity of mind which is so potent in effecting a recovery, but passively submitted to their fate and threw all the burden of their cure upon the physician. From this fact—which may, nevertheless, have been exaggerated—doubtless arose the opinion among surgeons, alluded to by Dr. Ira Russell, p. 332, "that it is no use to 'doctor' a sick negro; that he will die, do what you may." Against this, Dr. Russell enters a decided protest, and states in a foot-note:

"I had the care of 700 wounded negro soldiers after the battle of Nashville, and I never saw wounds do better—there was much less gangrene and pyæmia than among the wounded white soldiers. It is true, however, that the colored wounded were treated and retained near the battle-field, while the whites were transported, first to Nashville, and then to Louisville and further north."

Even healthy lungs in the negro, according to the same authority, weighed, on an average, four ounces less than in the white man, and part of the former's inability to endure forced marches with equal facility with the latter is attributed to this circumstance. That it was not wholly due to the bad feet instanced by Dr. Bartholow would appear from the record (furnished by Surgeon Hunt, pp. 106, 107) of a march under the most favorable conditions for soundness of lungs and invigorating respiration. This was from Fort Gibson, in the Cherokee nation, to Prior's Creek, a distance of forty-two miles. It was performed without straggling by 1,200 black soldiers (1st Kansas C. I.)—of whom a large proportion had reached the fort with blistered feet and worn-out shoes from rocky, mountain travelling—in seventeen hours, making part of a march of seventy-eight miles in less than forty-eight hours. Next morning there were but four men sick.

The previous condition of servitude must be allowed to account for a good deal of the sickness to which the black soldiers succumbed, and for their malingering, in which they are said to have surpassed the whites. Always the ignorant and degraded are unaccustomed to sanitary precautions, and any one who has had to do with black regiments, even when wholly or in part recruited from the North, can testify that their imprudence in regard to diet especially was very great. The same class, whether black or white, are naturally malingerers, amongst whom, says Dr. Bartholow, "it was not common to see a well-educated man," though one of the most expert that came under his observation was a Michigan school-teacher. "As a general rule, it may be affirmed that men will feign disease in the army who are guilty of similar deceptions in civil pursuits." And they were commonly men of bilious or nervous temperaments, rarely sanguine.

"The physical qualities which fit the American for military service consist not so much in . . . . height," says Dr. Bartholow, p. 4. On page 47 Dr. Phelps tells of the 10th Wisconsin Regiment, "full to the maximum, with generally very tall and athletic men," which held its own very well while it stayed in camp; "but the march [upon Nashville] that proved a stimulant to the health of my own regiment had the opposite effect upon it. Its largest men fell out of ranks by platoons, and I believe that it never did recover its proportionate strength, as compared with other regiments, where the size of the men was not above medium." Wisconsin is one of the States which had the highest battle mortality, and a nearly correspondingly high death-rate from disease. Thus, New England's battle ratio is 44·76; while Iowa shows 45·44; Michigan, 44·82; and Wisconsin, 42·01; with a ratio for death from disease of 70·45, 114·02, 97·01, and 76·86 respectively. Not much can be predicated as to bravery from the first-mentioned figures, though it was true in the Army of the Potomac, and we dare say elsewhere, certainly at times, that regiments which had again and again been decimated, were still assigned the post of honor. We have in mind a certain Massachusetts regiment, which in this way suffered frightful losses among its officers after their command had been so reduced that their own number and rank became almost ridiculous. But Dr. Dunster's explanation is not without weight, that this northern tier of States, both Eastern and Western, being secure from invasion, its troops could be spared for the most advanced service, and were not required for garrison duty. Then, too, considering that New Orleans must be taken by sea, and that General Butler was placed at the head of the expedition, it is easy to account for the transfer of New England troops to the Gulf, and once there, the difference in climate could not fail to promote losses by disease in a high degree. The middle States, whose volunteers were chiefly confined to the Army of the Potomac, exhibit the lowest rates of both species. "Virginia was not only a healthier field of service than the South and Southwest, but it is very generally admitted that the Army of the Potomac was the best provided for of all our large armies." Its mortality, and that of the other troops on the Atlantic coast, was 33·40 per 1,000 of mean strength; of the armies operating in the interior, on the Mississippi and its tributaries, 82·19 per 1,000—a difference largely due to climate, but also to the difficulty of forwarding supplies, to the lime-water which prevailed, and to the malarial districts which the Western armies were forced to occupy. Kansas alone has a record for battle losses which, perhaps, must be referred not to superior bravery, but to the martial disposition of her people, which, in turn, is to be referred to her previous history as a territory. Nowhere in this volume do we find an attempt to compare the soldiers of the East and West point by point, nor further than we have just done. Surgeon Hunt alludes (p. 104) to "the superior marching qualities of the Western soldiers as compared with the untrained Eastern soldiers," and attributes them to "the greater recklessness, or, to use a more descriptive phrase, Bohemianism," of the former. "Accustomed to roughing it, to indulging in the sports of the chase, and to vicissitudes of life which are rarely encountered in the thickly settled and orderly East," they were "more available for immediate action," but in the end not more pertinacious.

The two sections cannot, therefore, it would appear, be considered as standing in the same relation to each other as that in which the country stands to the city—a relation which is one of the most interesting and surprising developments, we will not say of this book, but of the war. Dr. Bartholow, speaking, we are afraid, à priori and with too much generalization in this instance, says (p. 6):

"The influence of occupation upon the physical health is obvious enough. Those who pursue sedentary trades, who live much in-doors, or who are exposed in the course of their business and pursuits to crowd-poisoning, or to vitiated air from any cause, are by no means so well fitted for military service as those whose employments require them to spend much time in the open air, especially in the open air of the country. Hence, farmers, lumbermen, and railroad men are better prepared to endure the hardships of a soldier's life than clerks, weavers, shoemakers, etc."

In support of such a statement, or rather theory, there might well have been tables showing the previous occupation of every man who entered the hospitals, or at least who died there from disease or was discharged for inability contracted in the service. But no such statistics are given, and we presume none were collected. In the absence of them there will be many whose observations of country and city populations will not accord with Dr. Bartholow's "obvious" deductions. In the first place, the healthfulness of most cities is now conceded to be quite equal to that of the rural districts; drainage and the removal of offal are better provided for, more attention is given to personal cleanliness, and medical service is both better in quality and more accessible in the former than in the latter. The aversion of country people to walking even short distances is well known, while, with never so great a desire, out-of-door walking would be impracticable during from three to six months of the year, according to latitude. To spend the winter and spring in the country, is, perhaps, the greatest hardship which a townsman can undergo. It is the season of terrific overheating and underheating of the ordinary farm-house, with the most trying extremes of temperature and an utter want, or else a great irregularity, of ventilation; in either case sufficient to derange a constitution not already inured to it, and certainly not beneficial to any constitution. The sleeping-chambers are generally small and immediately under the roof, deficient in air, and with windows of which the upper half is often fixed, while the lower has to be kept open by a stick, or other clumsy contrivance. The table—which in all poetical descriptions of the country is made, after "pure air," the most wholesome feature of farm life, being often typified by "glorious bread and milk"—is precisely the weak point of country living. With the exception of milk, there is perhaps no single article of the farmer's diet which cannot be procured of as good quality in the city, and is not far more certain of being cooked as it ought to be Bread is a striking instance of this assertion, though the ingredients may be purest in the country. Then, too, the necessity which is felt of cooking only on certain days, induces the preparation of such sorts of food as will "keep" longest—such as pies and pickles and cakes of various kinds—while fresh meat being not easy to obtain, salt meat, especially salt pork, takes its place. One result, and a natural one, is great sameness of diet. The farmer's "three square meals" daily will almost surely consist of fried pork swimming in fat, sauce and preserves, bad bread, bad coffee, cold pie, pickles, and ginger-bread—for breakfast, dinner, and supper, of course—with a sprinkling of vegetables in their season. That dyspepsia is more common in the country than in the city we would not affirm; it is a disease which is not, so far as we have noticed, compatible with constant exercise in the open air, even when part of the day is spent in a vitiated atmosphere, as is the case with the day-laborers in cities. (It was a very rare disease in the army.) But this may hold true of the women, and we are inclined to believe that the digestion of the men "laisse à désirer." At least, dyspepsia ought to result from a gross, profuse diet, and a farmer's appetite—that is to say, the appetite of fatigue. What we know is, that to cure this and other ailments, the country people resort to drugs to a fearful extent, and it may almost be said that patent medicines are the only things worth advertising in country newspapers.

* "Contributions relating to the Causation and Prevention of Disease, and to Camp Diseases; together with a Report of the Diseases, etc., among the Prisoners at Andersonville, Ga. Edited by Austin Flint, M.D." New York: Published for the U. S. Sanitary Commission, by Hurd & Houghton. 1867. Pp. xviii., 667.

One of the very first experiences of the war was, in a case of which we had cognizance, that the clerks, students, and other young fellows of good families, who composed a pet Boston regiment and were sent, along with some country recruits, to garrison one of the harbor forts, adapted themselves to the situation much more readily and philosophically than their comrades, who certainly had not enjoyed a tenth part as much ease and luxury at home as had they. Half a dozen surgeons, including one Confederate, testify in this volume to the same effect (pp. 100–103). "Farmers or countrymen," says Surgeon Bailhache, "are particularly liable to break down." "Men raised in towns and cities," says Surgeon Stevenson, "are more cosmopolitan in habit, thought, and feeling, and they were much less subject to home-sickness." "Even those of sedentary occupations from the cities," says Surgeon Heise, "were better able to bear these vicissitudes [of camp life] than laboring men of rude health from agricultural districts." And Surgeon Clark even goes so far as to say that "young men of previous irregular habits coming from cities or towns endured the hardships of service better than farmers who apparently had a better physical organization." Finally, on the Confederate side, "the volunteers from cities and towns, the mechanics, clerks, storekeepers, professional men, etc., bore exposure in the field better than farmers, day-laborers, or even woodsmen;" and one of the reasons assigned is worth quoting: the former "have generally passed through the usual infantile diseases which are so prevalent in camp." The spread and fatality of the measles, as recorded in these pages, give great weight to this suggestion.

The topic is one on which we might enlarge indefinitely, so many sides has it; but we must forbear. Let it be remarked, in conclusion, that in these revelations we find compensation for the indisputable evils of that concentrated life in cities to which we, in common with the rest of the civilized world, are tending steadily and rapidly. Most consoling of all is the proof that culture, instead of weakening, fortifies the physical man—a lesson which the lives and adventures of many savans have taught us, but which needs repeating so long as culture is a monopoly, or is decried as effeminate.

Fine Arts.

THE FINE ARTS OF JAPAN.

V.

From demigods and fiends to imaginary monsters of no superhuman character the transition is easy. From priests and their teachings to jugglers and their tricks is not a step of magnitude at all startling to the student of Japanese art. His difficulty will be to decide at what point the step is taken. Ghosts and apparitions are of greater dignity than the grotesque monsters we are going on to describe, but it is hard to judge, in all cases, which of these the Japanese believe in, as matters of course and as parts of their scheme of religion, and which of them are only the dreams and whims of over-fertile and unchecked design. What, for instance, are we to make of this incident? A stern-looking man is leaning out of a huge black cloud, and, with a long cord and a vessel like a canteen, is dipping up water from the ocean below him, all with just the action of the sailors who draw buckets of salt water over the ship's side of a morning to wash down the decks. This occurs in a book by the artist Boun Tujo, of whom we have spoken before. The book is a mere collection of patterns intended for reproduction as ornament upon porcelain and lacquer-ware pipes, etc., and contains familiar subjects for the most part. But among them we find the cloud-borne dragon of the higher mythology, magnificently fierce, rendered in a style worthy of Oksai himself; the god of agriculture several times in different attitudes, and several curious feathered and winged genii of a kind we have not before alluded to, though they are common in the works of Oksai and elsewhere. All this, one might say, is unquestionably mythological. As Napoleon said that a throne cannot exist without nobility, so it is safe to say that the dii majores need, to support their authority, whole hierarchies of demigods, nymphs and heroes, Nereids and Fauns, or their equivalents in Japanese. But we have to consider next some winged beings, like men except for their wings, and what seem to be jackets of feathers, who have noses of portentous length. One of them, with his nose pointed straight upward, has a top spinning upon the end of it, a foot above his head. He and they all are merely grotesque, and rather contemptible creatures, but they are wonderfully like the savage-looking winged Afrites whom we have just pronounced superhuman, and akin to the celestials. So there are creatures having the likeness of beasts and birds which seem to partake of the dignity of the immortals, even as did Pegasus and Sphinx, and, in a certain sense, the Griffins. The main idea in those Greek forms is the union of two natures in one creature; not the patching of a part of one creature upon another, as in the mermaid, which remains a sly woman with nothing fishy about her except her exterior; not as in the centaur, where the poorly conceived body with its double set of organs is matched by the incongruity of giving to it a fully human and even (as in the case of Chiron) a superior human mind. The griffin is eagle and lion, or less often eagle and horse, in one, with the noble and characteristic qualities of each, and the dignity of both. The sphinx, the cat or lion with woman's breasts and head, is a weighty and significant allegory, as the harpy is in all probability, though it is doubtful if modern enquirers have quite understood the harpy. Now, the Japanese offer us no equivalent of these two human-headed creatures, but we find a superb griffin. The word is a misnomer in this instance, for there is no eagle or vulture or other hook-beaked bird nature (γρυψ) about him; he is a winged horse, with a well imagined reptile head, as if studied from a crocodile, but not quite a crocodile's head either. He has split hoofs, which is curious, and perhaps intended to take him out of the equine family more decidedly; the ridgy and flexile backbone, lying close under the skin, with the vertebræ within count, seems intended to carry with it the reptile life of the head; except that it sounds like an impossible result, we should say that the creature was truly bi-formed of horse and serpent. We have this beast in the pictures, and freely and well modelled in high relief upon a splendid bronze; and in the round, a full statue—also in bronze, and most delicately finished with the tool—with open jaws, through which incense smoke pours out. Another creature we know only as a callow nestling, who, at maturity, must be a griffin in the true sense of the word. We have him carved in ivory, just emerging from the broken egg-shell. His head is not bird-like, except for the immense hooked beak; the body is covered with short feathers, and the wings are strong and large; the claws are not unlike those of a crab. We hope to meet with this spirited beast in his full development, if indeed he is a tradition, and not a temporary fancy of the forgotten carver long ago.

We can only touch upon a few of the many points of interest in this wide subject, and we pass now to the consideration of jugglery, some of which would be very respectable magic. Here again it is hard to draw the line. Can it be believed that the Japanese are so generally informed in the physical sciences that all these marvels pass for mere dexterity and skilful application of natural causes? The Japanese jugglers in Europe and here have shown us no wizardry beyond a very few simple sleight-of-hand tricks; nine-tenths of their practice was tumbling and posturing and feats of manual dexterity, and what real jugglery there was made us all laugh, it was so slight and transparent. But here, in one of the Oksai books, and alternating with pictures which are of unmistakably mythological subjects, we have the Japanese thaumaturgist, in picture after picture, performing unexampled feats. In one he sits quietly holding a wand, or perhaps only his closed fan, and with no visible apparatus or accessories; but he is suddenly multiplied by five, the simulacrum of his head and shoulders, four times repeated, comes into sight from empty space, and the five figures are undistinguishable. Another performance may partly explain the above; in this second one a chafing-dish is set upon a stand, and from it arises a transparent vapor; the juggler inclines his head to one side so that it shall be seen through the vapor, and it is seen magnified about five diameters. Is there a smoke known to science which has this magnifying power? Is there any similar way in which a vibratory effect can be produced, giving the deceptive appearance of four or five objects where only one exists? At all events these feats are different from ordinary Oriental jugglery, and argue considerable scientific knowledge, while they are among a host of more common performances, and seem not to be associated with religious mysteries.

Among other tricks we find the venerable East Indian quick-growing plant, which in a few minutes grows from the seed to perfect development. A dozen sheets of paper thrown up into the air are shown turning to birds and flying away. A wizard fishes with rod and line in a small cup set upon an open stand, and catches therefrom a fish many times larger than the cup. Another clenches his hands together, and, shaking them, great volumes of water are showered in spray from between his fingers. Another magician verifies the Afrite of the Arabian Nights, and comes rushing out of a little flask or bottle, taking solid form as he ascends. And the supernatural power of the monkey fiend who breathes out hosts of pigmies, is rivalled by a magician who spurts out of his mouth a vapor which takes the form of a horse and gallops furiously off.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

| Authors. | Publishers.—Prices. | |
|---|---|---|
| Angell (J. K.) and Durfee (T.), Treatise on the Law of Highways | (Little, Brown & Co.) | $6 00 |
| Borel (E.), Grammaire Française | (Leypoldt & Holt) | 1 75 |
| Bulwer Lytton (Sir E.), The Disowned | (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) | 1 50 |
| Cavé (Mme. M. E.), Drawing without a Master | (G. P. Putnam & Son) | 1 00 |
| Cox (Rev. G. W.), Manual of Mythology | (Leypoldt & Holt) | 1 00 |
| Kail (C. F.) and Delitzsch (F.), The Twelve Minor Prophets, 2 vols. | (Chas. Scribner & Co.) | |
| Müller (Dr. J.), The Christian Doctrine of Sin, 2 vols | (Chas. Scribner & Co.) | |
| Smeaton (Rev. G.), Doctrine of the Atonement | (Chas. Scribner & Co.) | |
| Storer (Dr. H. R.) and Heard (F. F.), Criminal Abortion | (Little, Brown & Co.) | 2 25 |
| The Sabbath, swd | (M. Thalmessinger) | |

ON MAX MÜLLER'S SYSTEM.

A MANUAL OF MYTHOLOGY.

IN THE FORM OF QUESTION AND ANSWER.

By Rev. G. W. Cox, M. A.

16mo, illustrated, $1.

(From Professor Max Müller's Chips from a German Workshop.)

. . . "He has chosen the most important, the most instructive, and the most attractive portions of his subject. . . . He has given to some of his sketches more life and expression than can be found in many a lengthy article contributed to cyclopædias and other works of reference. . . . He has made room for what is an entirely new feature in his Manual—namely, the explanations of Greek and Roman myths, supplied by the researches of comparative mythologists. . . . That these researches, so well summed up in Mr. Cox's 'Manual of Mythology,' are in the main tending in the right direction, is, we believe, admitted by all whose opinion on such matters carries much weight."

(From the Spectator.)

. . . "A bold attempt in the right direction, and Mr. Cox deserves the best thanks of educational reformers."

(From the Saturday Review.)

"In a former article we did our best to warn schoolmasters, governesses, and conscientious mothers against 'Hort's Manual of Mythology.' We are glad that after telling them what to avoid, we can likewise tell them what to choose. Mr. Cox's 'Manual of Mythology' is the work of a scholar thoroughly familiar with the sources of classical mythology. . . . That he is able to sympathize with the ancient stories of Greece, and to repeat them with truthfulness and vividness; nay, with the warmth of a poet, he has amply proved. . . . It does Mr. Cox the greatest credit that in his 'Manual of Mythology' he has availed himself so fully of all the new light which the researches of comparative mythologists have shed on the sacred traditions of Greece and Rome."

Our catalogue will be sent post-paid to any one who applies.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, New York.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WHO BREAKS PAYS."

A PSYCHE OF TO-DAY.

Cloth, $1 25. Copies by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

LEYPOLDT & HOLT,
451 Broome Street, New York.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.

BY JOHN BARTLETT.

FIFTH EDITION (SEVENTEENTH THOUSAND).

Revised and greatly enlarged.

16mo, vellum cloth, $3.

The last edition has been enlarged by the addition of over fifty per cent. of new matter, and the Index alone now occupies a hundred and sixty pages of fine type.

"This work, itself become almost a household word, was born of thorough and conscientious painstaking, joined, of course, to good scholarship."—N. Y. Nation.

"It is, emphatically, one of those volumes which we like to have near at hand—a book for consultation and for reference."—Boston Advertiser.

"In fulness, accuracy, and general completeness, it is altogether a most excellent and convenient work."—The Chicagoan.

"It has taken its place among the standard books of our literature."—Rochester Democrat.

"To the student, writer, and intelligent reader this very interesting and enjoyable book needs no commendation."—N. Y. Home Journal.

"One of the most valuable books of reference in our language."—S. Austin Allibone.

For sale by all Booksellers.

Sent post-paid by mail, on receipt of the price, by the publishers,

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
BOSTON.

L. W. SCHMIDT,

GERMAN BOOKSELLER,

24 Barclay Street, New York,

Imports regularly all the leading Foreign Publications, including Periodicals.

Foreign works noticed in the Nation kept constantly on hand or procured to order.

Educational Books

PUBLISHED BY

G. P. PUTNAM & SON.

I.

FAY'S GREAT OUTLINE OF GEOGRAPHY FOR HIGH SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES. The text-book in 12mo; the Atlas in large folio. Retail price, $3 75; library edition, in cloth, $4 25. Liberal terms for schools. Teachers supplied with a copy for examination at half price.

Senator Charles Sumner writes: "It is a great success—I keep it near me for instruction and pleasure."

II.

ELEMENTS OF GEOLOGY, for the Use of Students. By Samuel St. John, Professor of Chemistry in the College of Physicians and Surgeons. Twelfth thousand. Illustrated. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

III.

CHADBOURNE'S NATURAL THEOLOGY. By Prof. P. A. Chadbourne, President of the Massachusetts Agricultural College. Fine edition, on tinted paper. 1 vol. crown 8vo, price $2; cheaper edition for students, $1 75. In use in Yale, Williams, Amherst, and other Colleges.

IV.

A MANUAL OF POLITICAL ECONOMY. By E. Peshine Smith. 12mo, cloth, $1 50.

V.

A NEW SYSTEM OF DRAWING, FOR STUDENTS.

DRAWING WITHOUT A MASTER. From the French of Madame E. Cavé. 12mo, cloth, $1.

"This is the only method of drawing which really teaches anything. In publishing the remarkable treatise in which she unfolds, with surpassing interest, the result of her observations upon the teaching of drawing, and the ingenious methods she applies, Madame Cavé . . . . renders invaluable service to all who have marked out for themselves a career of art."—Extract from a long review in the Revue des Deux Mondes.

VI.

THE WORLD'S PROGRESS. A Dictionary of Dates. A new edition, continued to 1867. 8vo, cloth, $3 50; half calf, $5.

"It is absolutely essential to the desk of every merchant and the table of every student and professional man."—Christian Inquirer.

VII.

HAYDN'S DICTIONARY OF DATES, relating to all Ages and Nations, for Universal Reference. The new English edition by Benjamin Vincent. To which is added an AMERICAN SUPPLEMENT, containing about 200 additional pages, including American Topics and a copious Biographical Index, by G. P. Putnam, A.M. In one very large volume of more than 1,000 pages, price $8 50; half calf, $10 50.

Sent post-paid on receipt of price by

G. P. PUTNAM & SON,
661 Broadway, New York.

Care Mr J. C. Clowes
Cor. Devonshire & Frankfort

The Nation.

VOL. VII.—NO. 168. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1868. { FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM. TWELVE CENTS PER COPY.

THE WEEK ..... 221

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Some Indirect Issues of the Campaign. 224
Reconstruction as it Stands ..... 225
Our Danger from the Good Crops .... 226
The Abolition of Feudal Tenure in Venetia ..... 227

NOTES:
Literary ..... 229
The Life of Bunsen ..... 231
MacCarthy's Translations of Calderon. 233
Jean Macé's Books for Children ..... 234
The Moonstone.—The Works of William Shakespeare ..... 235
Our Branch and its Tributaries ..... 236
Books of the Week ..... 236

Terms:—Five Dollars per annum, in advance; Clergymen, Four Dollars.

The NATION is sent till positively ordered discontinued, and all arrears have been paid. Subscribers are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from the office.

GEORGE STREET, 30 CORNHILL, LONDON, E. C., AGENT FOR THE RECEIPT OF SUBSCRIPTIONS AND ADVERTISEMENTS.

ADDRESS, PUBLISHER OF "THE NATION," BOX 6732, NEW YORK.

The Week.

Two months ago the Democrats were going to carry Maine. One month ago they were going to reduce last year's Republican majority of eleven or twelve thousand. But this week, the expression of public opinion at the polls being the very fullest ever had in the State, the Republicans carry it by a majority almost equal to the heaviest majorities that were given when we were all full of the excitement of the war. Probably there never was anywhere in the country so hot a political canvass. How high the feeling ran may be seen in the fact that political rioting—a very rare thing in New England—was not uncommon in the last days before election, and on election day, when, to be sure, the Democrats had some excuse in their disappointment. Probably there are not five hundred able-bodied men in Maine who have not attended several political meetings since the middle of August; speeches have been made wherever a hundred men could be got together, and some of it has been extraordinarily good speaking; there was no end to the processionizing, button-holing, and "work" generally. As the Boston Post remarked, the men of Maine "have lately heard the great political and financial issues of the day discussed by able men of both parties." Fessenden, Wilson, and Pendleton put the financial issues as plainly before the people as it is possible to put them, and the political issue—that stated by Blair—was the theme of dozens of orators in every town. The result shows, to borrow from the Post again, that the people of Maine "are not blinded by prejudice or enslaved by party ties," and have had no difficulty in "deciding what is their present duty to themselves and the country at large." It was a model American political contest—plenty of frank discussion and intelligent comprehension of the questions involved, at least a sufficiency of enthusiasm, and, at the end, a peaceable submission to the result. The effect of this election will be great. We suppose it makes Pennsylvania safe for the Republicans in October; and though the loss of that State then would not injure Grant, the carrying it would make the November election a mere formality.

---

"All along the line," as the party press says, "the boys are hard at it." Whatever may have been the case in the early parts of the campaign, there is no apathy now among the Republicans. Even in this city the leaders have met and consulted, and there is peace between "The Twenty-third Street Gang" and the extreme Radicals, so that the Republican vote will be cast solid for every candidate from Grant down to assemblyman. Democrats no longer talk of carrying the State by fifty or seventy thousand majority; indeed, New York may fairly be looked on as at least doubtful. We believe it most probable that Grant will carry it against Seymour, and Hoffman against Griswold, though some enthusiastic Republicans deny that Griswold is to be beaten—which is what they would not have dared to do three weeks ago. Mr. Hoffman has thought it advisable to go stumping, and makes the regular Democratic speech—"the annual expenses of the Freedmen's Bureau are $11,000,000," etc., etc.—but probably his tour affects his chances favorably. In Pennsylvania, the Republicans are in good heart, and refuse to-day to make the admissions which they were ready to make a short time since. Mr. Forney estimates the Republican majority at 30,000, but it is never easy to rest in perfect confidence on his figures. However, the nominations have been more carefully attended to this year than they were last, when a commendable disgust kept some Philadelphia Republicans from the polls; when Judge Sharswood, more respected than his antagonist, was a very strong candidate for the Democracy; and when, after all, the Democratic majority was less than a thousand. There is a summons out, we see, for "a grand mass convention of soldiers and sailors," to be held in Philadelphia a week or ten days before that city is called on to vote—a device of some value. Pennsylvania must yet be set down as a doubtful State, but as being, on the whole, a good deal more likely to go Republican in October than to go Democratic, but it will be as well to wait till November for a majority of the size of thirty thousand. Ohio, a week ago, looked so un-Democratic that Mr. Pendleton would not "stump" in Illinois, and the wise General McClernand has let out the reason—a performance which probably will prevent his being Chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of that State another year. There is really no doubt about Ohio, and Indiana also is sure for the Republicans both in October and November, in spite of its neighborhood to Kentucky, superfluously abounding in Democrats, and in spite of its absurd law to allow votes to residents of only twenty days' standing. In the East, we have seen how the canvass was conducted in Maine. Massachusetts has been holding a large convention, which was very enthusiastic, but in Massachusetts hard work is never necessary—for the present generation of Republicans at least. The State was made Republican some hundreds of years ago. In the only New England State where there is any need of work—now that Maine has voted—it is hardly worth while to do anything yet; Connecticut will probably vote as Pennsylvania does. On the whole, the prospect is excellent for the Republicans.

---

The Massachusetts Convention did not exactly allow General Butler to capture it, as his friends would like to have believed, but it made a good deal too much of him and suffered him to make a good deal too much of himself, and he must have gone back to Gloucester a happier man than he has been since the beginning of the impeachment trial. Despite the disgust of certain of the delegates, General Butler's audacity—and, we suppose, that tendency in men to do, as a crowd, things that they would be ashamed to do singly—secured for him, after all that he has said and done, the endorsement, not formal, but too efficacious, we fear, of some twelve hundred of the leading citizens of the State of Massachusetts. The Massachusetts Republicans are a little merciless on their brethren in other States, where it is necessary to be more careful as to the weight of odium which can be borne without diminishing the chance of winning. A "repudiation of the repudiator," to use Mr. Fessenden's words, by the party in Massachusetts would have been worth many votes to it in Pennsylvania, where it needs all the votes it can get. That is, perhaps, looking at the matter from a point of view somewhat dangerously near the one Mr. Butler would take in a similar case; yet not so very near either, if we consider what reasons might be alleged for not supporting a party in which Mr. Butler has been a leader, and is by some people still thought to be one. However, the mischief is done, we suppose. There is a disposition to think that enough has been done when he has been made to hold his tongue about the bonds. As if we were to be much obliged to General Butler for leave to be decently honest! Probably there is little hope that he will not be nominated and returned to Congress, though it seems as if there ought to be some men in the Fifth Massachusetts district of influence enough and courage enough to prevent the disgrace of his continuing to represent a Massachusetts district. A courageous and unsparing attack on him might be effective. Governor Andrew was certainly a great loss to the State. Since his Worcester experiences, General Butler has been making a speech at Lowell, a ready-witted harangue, full of vigor, of wit, of effrontery, of balancings between truth and falsehood, and as clever as his speeches usually are. In his Worcester speech, as well as in the Lowell one, he shunned talk about repudiation; but that may have been because he would not commit himself, and not out of fear. There are going to be national temptations to dishonesty after next November, and after the November after that, and it is possible that the voice of the charmer will again be heard and will be listened to more willingly.

---

The speech which contrasted most forcibly we will not say with General Butler's speech, but with his appearance at the Convention, was that of Mr. Edward Atkinson, who put in a very clear and serviceable shape the facts furnished him by Commissioner Wells in regard to the financial conduct of the Government since the war. Our readers can scarcely have failed to read Mr. Atkinson's statement, so widely has it been circulated already, being the best of campaign documents, and proving that Mr. Seymour was never more mistaken than when he assumed that the Republican party wanted to shirk the financial issue. Mr. Butler may conceal his sentiments on this point when he finds it prudent to do so, but he is alone in so doing. Mr. Atkinson boldly took the bull by the horns; showed the public debt to have been larger at the close of the war than it had been represented by the Treasury, which made no account of outstanding liabilities; analyzed these liabilities, and proved that they were legitimate and unavoidable expenses, outlasting the war; and then confronted the real debt of April 1, 1865, with the present debt, or $3,287,733,329 with $2,485,000,000. In three years, therefore—"three years of quasi peace," as Mr. Atkinson truly observed—more than 800 millions of the debt have been discharged, in spite of the grave defects in our first attempt at direct taxation. Then follows an estimate of the ordinary expenditures, over and above the war expenditures, of the Government during three years and three months, but including the expenses of an Indian war, and also $10,000,000 for internal improvements. These amounted to $92,000,000 a year, while the last fiscal year under Buchanan's administration, and prior to the war, cost the nation $107,577,400. Such were the principal statistics exhibited by Mr. Atkinson, together with some apt remarks on the mode and prospect of cancelling the debt and returning to specie payments. The case seems to us now wholly closed against the Democrats. Mr. Seymour had his usual luck as an adviser when he urged his editorial friends to keep up a constant attack on the Republican party on the score of its financial management. As for the Democrats, they are able to make nothing of the speech. Their ablest journal has talked of it in an almost laughably futile way. Certainly as a party they have never attacked or defended themselves with less spirit and precision—point for point—than now. The omen is unmistakable.

---

As the secret history of the late Democratic Convention is more fully made known, that body more and more puts on the likeness of a creature of the older and worse days of our politics, the days when we used to call men statesmen because they quoted the Declaration of Independence in the balcony and went back into the committee-room and gerrymandered a State. Very much of the business of the Convention was done, it appears, by Mr. Montgomery Blair, who is in all essential respects an excellent specimen of the sort of statesmen we have mentioned. He is the representative and the ablest member of a family which has always, on pretence of serving the public, devoted itself to practical politics—practical politics as distinguished from the service of the public. He really is behind his brother, whom it is certain he would manage if the Vice-Presidency or the Presidency should come into the family, just as he has managed him in the matter of the Brodhead letter, which, no doubt, was intended to fire the Southern heart. Unfortunately for the Blairs—who are usually sharp enough to cut their own fingers, and who, since Jackson's time, have been good intriguers with bad luck as to their intrigues—the Brodhead letter has fired the Northern heart as well. However, it helped to get General Blair the nomination for the Vice-Presidency. But, as now appears, it was not considered safe to trust to that alone; the record of other prominent candidates was examined into and was laid before the delegates from the South. General Hancock, Mr. Montgomery Blair took pains to inform them, once issued an order urging the negroes of Maryland to aid the pursuers of Booth, who had murdered Lincoln, the general said, because of his friendship for the negroes. General Robert Ewing also was made the subject of a communication from Mr. Blair to the Southern delegates. They were reminded that in Missouri, in 1863, he ordered out of his lines all disloyal people resident within them. This, of course, "killed" him.

---

A letter is published that was written by Grant to his father in April, 1863, during the campaign against Vicksburg. It is longer than any speech the General ever made, and, without disparagement to the speeches, is likely to be more effective than any of them. The letter is full of the man, and shows, as plainly as anything of his that we have ever seen, how far removed his quietness is from that afflicting stolidity charged upon him by the tremulously sensitive Democrats:

> "It is painful to me, as a matter of course," the General says, "to see the course pursued by some of the papers. But there is no one less disturbed by them than myself. I have never sought a large command, and have no ambitious ends to accomplish. Were it not for the very natural desire of proving myself equal to anything expected of me, and the evidence my removal would afford that I was not thought equal to it, I would gladly accept a less responsible position. I have no desire to be an object of envy or jealousy, nor to have this war continue. I want, and will do my part toward it, to put down the rebellion in the shortest possible time, without expecting or desiring any other recognition than a quiet approval of my course."

Evidently the criticisms had touched him, and evidently they had not turned him. Justice has hardly ever been done at all—it certainly is not popularly done—to this very remarkable part of Grant's life. We must remember he was then a comparatively obscure man; he was fighting in an unknown and most difficult country; his most trusted military friend and coadjutor, Sherman, had very strongly expostulated with him as to the plan of campaign which he had resolved upon, and, when the expostulation did not shake Grant's purpose, had written out and tendered his resignation; Mr. Lincoln had written to him to tell him he was mistaken in his strategy—and that meant that all Mr. Lincoln's military advisers thought him mistaken, and that the commander-in-chief gave him a chance to withdraw his army before it should become necessary to remove him from command; the press was raving about his manifest incompetency. But he made no reply to the letter, for writing which Mr. Lincoln afterwards apologized; he put Sherman's resignation in his pocket, without forwarding it, and afterwards, when Vicksburg was taken, gave it back to him—it is Sherman who tells the story—he made no public justification of himself till he telegraphed that Pemberton had surrendered; and but for this letter to his father—which, by the way, he requested his father to burn—we should hardly know of his magnificent exercise of moral courage and how much it cost him. We are curious to see the men who, as members of Grant's cabinet, are going to make him a mere tool and puppet.

---

From the South there is nothing new. The Georgia Legislature has finished its high-handed proceedings in reference to the colored members by expelling the two negro Senators. A resolution has been introduced, and may be passed, declaring negroes ineligible to all offices. This would remove the question from the narrow ground on which it might now be safely placed—the right of a legislature to prescribe the qualifications of its own members—and would open its way, by bare possibility, to such a collision as might justify the interposition of the Federal forces. But, as the case stands, where is there any remedy? The supineness and coldness of some among the Republican members were what enabled the attack on the negroes to be successful. Some of the so-called carpet-baggers voted as they did in order to ingratiate themselves with the whites; of the so-called scallawags, some voted as they did from the same reason, and some doubtless from conviction. The State is now Democratic. There is this consolation, however: she has vividly illustrated Blair's Brodhead letter; and we fear the colored Democrats of the South must have felt a weakening of the knees when they tried to reconcile the news from Georgia with their recollections of the last barbecue at which they assisted. Louisiana has had her great Republican torchlight procession, and it passed off without the bloody riot that was anticipated. By order the Democrats stayed away from the club-rooms and remained at their homes. The streets were left to the police, the soldiers, and the procession, and the maligned New Orleans Democracy can proudly point to its good behavior, and call on the country to applaud its perfect justice to the blacks. The Texas Convention has adjourned without doing anything of importance, and will not be again heard of until winter. The Carolinas, Virginia, Florida, and Mississippi are quiet, and so is Alabama. In Tennessee General Thomas is to have more troops—as many more as he may deem necessary—and the peace is to be preserved. It is one of the not very numerous acts of Mr. Johnson's administration for which he may be unreservedly praised, so far as is apparent on the surface. To keep the peace by means of Federal troops is infinitely better than calling out the militia, which would have been much the same thing as calling out also the 40,000 rebels that Forrest talks of. As we suppose, Mr. Johnson has saved Tennessee from civil war.

---

If we did not know of its success elsewhere, co-operation would seem to be peculiarly adapted to the needs of the English people. The Rochdale Pioneers, besides setting an original example which is being more or less widely copied in other countries, are still undoubtedly the most signal instance of what can be accomplished by the co-operative system. With the exception of 1862, when distress prevailed in the cotton districts because of our war, every year since 1844 has witnessed an increase in membership, funds, business, and profits, until the accumulated power of the society is marvellous to behold. The material object in founding the Pioneers was to supply food and clothing to the members, and the extension given to their operations has been chiefly in that direction; but there is a cotton manufacturing society with fair prospects, and some recent experiments in building cottages have proved that an excellent profit can be derived from this source also. In short, with the exception of banking, there is perhaps no business which the Pioneers and, by inference, other co-operators, do not seem competent to undertake. One very natural outgrowth of the various societies in England has proved of enormous value to them. This is the Co-operatives' Wholesale Society, of Manchester, whose shares are held by the societies themselves, and which furnish them groceries and provisions at wholesale. Last year it sold goods to the value of over a million of dollars, with a profit of upwards of ten thousand dollars. At Leipzig, on the 24th of August, was held the tenth annual convention of the German co-operative societies. The veteran Schultze-Delitzsch, for whom the convention testified its respect by rising to pass a vote of thanks, read a report on the progress of co-operation in Germany in 1867. The number of societies has now reached 1,707, or, if all could be accurately counted, probably 2,000. People's banks and provident societies flourish best; but thus far the productive associations, owing to the prejudices of certain classes of operatives, have not been successful. The abolition of imprisonment for debt will do much hereafter for the co-operative movement. Italy, which is far behind France and Germany in this respect, is nevertheless beginning to sympathize with its neighbors. Before 1860, with the exception of Piedmont, there were no provident or co-operative institutions in Italy; but now, under the lead of Prof. Luzzati, and, in Venetia, of Alberto Errera, an interest is awakening which we may hope will do much to elevate the people of the peninsula.

The official report on the result of the French loan, which has been made by M. Magne, proves it to have been a great success. The sum subscribed for is more than three thousand million dollars, while only about one hundred millions were required. The result proves two things: one, that whatever want of confidence there may be in the duration of the dynasty, there is none whatever in the continued ability and willingness of the French Government to pay its debts; the other is the enormous quantity of small savings in France, and the eagerness of the owners for a safe investment, at a low rate of interest, in preference to any commercial venture. In fact, in spite of the great material prosperity of France, and the really rapid growth of large manufacturing interests, it is believed by the best observers of French society that the mercantile timidity of Frenchmen increases, and that, in fact, the spirit of adventure, whether as manifested in emigration or trade, is declining more and more—a result which is ascribed with a good show of reason no less to the system of education pursued in the "Lycées," than to the intense centralization of the Government. France, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, bid fair to be the great colonial power of the world, and had rovers in every sea and on every shore; but now she is represented abroad in the field of commercial adventure by hucksters and cooks, and in the field of military adventure by nobody. The desperadoes and filibusters and buccaneers of our day are all English and Americans. The young Frenchman who thirsts for "moving incidents" seeks them in the army or navy, under the articles of war.

---

The Italian Senate having, with great unanimity, confirmed the action of the Deputies in regard to the tobacco monopoly, the Opposition have been forced to console themselves, during the recess, with rumors of a change of cabinet and of a dissolution of Parliament. Nothing, however, is less likely, after the excellent success of the Menabrea-Digny ministry in procuring a working majority for the Government, and in at last diverting the members from dreams and vagaries to the solid business of the country. The long years and stormy discipline needed to obtain this result are a guaranty that the Government will not rashly, by ordering fresh elections, revive the spouting and enthusiasm to which Italy was so lately, as it seemed, hopelessly wedded. In fact, the sure support which the King and his ministry have acquired in the Parliament, coupled with the successful treaty with the Pope in regard to the Pontifical debt, is one of the strongest arguments in favor of the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome. The press, following the official lead of the Government, are calling for the evacuation of Rome, as the anniversary of the last occupation approaches. Their tone, though moderate and reasonable, suggests a feeling of the precarious situation in which France now stands, and the need she will have of all her forces in the event of a war with Germany. Italy has no intention of then serving as a back-door for a French army of invasion. Since our correspondent's letter, which appears in another part of our paper, was written, word comes that the Senate adjourned without discussing the law for the abolition of feudal tenure, so the contending parties have time to adjust their differences.

---

The other topic of the Italian papers is the everlasting Lamarmora controversy, which has emerged from the stage of anonymous warfare into open conflict with pamphlets between Lamarmora and Cialdini. The ripples of this local disturbance, as we have before noted, extended to Berlin, extorting an official disclaimer of Count Usedom's now celebrated letter of instructions—a disclaimer afterwards qualified, and all the more rendered suspicious and untrustworthy. This procedure, which, of course, was in the nature of a sop to Austria, is said to have given great offence to Bismark, and to have caused a coolness between him and the King, to the advantage of the Tory party, as shown by the retirement of the popular General Falkenstein, and the putting of General Manteuffel in his place. Bismark's recent fall from his horse has again been the means of proving how anxiously the people regard him as the mainstay of German affairs, and the leader into the still waters of perfect unity.

SOME INDIRECT ISSUES OF THE CAMPAIGN.

It is perfectly natural and perfectly proper that the sentimental aspect of the Presidential campaign—that is, the repulsiveness and indecency of the reappearance in the field, as political leaders and moulders of public opinion, of the most prominent secessionist chiefs—should exercise a large influence in the canvass. It is due to the memory of the men who fell in the war, and is required by the arguments on which the North defended its course in carrying on the war, that Forrest and Wade Hampton and Cobb, and their like, should have no further say in the national politics. We do not know what mental and moral culture may yet accomplish, but it is quite certain that the mass of men are as yet incapable of hating evil as something distinct from the person who commits evil. There are, we admit, some rare natures which are capable of separating the sinner from his sin, and loving the one while hating the other; but if you mean to keep the moral perceptions of the great majority at all sharp, you have not only to teach them to detest murder but look with dislike on the murderer. If the day should ever come when criminals, after a proper course of medico-moral treatment in jail, are taken out and received back into the community as if they had done nothing, however harmless the treatment may be as regards the criminals, society will most assuredly come to look more lightly on the crime. There is, and always has been, something preposterous in talking as much as we have all done, and still do, about "the guilt of the rebellion," while acting towards the men who got it up and carried it on as if they were simply persons who had been foolish enough to differ from us in opinion. Arguments against Seymour and Blair, therefore, drawn from the character and antecedents of their leading Southern supporters, are perfectly legitimate, and very strong ones. The North ought to vote against anybody who brings these Southern gentlemen into the field again.

But then, we regret to say, the number of people who are influenced by considerations of this sort is comparatively small. The habit of letting criminals off easy, and of "not feeling hardly" towards anybody, no matter what he has done, has made good progress within a few years. It is becoming increasingly difficult to get criminals prosecuted, unless it clearly appears that it will "pay," in a material sense, to do so. After a thief has given up his plunder, or told where he has put it, or has spent it beyond the possibility of recovery, there is an increasing indisposition to prosecute him, or, if convicted, to keep him in jail. In other words, the idea that there is a moral order in the world, against which a cheat or humbug or murderer offends, and for offending against which he ought to be punished, even if he has done no damage to anybody, or the damage he has done be irreparable, has grown faint, and is getting fainter. Of the force of this tendency we have had a striking illustration within the last week in the case of General Rosecrans, who, during the rebellion, wrote letters in which he painted the moral character of its leaders in the darkest colors, but who, within the last few days, has addressed a cluster of these leaders in terms which are usually reserved for philanthropists or statesmen, when, weary of well-doing, they have retired from busy life with the applause of mankind.

On a very large class of persons, both Republicans and Democrats, therefore, the consideration of what will happen in case a Democratic administration should come into power is more likely to prove effective than the consideration of the repulsiveness of the Democratic leaders and the bad record of the party. To be sure, this is constantly urged, but mostly in general terms. We know it will endanger the public credit, for instance; but then, Congress may, if it will, save the public credit from both Seymour and Blair; and we know it will encourage the Southerners to protract their resistance to the Reconstruction Acts, and thus delay indefinitely the return of perfect peace. But the delaying of reconstruction is to a great many people a very vague term. The immense and overwhelming importance of getting Southern members back into Congress, and the wild pæans of delight which some Republican papers raised as the members from each State made their appearance there, have begotten an impression that, when once the formal relations of the States with the Union are restored, the work of reconstruction is complete. But it is not. Why it is not, the events of every day in the reconstructed States show clearly.

The failure, therefore, of the States to qualify under the Reconstruction Acts for formal, technical readmission to the Union, though no doubt it would be most unfortunate if it were to occur, would not be nearly so unfortunate as something which may still occur, and which the election of Seymour will assuredly bring about—and that is the prolongation, for an indefinite period, of the state of things at the South which everybody is now deploring: not the crimes and outrages, but the depraved public opinion which looks on the crimes and outrages lightly, or as legitimate modes of expressing political discontent, and which leads a whole community of civilized and nominally Christian men to throw obstacles, in the manner described by General Meade in his report on the Ashburn affair, in the way of bringing midnight assassins of a helpless, unarmed man to justice. The Ashburn murderers, it must be remembered, were not drawn from the dregs of the population, and they have been and are screened by a large body of "the best people at the South," morally and religiously as well as socially. We have grown so accustomed to the perpetration of crimes of this character at the South by respectable men, in the old slavery days, on the plea of public safety, that nine-tenths of us have ceased to feel the depth of the degradation which such occurrences as General Meade describes indicate. But it is none the less true that a society which has reached the point of recognizing assassination as a legitimate weapon of political warfare—and not assassination of a "tyrant" either, but of any man who stands in the way of what the majority considers its rights—is rotting fast, and can only be saved by heroic treatment. Barbarians may assassinate, and, nevertheless, may be improving rapidly; because men's moral condition must, after all, be judged rather by the extent to which they fall short of their own standard of perfection than of ours. But when a church-going community, in the United States, looks on the murder of an obnoxious politician in bed as a pardonable mode of getting rid of him, it has fallen below the Malays. Now the triumph of Seymour would be a deliberate affirmation, by a majority of the Northern people, that this state of public feeling is, on the whole, not very alarming, not very reprehensible, and that a whole cityful of Baptists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists, with Sunday-schools, Bible societies, missionary societies in full blast, may aid, abet, and shield against justice a band of midnight cut-throats, and yet not be such very bad fellows after all.

Look at the condition of Southern feeling also in the matter of education. Whatever the opinions of a civilized man may be as to the propriety of investing the blacks with the franchise, there cannot be two opinions amongst civilized men—not two avowable opinions, at all events—as to the propriety of educating them into a clear comprehension of their social and moral obligations. No Southerner ventures to deny that the negro, now that he is free, is entitled to as much knowledge as may make him an intelligent and useful member of the community. And yet we have to hear of the slightest movement on the part of any considerable number—in fact, any number—of Southern whites towards providing him with the means of education, or of the advocacy or suggestion of any such movement on the part of any respectable Southern periodical. Nor is this all. Not only do Southerners do nothing for the education of the freedmen themselves, but they throw every obstacle in the way of philanthropists, whether home-bred or foreign-bred, who engage in the work. We believe we may call it a notorious fact, that no Northern man or woman, or man or woman from any country, can go down there at this moment—no matter how pure, how high-minded, how elevated, how far raised above suspicion of self-seeking, how far removed from all participation in, or even interest in, politics, and open a school for the education of the class whose ignorance and degradation Southern writers and orators are never tired of painting in the darkest colors, without becoming an object of odium and persecution—without being treated as an outcast—and without being carefully avoided by all the educated and well-to-do portion of the community, as persons with whom intercourse would bring contamination. We say nothing of the risk of personal violence to which we believe such persons are exposed, and of the school-burning in which the prevailing hostility to their work occasionally finds expression, because acts of violence may be the work of solitary and ignorant criminals, and may meet with no sympathy from the rest of the community, and we will make this concession in spite of the fact that we have yet to hear of one perpetrator of such acts being brought to justice.

Now we care not what the antecedent circumstances may be, a professedly civilized and Christian community which regards the work of education amongst such a population as the colored population at the South as odious, and those who engage in it as infamous, and withholds from all such, without reference to their character or history, all sympathy and encouragement, is a community which is drifting into brutal barbarism, compared to which, in moral abomination, the barbarism and the corruption of declining Rome and the savagery of mediæval Europe were respectable and hopeful. Nevertheless, as political parties now stand, to vote for Seymour and Blair is to say that this state of feeling, if not all that could be desired, is not very condemnable.

Take again the condition on which, both in preaching and in practice, the South invites immigrants. That condition is simply absolute conformity with the prevailing opinion on some half-dozen of the weightiest moral, social, and political problems of the day—problems to the right solution of which the absolute freedom of thought and speech is essential; on penalty of what? Denunciation in the newspapers? Exclusion from political offices? Exclusion from society? Not at all. The penalty is simply death by cord or bullet, or else whipping on the bare back, or the destruction of house and property, and expulsion from the State; and this inflicted not calmly, decorously, by a court of law and under the protection of legal forms, but by that most awful and barbarous instrument of torture—a midnight mob. Does anybody flatter himself seriously that civilization, not to talk of material progress, can hold its own in a community in which this mode of keeping society together is practised; that barbarism and poverty are not as sure to follow it as corruption to follow on death? Yet the Democratic party does, by implication, say that these things are excusable, and says this when slavery, the great cause and excuse of such outrages ten years ago, has ceased to exist. In short, it is not simply the pride of the North or the constitutional theories of the two rival parties which are involved in the struggle now pending. It is whether half this continent, and the most fertile half, is to be given up by the deliberate act of Northern people to the operation of the most degrading agencies by which any society was ever afflicted, which are just as hostile to the growth of wealth as to the growth of morality and of a healthy public spirit, and which, if allowed to work much longer unchecked either by direct legislation and good police or by the loudly expressed reprobation of the North, will render free government impossible, and not at the South only, but here.

RECONSTRUCTION AS IT STANDS.

It is three years and more since the close of the war, and to-day we have Tennessee demanding the aid of the United States army to keep in existence the State government which represents, not perfectly perhaps, but still tolerably well, the principles in behalf of which the war was waged by the North; that is to say, the present State government of Tennessee is in the hands of men who are and have been better lovers of the Union than of secession, and, under its rule, the colored citizens of the United States there resident are not oppressed, but each counts for as much politically as a white Tennessean of equal intelligence; yet the legislature has just been obliged to send a committee of its members to Washington to ask for the support of the Federal Government, and the request seems so reasonable that even Mr. Johnson feels bound to grant it. Certainly this is a fact that challenges careful consideration; and it will not seem less important if we extend our view so as to include the rest of the South, for the case of Tennessee cannot, we think, be held to be in any essential respect exceptional. The legislature of that State has, to be sure, been sterner in disfranchising formerly disloyal citizens than some, and perhaps most, of the other Southern governments. And not unnaturally was this so. In Tennessee the Rebel and the Unionist were for years face to face in a hand-to-hand fight "for wife and life." Many of the Tennessean law-makers of to-day have, within the past six years, been hunted like beasts, and have set out by night for the Federal lines with their homes burning behind them to light them on the way. When a man has been compelled to live in the woods for days together, feeding his children on parched corn, or not feeding them at all, and has worn a cow-bell round his neck in order to get safely past rebel pickets, where he would have been murdered without mercy; when he has watched from his hiding-place while his father or brother was first whipped and then was shot, in cold blood, by a man who, perhaps, called him by his Christian name just as the bullet was sent through his head or his heart, it is not surprising if he is slow of belief that persons formerly in rebellion ought to be allowed to rule the State in which he lives. Whether it was bad or good policy, it certainly was not at all unaccountable that Mr. Brownlow's government should have been so harsh in its treatment of disunionists as to deny them the right to govern or participate in governing their fellow-citizens.

But outside of Tennessee this proscriptive spirit—mild as it is at its worst—has not been very actively at work. In Georgia, for instance, nobody is disfranchised by the act of the local authorities; the Congress of the United States has done all the disfranchising that has been done in Georgia. But what is it that we see there, and what is it that we may very reasonably expect to see? The whites are in a majority in Georgia; there is as much likelihood that white Georgians will be oppressed by black ones as there is that the earth will soon begin to revolve round the moon. Nobody in the State or out of it ever said that the twenty or thirty colored members of the Legislature have ever shown a tyrannical or cruel disposition, or that there would be any reason to fear them if they had, or that the best interests of the State could not be promoted by the legislature as it was when elected. Doubtless there were colored men in the legislature who were not over-wise. Perhaps the legislature has not yet been seen in this or any other country which has not contained a certain number of men whose opinions on almost any subject whatever would be of small value. But regardless of good policy, of the local law, and, as we think, of statesmanship—regardless of everything but the traditionary prejudice against negroes—the majority in the Georgia Legislature have just driven out of the House and Senate every one of the few men of color who had dared to be elected to seats in it. And this is only the prelude to other things that none of us will like so well. It is not intended by the Democratic majority that a Georgia negro should cast a vote any more than it is intended that he should be voted for. It is intended, in the case of each negro in that State, that the man who formerly bought and sold him shall regulate his whole existence, social as well as political; and nothing, we take it, is much surer than that before this time next year we shall see in operation a Georgia Black Code not so very different from the slave-laws of 1858, much as has happened within the decade.

There are hardly two other Southern States in which it is impossible—indeed, in which it is not probable—that there will be the same defeat of almost all the results of the war. In Mississippi it has already taken place. In that State—the most degraded and ignorant, perhaps, of all the States of the Union—it is now, on the whole, almost as well, from the Southern point of view, to be the employer of a negro as it was formerly to be the owner of him. He is not salable now; but he can be kept in one's hands almost as closely as before, and one is almost as little responsible for the just or decent treatment of him. So also of Texas, as well as of Mississippi and Georgia; so of Arkansas; so, to a great extent, of Alabama. Louisiana is at peace because of the presence of Union soldiers and for no other reason; and we ourselves think that if we except North Carolina and Florida—which latter is so small as hardly to be counted—nothing better could be said of the South generally than that it seems sure that the negroes will soon be reduced to a condition not very far removed from their old condition, and that in most towns south of Tennessee no white man who is not a believer in "a white man's government" is going to be allowed to live in comfort or safety.

If nothing worse were to happen than the social ostracism of the Northern men who have gone to the South, the matter would still be lamentable enough. On account of the discouragement of immigration, an immense tract of the national territory would be condemned, for a generation or two longer, to lie half-inhabited and half-cultivated by a comparatively uncivilized people—more or less barbarous masters and serfs. But if we may judge by the course taken by Georgia, and the threatenings made in every other Southern State, the ostracism of Northerners at the South is not to be all that we have gained by the war. We are, as we have said, to have, besides that, the virtual enslavement of the negro population. We have not yet heard any suggestion of a way to prevent Georgia's proceeding as far as she likes—and we know how far that is—in the way upon which she has entered. She has declared negroes ineligible to office, and so they may be under her constitution; but whether they are or not, who is to say no to her legislature? Nothing hinders her declaring negroes incapable of voting. Nothing, we imagine, short of a United States army, or, possibly, the fear of one, can hinder her from taking her own course in all respects. We have made the mistake of letting the South slip from the grasp of military power before we could be said to have honestly completed the work of reconstruction. It may have been necessary to take that erroneous course. Perhaps if we had not done ill, we should have seen the Democrats in power doing worse. We can congratulate ourselves on having at least attempted to do our duty by the people whom we freed from their masters and the people whom we freed from their slaves—on having done something towards bringing the South into conformity with the customs and laws which regulate society among the more civilized nations. But it is not to be denied that, as regards this work, we seem to have attempted rather than to have succeeded. The state of affairs in Georgia and Tennessee is such as may well make us doubt whether, between the two stools Restoration and Reconstruction, we have not fallen to the ground—have not had all the trouble and anxiety of trying to make a new South, and have not, after all, unconditionally, or all but unconditionally, readmitted the old South—the South in which Andersonville was possible, the South of slave-laws, of dense ignorance, of social and political tyranny, whose very virtues are the virtues of a time that is gone by, and in this age are for the most part vices that help to keep a people out of the current of progress.

If this be so—and we do not know on what theory Georgia (except so far as we can keep a Federal police there, and strengthen it to any desirable extent) is less her own mistress than Tennessee is, or New York, or Massachusetts—then a heavy responsibility is laid on the Republican party. To do anything towards preventing the full consummation of the plans of the present generation of Southern politicians and statesmen, it will be necessary that the Republican party should keep in power. A present success of the Democratic party means, of course, a restoration of the Union as it was. Four years more of Republican administration, and a Democratic success will mean something better than that, but not what will even then be needed—a supervision by the enlightened and unprejudiced part of the country over the rest of it—a surety on the part of all men in the South, loyal or disloyal, that behind the governments now established there is the irresistible force of the nation at large. Republican success is for the present certain, we suppose; but it has been endangered and easily may be endangered again. We hope for much from the next four years, but we must watch warily, or lose all that has been gained.

OUR DANGER FROM THE GOOD CROPS.

No science teaches so many seeming paradoxes as the science of political economy, and no science, consequently, is held in as light esteem by the many thoughtless people who persist in applying their own simple "rule of three" logic to the complicated problems of production and distribution that occupy the profoundest thought of the ablest scientists of our day. In the presence of the numerous believers in the teachings of common-sense as opposed to the teachings of science, it requires a certain amount of courage, and no little confidence in the power of science itself, to state seriously some of the conclusions at which political economy has arrived, especially such as are in unpleasant contradiction to popular belief and popular wishes. Just now a chorus of gladness and rejoicing sounds through the land at the bounty of nature in yielding such abundant harvests of all the products of the soil. Nor, as far as we can learn, is the gladness without good cause. For seldom have so many crops of so many different articles, requiring so many different contingencies of time, soil, and weather, been equally successful at one and the same time. Not only of hay and roots, but of wheat, barley, and corn; not only of beef and pork and lard, but of cotton and wool and tobacco, our crops this year are, or promise to be, exceedingly abundant and of superior quality. Well may the people rejoice, for of all our needs the most important are food and clothing, and when we have these in sufficient quantity we can spare many others. The abundance of our leading crops appears to be pretty well established, and may be accepted as a fact both by common-sense and by science. But the conclusions drawn from the fact differ as widely as possible. Common-sense believes and asserts that good crops make general prosperity and active business. Science asserts and proves that in our present state of civilization the first and most immediate effect of abundant crops is a general diminution of prosperity. The proof, without reference to scientific formulas or scientific terms, is as follows:

Good business, or general prosperity, means simply that state of our national activity in which the great majority of the people are profitably engaged—engaged each one in adding to his individual store of wealth. Do abundant crops produce that state of affairs in which each one adds to his individual wealth? There are three classes of persons directly concerned in every crop: the producers, the dealers, and the consumers. Let us examine the effect on each of these classes of an abundant crop of any one of our leading staples. Take last Saturday's reports of the cotton and dry-goods markets, as given in the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of this city:

"The cotton market has been excited and unsettled all the week, and prices at the close are three cents lower than last week, owing to better reports of the crop, liberal receipts, large offerings, and considerable sales for future delivery below previous rates. . . . . Planters send peremptory orders to sell, while spinners are looking for lower prices, and have made only limited purchases. . . . . The fall in cotton has had the effect of unsettling prices of cotton goods, and the more willing the jobbers showed themselves to meet the views of their customers, the more cautious buyers became. . . . The discounting of the cotton crop may lead to continued inactivity, and standard goods have been reduced one cent without leading to an increase of transactions; but the stocks must be cleared out, and the customary measures will be taken to attract trade."

It is evident from this statement from an entirely unprejudiced source that every owner of a bale of cotton, whether planter, factor, dealer, or New England manufacturer, was poorer at the end of the week than he was at the beginning by the total amount of the decline in the price, and that as long as the expected decline continues, business will be reduced to the lowest possible limits, and almost every transaction will be attended with loss. It is precisely the same with the manufactured article. Every manufacturer, manufacturer's agent, jobber, and wholesale dealer, down to the smallest retailer, will do his business with a diminished profit, or entirely without profit. The more the price declines, the more cautious buyers become. Every prudent housewife puts off until the last moment the purchase of her usual winter supply of sheeting; but stocks must be cleared out; the customary measures are taken to attract trade; prices are marked down everywhere. Even the decline leads to no increase in transactions, retailers buy less and less, jobbers order less from the manufacturers, and the manufacturers manufacture less, and all parties connected with the cotton trade do less business, and what they do is done at less profit. All these persons are less prosperous—add less to their individual wealth—in consequence of the abundant cotton crop, and hence become reduced consumers of the products of all other classes of the community. Let us go a step further. The spinners of cotton are looking for lower prices, and have made only limited purchases. They are reducing the production of their manufactories to the lowest point, they are employing no new hands, they are even dismissing some of the old ones, they try to diminish their loss on the raw material bought and the manufactured article on hand, by reducing the cost of their present production. Some hands are being dismissed, others have to submit to a reduction of their wages. Under such circumstances, no new factories are likely to be built, no additions or improvements made to the old ones, no new machinery is likely to be put in; on the contrary, everywhere the greatest possible economy is certain to prevail. In this way many persons are thrown out of employment, and others have their wages reduced, not only in the cotton mills themselves, but in a great many other branches of trade more or less directly dependent on them. We have seen before how the decline in cotton injures the dealers; we have now seen how the same decline affects the manufacturers, the mill-hands, and many connected branches of trade. The cotton merchant, the dry-goods dealer, the manufacturer, the mill-hand, and all others dependent upon these, are less prosperous, in consequence of the decline in cotton—are less able to buy the goods produced by others, in consequence of the abundant cotton crop. How is the planter affected by the crop? About three-fourths of the cotton that we raise is exported. English statisticians assert that England, the principal buyer of our cotton, has to pay, and can afford to pay, very nearly the same sum in money every year for the cotton that she buys, no more and no less; for a large crop, she pays in proportion less per pound; for a small crop, proportionately more. If the assertion is correct, then it is certain that, for three-fourths of the crop, the planter will not get more when the crop is large than when it is small. Of the other fourth, the same may be said with much certainty, although there is more difficulty in obtaining authorities to support the assertion. It is very evident that the mere probability of an increased supply lowers the price very materially; for although the most sanguine estimates do not make the whole crop larger than last year's by more than twenty-five per cent., yet the decline in price, during one single week, is equal to twelve per cent. Of course, the expense of harvesting, storing, and marketing is greater for a large crop than for a small one, so that if the large crop does not realize actually more at the lower prices than the small crop at the higher prices, which it scarcely ever does, then the large crop is less profitable to the producer than the small crop. It is notorious that, in 1861, even without the war, the South would have been ruined with the largest cotton crop ever raised; and that, but for the war, the cotton industry and trade of England would, for the same reason, have been bankrupt and broken beyond hope of remedy or relief. Such is the effect wrought upon the producer, dealer, and manufacturer by abundant crops of cotton. The same effect precisely is produced upon other classes by abundant crops of other articles. Abundant crops make lower prices to the producers for the article harvested, and a depressed and unprofitable trade to all connected with the article, whether as dealers, manufacturers, or in any other capacity. The more articles there are of which the crops are abundant at the same time, the more branches of trade there will be that suffer from depression and unprofitableness; and every individual whose profits are diminished, loses to that extent the ability to consume the products of all other branches of trade, and causes thus a similar depression in all other branches of trade, whether the latter be otherwise affected by the condition of the crops or not. Scarcely ever have so many different crops been produced in great abundance as have been this year; scarcely ever has so great a depression in trade been witnessed as this year will witness.

There is an instinct among the people that foretells an approaching change more surely than all the conclusions of science. During the last few weeks we have received several communications from correspondents asking our views on what one of them terms the approaching crisis, and we notice that among the prescient financial men of the city an uneasy feeling appears to be gaining ground that some sudden revulsion is in prospect. We expect no violent change. We think the commercial community in general, and especially those who are compelled to keep on hand large stocks of merchandise, will lose money on their goods, many will find that even prosperous years can scarcely support the extravagance of rent, outfit, and personal expenditure that has of late become the rule, and will have to change their course or succumb. The amount of credits granted of late years, though rapidly increasing, is not yet sufficient to cause alarm, and we do not look for large or startling failures. But there is enough evidence to warrant us in anticipating serious losses in all the leading branches of trade, especially those more directly connected with our staple products, and all those that have been fostered by the protective tariffs of the last years. Our greatest troubles are not, however, likely to arise from our commerce, but will rather be connected with our finances. In the first place, the enormous business growing out of the original subscriptions to our great national loans, the frequent subsequent changes in the form of the different classes of securities, and the large transactions resulting from the foreign investment demand, have furnished a profitable field of activity for many old and new private banking firms, national banks, and other financial institutions, which will now find their occupation gone, since the national debt has been almost entirely funded, and no great changes are likely to arise either in the domestic or foreign investments. Business in this line is not likely to be active or profitable for some time to come. In the next place, considerable uncertainty prevails as to the real value and productive capacity of our daily increasing railroad property. The enormous additions made to the securities of these roads within the last few years, and the many disreputable practices that have been indulged in with regard to them for the purposes of Wall Street speculation, have made the public generally averse to purchasing them for investment, and it is believed that the larger portion of them are nominally owned by speculative combinations, but are in reality held by the banks of the city. The latter have loaned money on these securities at their present market value. If the present market price adequately represents their real value, the banks are perfectly safe from loss; but if, as many shrewd men assert, the majority of our roads are scarcely worth the money for which they are mortgaged, so that the stocks are almost valueless, we may very likely see, as a consequence of a general depression in trade, a decline in the value of our best railroad securities equal to that witnessed in England two years ago, involving serious losses to our banks and other financial institutions. We have on a former occasion pointed out the many elements of unsoundness that we discern in the management of our fire and life insurance companies, and we should not be surprised if a season of commercial depression might, sooner than expected, put our strictures to the test of experience. The Presidential election adds another element of uncertainty to all calculations of the immediate future, and cannot fail to add to the general depression which we anticipate. An increasing dulness in trade, a steady decline in the prices of merchandise, a general unprofitableness in business, great inactivity in the money market, diminishing investment demand for railroad securities and decline in their value, serious losses to merchants, banks, and other financial institutions—such is our forecast of the immediate future of business, based upon the reported abundance of our principal crops.

THE ABOLITION OF FEUDAL TENURE IN VENETIA.

WHEN among the number of secondary laws which always mark the close of a parliamentary session—laws which have interest only for the localities to which they are applicable—the law abolishing feudal tenure in Venice was discussed and passed, it excited little or no comment in the capital of Italy, as in Tuscany feudal tenure is unknown. Since the passage of the macinato tax, no question of any importance occurred, save the all-important one of the cession of the Government tobacco monopoly to a private and anonymous company, hence, once certain that the tobacco fight would not come off until a certain day, "own correspondents" did not hesitate to quit their dreary perches, and snatch a sniff of the briny air of Spezzia or Leghorn, or a breeze equally invigorating among the mountains of Pistoja or Serravalle. The tobacco fight ended, the session's work was done; turn and twist it as you choose, the ministry could vaunt justly, "Victory along all the line"—victory over the coalesced opposition, whose vote of want of confidence had compelled them to tender their resignations on the 22d September—victory in the question of the meal tax—victory in the additions proposed by them to the civil list—and victory, greatest of all and last, the victory over many of their own friends, who had joined with their adversaries to combat the alienation of such an important branch of public property as the cultivation and manufacture of tobacco. The Government remained masters of the field; the vanquished are summoned by their leaders to a council of war in Naples; and throughout Italy, one province excepted, but two parties exist—those bent on defeating the application of the obnoxious taxes and on overthrowing their authors, and those determined that the law shall be carried out to the uttermost, and that the "restorers of the country's credit," as the party of order style the present Government, shall reign prosperously and long. But cross the Po—traverse the provinces of Mantua, Rovigo, Venetia, and Friuli—and you hear little or nothing of the macinato or of the regia cointeressata. Feudal tenure, and its abolition, and the method thereof, are just now the burden of Venetian song. Will the Senate sanction the law? is the question asked by some with hope, by some with fear, by all with an eagerness that in America can be scarcely understood. Indeed, if we merely calculate the actual number of the proprietors of fiefs and their legitimate successors, the question would still seem one of mere class interests; but it is the incalculable number of collateral claims, and of disputed and pretended rights, that brings the question down from the owner of thousands of acres to the humble possessor of a small farm or even of a single corn-field.

The history of feudal property in these provinces is quickly told. When foreigners took possession of the soil, it was to their interest to purchase the alliance of the clergy; this they did by gifts of land to the patriarchs, bishops, abbots, and abbesses, who thus became, for the time being, lords of the soil; and being present on the spot, while the nominal prince was generally absent, they exercised, in all but the name, the rights of sovereignty. This state of things existed in full force in the province of Friuli, just as the Venetian Republic became strong enough to set the foreigners at naught. Unable to manage their immense possessions, the clergy created an entire regiment of sub-fiefs and fief-holders; and whereas, at first, the grants were but temporary, they soon, by force or favor, were transformed into feudal investitures or perpetual benefices. In their turn, these new owners of the soil, compelled to seek for laborers below their own class, contracted with the ignudi—naked—peasants for so much work, to be paid in so much land, maso or possession. From the institution of these masi, or immense tracts of land, divided into arable lands, woods, fields, swamp-lands, etc., dates the cultivation of the Friuli, and, as a natural consequence, the increase of population; the ignudi and their posterity being one and all serfs of the signori, who, in their turn, were vassals of the Church, the sovereignty of emperors or princes dwindling down to a mere name. Later, the signori, for want of money or for other reasons, sold their rights to the ignudi or serfs, setting them free and making the lands their own. For a time, neither the Emperor nor the Church took notice of these illegal sales, until they found that the emancipated serfs, far from siding with the government, became utterly independent and insubordinate; on which the patriarchs of Aquileia published edicts recalling in vigor the ancient laws, which strictly prohibit the sale or alienation of fiefs. But the traffic continued, the signori contenting themselves with inserting in the contract—jure feudi et Aquileiensis ecclesiæ semper salvo.

In 1420, the Province of Friuli was annexed, as the modern phrase runs, to the Venetian Republic; thus the temporal was separated from the spiritual power; the Church naturally sought the aid of the foreigners against the Serenissima, and when Austria received from Napoleon the prostrate provinces of the Republic, her first care was to revive all the ancient feudal rights of the state—and here we come to the question which so violently agitates the provinces at this eleventh hour of fiefs and feuds, What is, and what is not, feudal property? For instance, some member of the family A, looking over family documents, finds that, in the days gone by, his ancestors possessed such and such an estate in virtue of feudal tenure, which is now in possession of family B. He brings a lawsuit against B for possessing property illegally sold as illegally bought. B avers that, however the estate was bought, it was paid for; that his ancestors have spent money and labor on the same, and that it is his by every law of equity and justice; the pair go before the feudal court in Venice, which bears a strong resemblance to the English Chancery court, seeing that of the thousands of cases brought before it, scarcely a score are decided; but the evil consequences are none the less, as B, uncertain whether he and his heirs will retain the estate, ceases to invest capital in the soil—impoverishes it, on the contrary, by forcing it to produce the utmost every year.

With insignificant variations, this state of things existed in the southern provinces of Italy, in Lombardy, and in Venetia. The revolutionary annexation of Naples left its traces in the immediate legislation that followed. The first Italian Parliament abolished feudal tenure out-and-out, i. e., feudal property, which under feudal laws must pass to all the male posterity, became, in the hands of the actual proprietor, free estate, which he could sell or will away at pleasure; nor could so-called feudal lords bring any further actions against supposed holders of feudal property illegally purchased. When Lombardy was annexed, a less revolutionary law was passed. True, the state resumed all right to fiefs granted by governments in times past, but only two-thirds of every feudal estate was transformed into free estate for the actual owner; whereas the remaining third was reserved to the last male heir born or conceived at the time of the promulgation of the law, and the right of so-called feudal lords to bring actions against supposed purchasers of fiefs illegally sold was maintained for thirty years. So that in Lombardy only in the year 1891 will it be decided what is and what is not feudal property.

Stimulated by the force of events, by the repeated petitions of provinces, communes, and individuals, Austria, in 1862, passed a law on the abolition of feudal tenure. But like all Austrian laws on Italian soil, it was partial and unsatisfactory, and remained almost a dead letter.

1st. For the abolition of every separate fief, a disallodializing sentence was necessary; hence, owing to the various formalities required, or to the reluctance or indifference of the feudal lords, only five tenures were abolished from the promulgation of the law until the cession of the Venetian provinces in 1866. In this the Italian law of 1861, which abolished feudal tenure there and then, was superior.

2d. The fief, by the Austrian law, only became extinct in the person of the last male heir born or conceived in 1862—whereas the Italian law of 1861 gives two-thirds to the actual possessor.

3d. The Austrian law ordained that the Royal Procurator of Finance should intervene in the trials between the supposed feudal lords and the supposed illegal purchasers of fiefs—whereas in the Italian law of 1861, the state declined all intervention by means of the Fisco, and left plaintiff and defendant to fight out their battles before the ordinary tribunals. The only instance in which the Austrian is superior to the Italian law is inasmuch as it limits the time in which actions may be brought against the supposed illegal purchasers of fiefs to three years, so that on and after the 1st January, 1866, no petition could be presented.

On the annexation of the Venetian provinces, one of the first questions was, of course, the abolition of fiefs. The minister presented a project of law, the commission studied it; it stands thus, in brief, as passed by the Lower House: Feudal tenure is abolished—the actual holder of a fief becomes free possessor of two-thirds of the estate—the remaining third is reserved to the last male heir born or conceived at the time of the promulgation of this present law. After this promulgation, no action can be brought by supposed proprietors of fiefs against supposed illegal purchasers of the same, nor can any actions now in course be continued. On the two latter clauses all the excitement turns. Whereas, by the Austrian law, the last male heir born or conceived in 1862 concentrated in himself all the property of his ancestors, and the youngest member in each family had been designated and accepted as the said heir-apparent, the Italian law brings the question down to the moment when its own law shall pass; and it is not difficult to imagine the heart-burnings and disappointments of the presumptive heirs of 1862, the hopes and calculations of the presumptive heirs, or rather of their parents, of 1868. How many hasty marriages! What earnest prayers for a male heir ascend from the Venetian plains at the present moment! There is time yet, say the younger branches, to marry and hope, before the Senate passes and the King approves the law. I happen to be writing in the very midst of a family in which, in 1862, a tiny one-year-old mite was regarded as the heir to nine estates belonging to father, uncles, and great-uncle. Nine feudal estates to be concentrated in the hands of one small personage, even if any of the uncles should marry and have heirs—naturally, Master Checco has been nurtured and tended as a prince of royal blood. Alack-a-day! As soon as it became evident that the minister and commission were agreed on extending the rights of possession to the male heirs of 1868, two uncles married, and are now anxiously counting the months to know whether their brides will present them with a boy or a girl. If the former, Master Checco's prospects are annihilated. It is difficult to say whether the law is wise or unwise in this particular. As the Austrian law was to be abolished, it seemed contradictory to close the period of the feudal system at the precise date of that law; at the same time, it tells hard on hundreds of young men who, in the certainty of eventually inheriting immense estates, have abandoned trades and professions and entered into compacts with the present possessors of the soil, as the Austrian law permits, for a portion of the income of the same, or even for the sale. But the chief perturbation produced by the law arises from the summary abolition at a certain date of all fiefs, and the rendering null and void all actions brought against third parties after the promulgation of the present law. As we have shown, Austria limited the presentation of petitions to three years, but the actions commenced might continue; the sudden closing of all these has brought the question to a crisis. There is time, but a short time, say the plaintiffs; the Senate has to discuss—the King to sanction—then a certain time will elapse before the law takes effect. Let us make haste while the sun shines—get our cause through court before the feudal tribunal of Venice be abolished. But they have small hopes of success in any case. The court of Venice will knows that justice and equity lie with the present holders of the soil, nor will the judges render themselves unpopular by satisfying the desires of the signori.

A last hope remains to the malcontents; they have presented a petition to the Senate, setting forth the reasons why fiefs should not be abolished, or, at any rate, should not be abolished in the way proposed. As there are but few Venetian senators, and as that august body only puts its veto on the deliberations of the Lower House in cases where its own interests are concerned, it is probable that the law will pass without opposition.

VENICE, Aug. 26, 1868.

Notes.

LITERARY.

MESSRS. OAKLEY & MASON announce a new edition of Mr. James E. Munson's "Complete Phonographer." So far as we know, this is the first time that any school-book publisher has thought of putting on the market as a text-book a work on phonography. But we suppose it is not a bad venture. We are afraid to say how many thousands of newspapers we have in America, and how many more thousands we shall have by the time the present generation of school children is grown up; and under such stimulus of the press, short-hand writing may well enough become a study in American schools.—Messrs. T. B. Peterson & Brothers announce a new book, "Mabel's Mistake," by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens; "The Red Court Farm," by Mrs. Henry Wood; and "The Lives of Horatio Seymour and F. P. Blair." We have mentioned before, in speaking of Messrs. Peterson's announcements, but not by its name, a book of travels by Dr. C. H. Haeseler. "Across the Atlantic" it is called, and it is a book of European travel.

—"Competent critics say that in its adaptation to the wants and tastes of cultivated Southern families, the Home Monthly (Nashville) is the best to be had." So the Home Monthly itself says. Some of it is almost too good. Exempli gratia, as the more eminent Southern scholars say, "Iophon's able review of Buckle in this issue" informs us that Iophon has "heard of two reviews of it"—of the "Introduction to the History of Civilization"—"one in the North British, and the other in the Presbyterian Review." He has "not been able to get hold of either one. . . . . But since it is a book that has already called forth two reviews, and that will call forth more even yet," he has decided to go on without regretting that his own notes are not more copious. All regret and sorrow are unprofitable, they say. We wish we had room to quote a good deal from Iophon. "But what is Art?" he asks. "Art is the unnatural combination of natural laws." Bismark, he says, "is but a shorter and more popular name for German ideas, whose united forces centre in him, pointing him from the exalted point of view in which he stands, to the dykes of the Zuyder Zee, reddening in the rays of the Occident, and to the majestic Danube, rolling proudly on by the fields and cities of busy millions, whose Germanic sympathies find in this vast artery of commerce the aorta of life to the race." "An eminent scholar" has, it appears, written an essay on "Woman," which will be printed soon, but which failed to reach the editor in time for publication in the September number. Mrs. S. E. Peck, however, takes his place with an article on the same subject. In her opinion, she declares, "it is rebellion against God for her ('woman') to contend for rights that he, in his wisdom, has denied her," the right of suffrage being one such if Mrs. Peck is to be trusted. Then follow dicta in regard to the wife, the mother, the true woman, the household angel, and so forth, by Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale, by the Rev. H. H. Kavanaugh in his sermon on "The Love of God," by Gardiner Spring, by George D. Prentice—(the heart of woman, Mr. Prentice says, draws to itself the loves of others as the diamond drinks up the sun's rays)—by Mrs. Sigourney, by Miss A. J. Evans, by J. F. Corkran, and several others. "Mercedes Wylie's Narrative of Dixie Life" is another article that may be read with pleasure. One of Miss Wylie's personages, discussing with great power the relative merits of two English authors, gives this charmingly Southern reason for the judgment she passes: "And again, we of the South should prefer Thackeray to Dickens; the latter judged us wrongfully and shamefully without coming among us, and the former, welcomed among us, was our friend, and writes cordially of 'those Southern men.'" We have no room to speak of Erle Bertie's poetry, or of Iophon's "Midnight Musings," or of Adrienne's "Twilight among the Poets," or of "Southland Writers," by Ida Raymond. The whole magazine will be found delicious. It is really true, too, that it is "the best" in the Southern country. What hope there is of the success of reconstruction among a people which in literature is nearly abreast of the Canadians it is impossible to say. The contempt of the readers of the Home Monthly for the ignorant, uncultivated carpet-bagger must be very galling to the latter.

—The eminent botanist, Dr. Hooker, has been called to preside over the British Association for the Advancement of Science, in session at Norwich. In his opening address he exhibited in a remarkable degree the interest which most naturalists have taken in the questions relating to prehistoric man and prehistoric antiquities. Dr. Hooker presented this subject before coming to his own special science, and in a very fascinating manner. Two of his illustrations were quite new and surprising. After showing that many a living people is prehistoric in the sense that there is a period in its annals at which the records of it begin, while its origin is lost in obscurity, he instanced the Hindoos, who pretend to a vast antiquity, yet have no tradition or memorial of the invasion of Alexander. Now it is known that the Hindoos themselves were invaders of the country which they now occupy; but that remnants of the older races which they dislodged still exist among them, and form the really prehistoric people of India, some eight or nine millions strong, is by no means notorious. Yet such is the fact, and the Indian government is collecting photographs and histories of these indigenous tribes, with great success so far as regards the former. Still another tribe is found, within 300 miles of Calcutta, consisting of semi-savages, who by a single practice carry us back to prehistoric days. These people, as Dr. Hooker could testify from experience, "habitually erect dolmens, menares, cysts, and cromlechs, almost as gigantic in their proportions, and very similar in appearance and construction, to the so-called Druidical remains of Western Europe," Stonehenge, and the like. The details and motive of their erection were all given by the speaker, who had seen those which had been erected not six months before. What is additionally curious is, that in their language the name for a stone is the same as that in the Celtic idioms of Wales and Brittany; but of other resemblances nothing or little more is known. The field for investigation thus opened is remarkably attractive and promising.

—The study of prehistoric archæology, in its relations to physical science, is producing quite as wonderful results, and effecting quite as important revolutions in opinions heretofore entertained, as in the department of ethnology, for which Dr. Hooker points out its value. In the September number of the American Naturalist, Dr. A. Leith Adams describes a prodigious phenomenon observed in the Bay of Fundy, consequent upon a violent though not extraordinary gale, which covered a lagoon, usually shut out from the sea, with a multitude of dead herring. Within two weeks of the date of this occurrence, the remains had begun to be covered by the mud of the morass, forming a deposit, mixed with fresh-water remains, which might some day puzzle the geologist, but the knowledge of which enables us to judge how like are nature's workings in all ages, and how simple are the agencies by which the grandest phenomena are brought about. In the same number of the Naturalist are very agreeable papers on the Orchids, and a tropical air-plant called the Copey, by C. M. Tracy and Charles Wright respectively. A made-up paper, by A. Hyatt, on the Chasms of the Colorado, is also readable, and is illustrated by plates. The zoölogical papers are on the birds of Palestine compared with those of Panama and the United States, on the Ruffed Grouse, and on the Mottled Owl. The natural history miscellany is full of excellent matter, including the proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and of other scientific bodies.

—After settling in their minds where all the pins go to, and next what becomes of all the old pianos, humane persons may sometimes speculate on the fate of old horses. To a resident on the Brighton road, near Boston, who was forced to see the latter end of these poor beasts, many of them fallen from a high estate, oftener than his merciful heart could well endure, we owe a valuable paper read before the Suffolk District Medical Society, by Dr. Henry I. Bowditch, and printed in the New York Medical Gazette for last month. "Hippophagy" is the title, and the article may be and ought to be read by unprofessional men, and by every member and officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The author traces the practice of all nations, ancient and modern, in regard to the eating of horse-flesh, and proves that the non-eaters are perhaps even now in a minority, and introduces some curious evidence as to the connection between hippophagy and paganism, and how the Church, which always meddled with the people's diet, let loose its bulls upon horse-meat, and drove it from market and from board. Then follows proof of the wholesomeness of this sort of food, its cheapness, as not requiring fattening, its excellent flavor and peculiar nourishment—at least, one instance of this last quality is given, etc. Dr. Bowditch then examines and refutes objections, which are generally little more than prejudices, and closes with the bibliography of the subject. Some statistics on delirium tremens in Russia, from the enormous and growing consumption of brandy, are also to be found in this August number, and are worth reading. The Medical Journal has now become the property of D. Appleton & Co., and may be expected to appear more regularly than of late, while it will of course lose nothing of its handsome typography. We should mention that at the same time with the August number is also published that for September, which is introduced by a very interesting article on Jamaica, with special regard to certain remarkable hot springs of high medicinal value, but also telling, in a most agreeable way, of the chief hospitals of the island, and incidentally of the physical features of Jamaica, and of the social and sanitary condition of its population.

—Was Gibbon an enemy of Christianity, and is his history of the rise of the Church only in an ironical sense a defence of the faith held by Christendom, and really a sneering attack on it? What reply it has been usual to make to this question we all know. Able historians have written works of their own, or have voluminously annotated Gibbon's work, for the avowed purpose of correcting the infidel tendency of his writings, and he has been one of the set of men of his day—including Voltaire and Paine and the French Cyclopædists—whom the pulpits have delighted to dishonor. But now, after so many years, the great historian finds a defender, and we do not know when—even in this age of the rehabilitation of dilapidated reputations—the work of rehabilitation has been better done. Dr. James M. Macdonald wrote for the last number of the Bibliotheca Sacra an article entitled "Irony in History," which had for its object the discrediting of the common belief in Gibbon's infidelity, and to us it seems that he is very successful. The essay has been republished as a pamphlet, and can be had, we suppose, on application to the publishers of the magazine. We can recommend it to our readers as being very well worth attention. It begins by stating fully the charges brought against the accused author. It ends by showing good reasons why these charges should have obtained currency among the historian's contemporaries. For instance, he held, and necessarily expressed, views on several questions, just then the subject of bitter controversy, which were at variance with those of a large class, though not the ablest class, of religious disputants. He denied the authenticity of post-apostolic miracles for one thing. Of course, the party that had been maintaining their authenticity were ready and eager to see in his hostility to their views, as regards that matter, a disbelief in miracles in general; and, in an age when very great stress was laid on the "proof from miracles," it was natural that disbelief in Christianity should be alleged against an author convicted of unsoundness in this particular. Then, Gibbon's age was the age of "apologies"—both in the old and in the common sense of that word—for Christianity; infidelity was rife; "French principles" were rampant; the Church was terrified beyond what was reasonable; and it was very easy to arouse suspicion against writers who, for any cause, were not decided partisans. One side gladly claimed them, the other readily denounced them. Dr. Macdonald shows clearly that Gibbon's ablest ecclesiastial contemporaries did not regard him as an enemy. Even Bishop Watson, who wrote against him, may be said to have recanted on after-consideration; Robertson and Campbell, defenders of the faith, found no fault in him; nor did Hurd or Horne or Porteus or Horsely deem it necessary to enter the lists against him. His statement of the influence of secondary causes on the growth of Christianity, accompanied as it was by free admissions of the divine origin of that system of religion, did not, then, we may argue, seem to them misleading. It was with these secondary causes Gibbon thought that he, as historian, had to deal; the other was properly to be left to theologians. So much and much more on this interesting topic Dr. Macdonald says, saying it elegantly enough perhaps, and certainly putting his case with force, candor, ingenuity, and carefulness. In summing up, he says: "Can a man who, after fifty years of age, writes memoirs of himself, in which he puts on record that from an early period of his life he had acquiesced in the tenets of the Christian faith, and in whose voluminous writings cannot be found any counter statement, nor anything clearly irreconcilable with this avowed belief, be regarded as an infidel on the ground merely of an interpretation which involves the supposition of an utter disregard by him of the laws of good writing?"—the supposition, namely, that he used irony so badly as to leave it very doubtful if he did not mean to be taken seriously. The doctor gives a clue to the feelings that moved him to undertake his essay in the sentence that follows those we have just quoted: "Shall we needlessly, or by a process of laborious argument, find an enemy in one who holds so eminent a place in the world of letters?" but, as we have said, he is candid, and he gives chapter and verse.

—Every one has seen cameos of which the relief is of one color, and the plane of another, though cut from the same piece of agate. That the two layers are not found thus distinguished in nature, but are colored artificially, is perhaps not generally known. The process, among other incidents of the agate manufacture, is described by Günther Lange, in his work, "Die Halbedelsteine aus der Familie der Quarze, und die Geschichte der Achatindustrie" (The Semi-precious Stones of the Quartz Family, and History of the Agate Industry), Kreuznach, R. Voigtländer, 1868—of which we can say that if it is nearly as interesting as a review of it in the Weser Zeitung, it must be a very agreeable book. It introduces us to the little village of Oberstein, on the river Nahe, in the principality of Birkenfeld, which is now the chief seat of the agate industry in Europe, having become so through the possession of quarries which were worked, probably, long before the fifteenth century, but which practically were exhausted about twenty years ago. The main business of Oberstein survived all perils, the French Revolution included, till overtaken by this one, of a dearth of material, and the accident or providence by which this danger was removed is an encouraging lesson in what we may call international economy. After Europe and the East had been ransacked, it happened in 1834 to certain grinders of Idar, in the neighborhood of Oberstein, who had emigrated to the German colony of San Leopoldo, in Brazil, to be called to furnish music at a Brazilian fazenda, the courtyard of which they found paved with the stones for which their brethren at home were sighing. A neighboring stream, the Taquarie, yielded, when searched, forty-pound boulders, and at once a trade arose between Fatherland and the colony, and a still further emigration from Idar and Oberstein. When the bed of the stream and the adjoining valley were thoroughly harvested, first the surface of the earth was explored, and finally deep quarries were opened, and to-day the stone trade from Brazil and Uruguay is a regular and valuable link between the two worlds—invaluable, we may say, considering how, without such links, the problem of social order and civilization in South America would seem one of the most hopeless. The agate business, which includes all the modes of cutting, carving, coloring, setting, and adorning the stone, amounts, in good years, to 1,500,000 thalers, and employs upwards of 3,000 people, many of whom work at their homes and acquire the means to set up for themselves. No part of it seems to be injurious to health.

